* General Cabinet approval was given to the artillery and walkie-talkie programmes and to the transfer of signals equipment and the balance of the field equipment when the Four Year Defence Programme was approved on February 22, 1951.

5. There is thus no financial provision for any further mutual aid to NATO during 1951-52 beyond that already planned. At the same time, the possibility of Canada producing 392 F-86 airframes for the United Kingdom has been under discussion for some months with the United Kingdom and the United States, who were informed that the Canadian Government would be prepared to give this important question further consideration, provided they arranged to furnish the necessary engines and other components and the Standing Group recommended allocation of the airframes to the United Kingdom. Should it prove feasible and desirable to proceed with the production of these airframes, an additional $81 million will be required over a period of about two years. Again, it is not unlikely that the Standing Group will recommend additional NATO aircrew training in Canada and the United States. In any case, a further sum of about $29.7 million will be required in the years after 1951-52 to complete the financing of the above radar, artillery and walkie-talkie production programme, as well as a further estimated $118 million to complete the financing of the NATO aircrew training programme between April 1, 1952 and March 31, 1955.

6. The following additional factors are relevant to the consideration of the provision of Canadian mutual aid beyond that already planned:

(a) while, in the summer of 1950, it was thought that Canada could contribute most effectively to NATO by increasing its defence production capacity, the country is now committed to a fairly sizeable military programme and its defence production programme is geared to this military programme;

(b) the U.S. dollar content of Canadian defence production is of increasing importance since Canada's deficit overall on current account was about $300 million for the calendar year 1950 and may increase to something like $480 million for 1951. Any additional production may therefore have to be devoted to earning U.S. dollars;

(c) Canadian industry is fairly fully employed;

(d) manpower problems are becoming more acute in special fields;

(e) basic materials such as steel, certain ferro-alloys, etc., are in short supply;

(f) in general, it is desirable for Canadian industry to concentrate on producing types of equipment being used by the Canadian forces;

(g) the fiscal impact of the defence programme is such that the Government considers that there would be difficulties in expanding the programme in 1951-52 unless there were some new urgency;

(h) the fiscal, manpower and material requirements of the defence programme (apart from mutual aid) are likely to be greater in 1952-53.

7. There are, however, certain other factors that have to be taken into account. First, as a result of the decisions reached by the Government last summer, Ministers and also Canadian representatives in NATO agencies gave definite indications that $300 million had been appropriated for the primary purpose of enabling Canada to make appreciable contributions from its productive capacity to the security of the NATO area. It would therefore come as a distinct surprise to other NATO countries if it were now indicated that Canada was abandoning this sort of policy for the future.

8. Again, it will be noted that, contrary to original expectations, the major portion of Canadian mutual aid funds has been spent on replacement of equipment and that what has occurred is that, under the provisions of Section 3 of the Defence Appropriation Act, 1950, Canada has carried out what is primarily a major programme of conversion of its own Army equipment, and had only devoted some 9% of the programme up to the end of 1951-52 to mutual aid from production.

9. Finally, the NATO countries have recently established the Defence Production Board, whose function is to co-ordinate the production effort of member countries with a view to obtaining, as efficiently and rapidly as possible, the equipment required to arm the deterrent forces. It is not improbable that, from time to time — partly in view of the indications that have been given of Canadian policy — the Board will wish to make proposals for further Canadian production assistance (including possibly proposals for standby production for U.K.-type equipment in Canada and the United States). In the circumstances, it would clearly be difficult for Mr. MacMillan simply to take the stand that henceforth no such recommendations should be made to Canada because all available Canadian funds are now committed. Canadian representatives on the Council Deputies and other NATO agencies will be in the same position with regard to proposals for these and other forms of Canadian mutual aid.

10. It would therefore appear undesirable for Canada to refuse to give consideration to proposals for additional mutual aid. At the same time, it should not be necessary for Canada in all cases to assume the full cost of additional aid from Canadian production. For instance, there might be cases like that of the proposed F-86 production programme, in which Canada, the United Kingdom and the United States could possibly share the costs, Canada providing the airframes, the United Kingdom the engines and the United States other components. There may also be cases in which it would be reasonable to attach some price to additional aid from production. For example, the going European cost could be charged and the difference between that and the Canadian cost might be absorbed by Canada. Alternatively, arrangements could be made whereby the additional costs of producing for NATO countries an item under production for the Canadian forces could be charged to NATO recipients.

11. In the light of the foregoing considerations, the Panel on Economic Aspects of Defence Questions recommends that Mr. H.R. MacMillan and other Canadian representatives in NATO agencies be informed that:

(a) The Canadian funds approved specifically for mutual aid in 1951-52 are either earmarked or committed; as regards production, even if Canada placed additional mutual aid orders now, they would yield little additional production before 1952-53; and the foreign exchange and fiscal impact of the current Canadian defence programme (including mutual aid) is such that it would be difficult to expand the programme for 1951-52, unless, of course, some new situation arose calling for a still greater sense of urgency. Except in the case of the F-86 airframe project which is already under discussion with the United Kingdom and the United States, they should, therefore, discourage proposals for additional mutual aid to be provided in 1951-52.

(b) They may indicate, when proposals are made for additional Canadian mutual aid, that the government is prepared to consider proposals for the provision of additional mutual aid in 1952-53 (without implying any undertaking as to its decisions) including in particular — on the production side — proposals that would fit in with the Canadian defence production programme. In view of the time required to accomplish production, proposals for production in 1952-53 would have to be received at an early date.

(c) They should indicate at the same time that there may well be cases in which, owing to the impact of the current defence programme, the Government will consider it necessary to attach a price covering at least a proportion of the cost of such additional aid.

(d) They should make it clear to recipients of Canadian stocks of U.K.-type equipment that production of replacement parts will not generally be available in Canada and that they should look to U.K. production as the source for their normal requirements of spare parts; and that Canada does not contemplate establishing standby production capacity for U.K.-type equipment, although the Government would be prepared to give further consideration to this matter in the event of competent NATO agencies deciding that there was a strategic need for such capacity.

(e) They may indicate that the Canadian Government will be glad to provide facilities to NATO countries wishing to purchase additional military equipment in Canada, including the placing of any direct government orders with Canadian industry.

12. The question of payment for services and equipment provided to Canadian forces by other NATO countries is dealt with in a separate paper.

PAYMENT FOR FACILITIES AND EQUIPMENT PROVIDED FOR CANADIAN ARMED FORCES BY OTHER NATO COUNTRIES

1. A separate memorandum deals with the future of Canadian "mutual aid" — i.e. the equipment and facilities provided by Canada for the use of other NATO forces. This paper deals with the provision by other NATO countries of equipment or facilities for the use of the Canadian armed forces.

2. This question may be dealt with in two parts. The first is provision of facilities for the integrated forces stationed in Europe, of which Canadian forces will form a part, and the second is the provision of actual equipment.

3. It would be quite unrealistic to expect that European countries will be shipping arms across the Atlantic to North America when Europe is in the front line of attack. Since all NATO countries are pooling their efforts in the common defence it becomes impossible to say which country benefits most when one country "gives" arms or the use of defence facilities to the troops of another. Canadian forces overseas may make use of facilities provided by other NATO countries; but these will for the most part be provided through a system of pooling, rather than in the form of direct "gifts" or "mutual aid" to Canada.

4. The NATO military commands, of which that under General Eisenhower will be much the most important, will have to make heavy expenditures on the Continent on central and regional headquarters, on military communications, on military air fields, on special transportation facilities, and the like — expenditures which have recently come to be known as "infrastructure" for the Forces.

5. While the proposal is that there will be pooling of the costs of some of these items among all NATO countries, France and Belgium and other countries where these facilities are erected, may well be expected to put up extra money for them because of their peacetime residual value. Canada will, of course, be expected to contribute to infrastructure on some basis yet to be agreed, but the Canadian contribution will be a very small part of the total.

6. Thus, although the concept of infrastructure and its financing has not yet been fully worked out, it seems likely that when Canadian armed forces go to the Continent some of their facilities will be provided through NATO (though never, of course, running costs such as pay and allowances, food, etc.). On the Continent, certain operational airfields, harbour facilities, intra-allied communication systems may be made available through infrastructure to Canadian armed forces. No question will arise about Canadian payment for these facilities apart from the Canadian contribution toward general NATO infrastructure, with the probable exception of some additional facilities which may be built for the exclusive use of Canadian forces.

7. Are the Canadian forces likely to obtain any equipment from Continental European countries? It seems unlikely that they will obtain much equipment from this source. Our forces will probably be stationed principally in Germany. All of Europe's production of arms is badly needed within Europe. Moreover, the Canadian forces are turning over to U.S.-type equipment and are likely to look to the United States rather than overseas for their needs.

8. If, nevertheless, small quantities of equipment, or parts or assemblies for it, are needed from Europe, it would seem advisable for Canada to pay for them, rather than accept them as gifts, even if they were offered. A strong case can be made out against accepting any "aid" from abroad. During World War II Canada was scrupulously careful to avoid any obligation to the United States which might result from accepting lend-lease aid. Canada kept purchases and sales of equipment of a cash basis with the United States; and equipment is more likely to be properly valued and used if it is paid for, rather than accepted as a gift. As for Canada's present relations with other NATO countries, statistical comparisons of the estimated financial and economic "burdens" of the various countries are already being prepared, and if Canada accepts "aid" from abroad its showing in such comparisons will be poorer. Further, the efforts that Canada is making will become blurred.

9. What has been said about paying for facilities and equipment obtained in Continental countries for Canadian forces applies in general in the case of the United Kingdom. It would seem that any equipment obtained from the United Kingdom should be paid for (except in the case of minor exchanges of equipment between the armed forces of the two countries). However, exceptional cases may arise in which the United Kingdom may be willing to provide some facilities and services. Canadian forces may make use of barracks, airfields, etc., which have been put up by the United Kingdom for their own defence, and which are not part of the NATO

"infrastructure". The United Kingdom may from time to time be willing to provide these without charge, and it would in general seem desirable to accept them. It is suggested, however, that Cabinet Defence Committee would wish to review each proposal of this sort on its own merits before it is accepted.

10. It is assumed that, as in the past, all transactions with the United States regarding equipment and use of facilities should as far as possible be conducted on a cash basis.[15]

SECRET Ottawa, April 16, 1951

CABINET DEFENCE COMMITTEE — APRIL 17 FUTURE CANADIAN MUTUAL AID POLICY

The principal intention of the attached paper[16] is to place our present position before Cabinet and seek guidance as to future intentions, particularly for the benefit of Mr. H.R. MacMillan, who will shortly be leaving for London to take up his position as Canadian Representative on the Defence Production Board. The fact is that the cupboard is almost bare. Mutual aid is running dry before a production programme has got more than well started, because the Canadian Army's programme of converting from U.K. to U.S. type equipment has been speeded up and extended so that most of the mutual aid appropriations have, in effect, gone to finance replacements of U.S. type equipment for the Canadian Army. The urgency of getting arms to Europe was great and the pricing policy can be justified by the precedent of the U.S. mutual aid programme which has taken replacement value as the yardstick for estimating the value of equipment given away, but it has, as you will see from a personal letter from Mr. Wilgress of April 7 to me, attached, led to some doubts being raised as to whether the equipment given away has been fairly evaluated (Mr. Wilgress' letter has, of course, not been circulated to Cabinet Defence Committee). In the circumstances, public statements about Canada being "the arsenal of democracy" should perhaps be soft-peddled unless the Government is going to extend the mutual aid programme. Certainly we may expect further pressure from our allies to make greater efforts and if money is easier to raise in Canada than men, an additional mutual aid programme may be one way of meeting this sort of pressure.

The policy recommendations of the Panel are contained on page 5 of the memorandum. They are not particularly inspiring; it was only after a good deal of argument, however, that we were able to make the paper as positive as it now is. The paper was originally drafted in the Department of Defence Production and presumably Mr. Howe will introduce the discussion under this item.

I. FUTURE POLICY REGARDING CANADIAN MUTUAL AID

1. The Minister of Trade and Commerce said that the Panel on Economic Aspects of Defence Questions had made a report on the question of future policy regarding Canadian mutual aid. Funds for mutual aid totalling $361,383,108 had been fully earmarked or committed for expenditure by the end of 1951-52 as follows: transfers of stocks of U.K.-type equipment — $272,596,944; aircrew training — $55,806,164; and aid from new production — $32,980,000. While there was no financial provision for any additional aid in 1951-52, it might prove necessary to consider production of F-86 airframes for the United Kingdom at a cost of $81 million over 2 years; the Standing Group might recommend additional NATO aircrew training in North America; and, in any case, between April 1, 1952 and March 31, 1955 an estimated $147.7 million would be required to complete the above approved aircrew training and production programmes.

Among several limiting factors relevant to the question of possible aid in excess of the $361 million already earmarked, were the considerations that Canadian production was now geared to a fairly sizeable defence programme; that, with an increasing U.S. dollar problem, any additional Canadian production might have to be devoted to earning U.S. dollars; and that the fiscal impact of the defence programme (including mutual aid) was such that the government had indicated that there would be difficulties in increasing the programme in 1951-52.

There were, however, other factors. As Canada had been on record since August, 1950, as planning appreciable contributions to NATO from its productive capacity, an indication of abandonment of this sort of policy for the future would come as a surprise to NATO countries. Canada had carried out as "mutual aid" what was primarily a major programme of conversion of its own army equipment, earmarking only 9% of relevant funds for aid from production. Again, the new NATO Defence Production Board would be likely to make proposals for further Canadian production assistance. It would, therefore, be difficult for Canadian representatives in NATO agencies simply to take the position that, as present Canadian mutual aid funds were earmarked, no further recommendations should be made to Canada for mutual aid.

In the circumstances, the Panel had recommended that Canadian representatives on NATO bodies be informed of the following points, inter alia:

(a) they should discourage proposals for additional Canadian mutual aid to be provided in 1951-52 — except in the case of the F-86 airframe project;

(b) they may indicate, when proposals for additional aid are made, that the government would consider proposals for the provision of such aid in 1952-53; that such proposals relating to production should be received soon; and that there may be cases in which the government will consider it necessary to attach some price to additional aid;

(c) they should indicate that production of replacement parts for U.K.-type equipment stocks transferred by Canada will not be generally available and that, for the present at least, Canada is not planning standby production capacity for such equipment;

(d) they may indicate that the government would provide facilities to NATO countries wishing to purchase additional equipment in Canada.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated.

2. The Secretary of State for External Affairs wondered what should be the next step in view of the fact that all mutual aid funds were earmarked, that requests might be received for F-86 airframe production for the United Kingdom, increased NATO aircrew training and other aid, and that funds would anyway be required in future years to continue the approved aircrew training and production programmes. Canadian representatives in NATO agencies would be in some difficulties in view of the fact that, while there had been statements that Canada would serve as an arsenal of democracy, only 9% of the aid programme was being devoted to aid from production.

3. The Minister of Finance said that, during 1951-52, any additional mutual aid would have to come out of the $1,875 million approved for expenditures on defence and mutual aid in that year. In subsequent years, there would presumably again be an overall ceiling, within which there would be funds for mutual aid. In the meantime, there was ample time to consider what proportion of a ceiling figure should be devoted to mutual aid in future years.

4. The Prime Minister said that Canadian representatives in NATO agencies should take the position that Canadian resources and mutual aid funds were committed up to the end of 1951-52; that this did not mean that Canada was abandoning a policy of aid, but rather that it had been willing to plan its aid programme right up to the end of the fiscal year now only beginning; that Canada would be willing to consider proposals for additional mutual aid in the light of conditions at the time they were received; and that additional aid expenditures in 1951-52 were most unlikely, although there might be some possibility of making re-adjustments within the approved financial ceiling.

5. The Chairman, Chiefs of Staff Committee said that the Chief of the Air Staff, with his opposite numbers from the United Kingdom, the United States and France, would shortly be attending meetings in Washington, at which the main topics of discussion would be increased aircraft production and aircrew training facilities. It would be helpful for Air Marshal Curtis to have an indication of the government's position on these two questions.

6. The Acting Chief of the Air Staff said that at these meetings the Chief of the Air Staff, R.A.F., might ask the Chief of Staff, U.S.A.F., to defer the build-up of some of his squadrons and thereby release engines and components, so that the R.A.F. might obtain F-86's under the proposed arrangement whereby Canada would produce F-86 airframes.

7. Mr. Howe thought that, in view of the discussions that had been held with the United Kingdom and United States authorities regarding Canadian production of 392 F-86 airframes for the United Kingdom, it would probably be desirable to find the funds to carry out this project if these countries could arrange to provide the necessary engines and components. Most of the expenditures involved would fall in 1952-53. Any cash required in 1951-52 would, of course, have to come out of the $1,875 million approved for expenditures on the defence and mutual aid programme for the year. Possibly some of the airframes being made for the R.C.A.F. could be given to the United Kingdom.

8. The Minister of National Defence, while agreeing that some part of the defence-mutual aid programme for 1951-52 might have to be deferred to permit initial expenditures on airframes for the United Kingdom, said that, in view of the importance of the build-up of the R.C.A.F., this deferment would have to take some form other than that of a transfer to the R.A.F. of airframes on order for the R.C.A.F.

It should be made clear that the resources of the R.C.A.F. were too heavily committed to permit acceptance of any proposals for additional NATO aircrew training in Canada in the near future, unless either (a) other countries were prepared to provide the manpower, equipment and other resources that would be required in Canada for such additional training, or (b) there was a corresponding reduction in some other part of the programme.

9. Mr. St-Laurent agreed that it should be indicated that the R.C.A.F.'s training facilities and funds were fully committed but that, if other countries wanted to provide the requirements of a larger training scheme in Canada, the government would be prepared to discuss the matter.

10. The Secretary to the Cabinet suggested that the problem of additional NATO aircrew training raised the question of the relative priorities that should be attached to the projects now contemplated in the defence-mutual aid programme as against such possible projects as additional NATO aircrew training. It might well be determined that it would be useful for Canada to undertake additional training and to defer some other portion of the programme. There should, therefore, perhaps be a readiness to consider proposals for alternative Canadian efforts.

11. Mr. St-Laurent said that, in view of this consideration, he thought that Air Marshal Curtis might indicate a willingness on the part of the government to examine proposals for additional air training, without implying any undertaking to accept such proposals.

12. Mr. Abbott said that purchases of army equipment in the United States would account for a large part of the increased U.S. dollar deficit expected in 1951-52. The U.S. dollar content of the defence-mutual aid programme for that year was likely to total some $350 million. While standardization on U.S.-type equipment was desirable, it was likely to mean a continuing drain on Canada's U.S. dollar resources since U.S. rather than Canadian production would continue to be the economical source for Canadian purchases of many items of U.S.-type equipment. There was therefore a need for substantially increased U.S. defence purchases in Canada.

13. Mr. Howe said that several U.S. defence orders were being placed in Canada and that there were grounds for hope that such orders would increase to the point of compensating for a substantial proportion of the U.S. dollar content of the Canadian defence-mutual aid programme.

14. The Committee, after further discussion:

(1) approved the draft instructions on Canadian policy regarding mutual aid, prepared by the Panel on Economic Aspects of Defence Questions, on the understanding that Canadian representatives on NATO agencies would be asked to bear in mind, in connection with instruction (a), that the government would not refuse to consider proposals for alternative forms of aid in 1951-52, or proposals for additional aid in 1951-52 which could be accommodated within the approved defence programme;

(2) agreed that, in his forthcoming discussions in Washington, the Chief of the Air Staff should indicate that

(a) resources and funds for the 1951-52 defence and mutual aid programme are now fully earmarked;

(b) the government would be prepared to consider proposals for the initiation in 1951-52 of production of F-86 aircraft for the United Kingdom, if the United States and the United Kingdom could arrange to provide the engines and other components (provided such plans could be fitted into the approved defence-mutual aid programme);

(c) it appeared most unlikely that Canada could undertake in the near future any NATO aircrew training beyond that now planned, unless either (a) other countries were prepared to provide the means required for such additional training, or (b) there was a corresponding reduction in some other part of the programme — although the government would not refuse to consider such proposals as might be put forward on this question.

CANADIAN DEFENCE PRODUCTION FOR NATO

Following for the Right Honourable C.D. Howe from MacMillan, Begins: For your general information, and subject to unforeseen opinions from other NAT countries, the position respecting Canadian defence production for NATO in main categories of military equipment seems to be:

(a) 155mm Howitzers

DPB is assessing genuine need. The United States delegation in commenting on DPB proposals for 155mm howitzers have said they concur in Canada producing United States types to help meet European deficiencies (DPB Sec. Memo 114 of April 26th, copy of which is being sent by airbag).† Acting under authority of your telegram No. 773 of May 5th,† we will accept board's recommendation for reference to you, if one is forthcoming. We hope to be able to report within a few days.

(b) F86 Airframes

We will await any instructions you may wish to give re raising question with the United Kingdom after Washington meeting of Air Chiefs.

(c) AA No. 4 Mark VI Radar

As soon as you confirm the allocation of 300 sets as recommended to you by the Standing Group (telegram CSC1430 from Secretary CSC Ottawa of April 12th refers)† we will notify Defence Production Board. Once the allocation is decided there will remain to be settled the apportionment of deliveries to recipients. Will this be done through Standing Group or Defence Production Board machinery? Purchase of additional sets is now under consideration by United Kingdom and answer is expected shortly. Value of and need for this item makes it suitable prospect for aid in 1952-1953 if you are interested. Further information on the radar position in NATO is expected to emerge from recent group of experts meeting which Colonel Waldock attended as Canadian representative. We shall report on this later.

(d) Walkie Talkies

Apparently there is considerable deficiency in several NAT countries for this item, for aid or perhaps some sale, but awaits demonstration and acceptance. Therefore, it is advisable to expedite clearance for demonstration. Canadian Joint Staff, London, are now working on this. After demonstration, if any countries need these sets we suggest that discussions re supply as aid or sale be discussed through this board in order to avoid confusion.

(e) Military Vehicles

Estimated deficiencies of continental European members of NATO are:

	DEFICIENCIES
Country	Jeeps	3/4-1 Ton Trucks	2½-3 Ton Trucks
Belgium	7290	5058	8371
Denmark	1123	941	499
France	50521	44982	77937
Italy	123	2183	16388
Luxembourg	185	361	330
Netherlands	9192	2852	10170
Norway	6061	4609	10073
	74495	62213	123768

There is idle capacity in Italy and France but various factors, such as financial limitations and type acceptability will probably cause delays in bringing these into use. Quite large quantities of United States vehicles have been given to Europe and spare parts supply is being arranged. Our three proposed types probably are suitable for military use in deficient countries, particularly if our spare parts are interchangeable. United States are expected to swing emphasis from end-item aid in this category to material and tool aid in order to help increase production in Europe. If you are interested these items might be suitable for future aid.

(f) Naval Craft

There is idle production capacity in Europe which could be utilized to meet their requirements of minesweepers and destroyer escorts, and DPB is at present investigating possibilities of expanding production. We are not aware if it might suit Canada to supply items in ship-building category, and if so, for what years of delivery. The question of utilizing Canadian productive capacity to meet deficiencies of European member countries might arise in the future, particularly if plans to utilize European capacity are not fulfilled.

2. In considering the question of additional and future mutual aid from military production to NAT countries we are assuming that the following conditions should apply:

(a) That aid should be in the form of fighting equipment.

(b) That United States dollar content should be at a minimum.

(c) That we should assist in meeting serious deficiencies in European member countries which cannot ordinarily be met from European production.

(d) That manufactured equipment should come from Canadian production lines set up to meet the needs of Canadian armed forces.

(e) That if possible, it is preferable that the product should be typically "Canadian".

(f) That Canadian aid should be coordinated with the end-item aid programme of the United States.

3. If Canada contemplates aid in the next or following fiscal years, we consider that in the field of military equipment, air craft, electronics, cargo vehicles, and possibly shipbuilding, come closer than others to meeting the conditions above. Should we concentrate our attention on these categories? In aircraft and electronics there are serious deficiencies and inadequate production capacity (for radar in the electronics field) in European member countries. In vehicles and shipbuilding there are serious deficiencies and also adequate ultimate capacities in European member countries but the capacities cannot be brought into production soon enough to meet the need within three years. As has been reported previously, the board is working now to step up production in Europe but there will be inevitable delays in setting up new production lines and capacities will not in all cases be fully utilized.

4. I have not mentioned guns because we do not yet see that need is critical excepting the howitzers now under consideration, and do not know if you are interested for the next two years.

5. Generally speaking, it appears unlikely that any NAT country will pay full cost or any substantial part of the cost of any items, the reason being the scarcity of dollars and the fact that the main limitation on their defence programmes is financial. The only possible exceptions are the United Kingdom and Belgium which, in our opinion, might make some payment for some special items.

6. I believe that the DPB are unlikely to recommend what Canada should do in the way of supplying end-item aid to other NAT countries, and that they are leaving it to us to make suggestions as to what we would be prepared to do. This gives us an opportunity to work out proposals which will fully or partially meet the conditions set out in para 2 above, and at the same time serve the Canadian interest.

7. I have learned with some surprise that the board is not kept informed of United States policies and plans for aid. Since this is the biggest factor in rearming Europe and stepping up European production, the work of the board is handicapped and is in a distinctly subsidiary position. Mr. Herod has, I think, impressed on the United States delegation the importance he attaches to the United States bringing their aid programme into closer relationship with the board and its functions.

8. The foregoing, if the opinions and conclusions are well founded, narrows the field and influences the policy of future aid. This message is sent as a preliminary and tentative assessment of the situation following upon study of the Cabinet Defence Committee's instructions to me. To accomplish the objective of the medium term defence plan deliveries within two years are more important than subsequent deliveries, on the assumption that European and American production should then be established. Before exploring further these possibilities we would appreciate your corrections, comments, or instructions. Ends.

Following for H.R. MacMillan from Right Honourable C.D. Howe, Begins: Your Telegram No. 1135 Canadian Defence Production for NATO.

Thank you for your helpful summary. Our present thinking with respect to the categories of equipment which you mention is as follows:

(a) 155 mm. Howitzers. We are awaiting the recommendation of the DPB concerning Canadian production.

(b) F86 Airframes. At the recent Washington meeting of the Chiefs of Air Staff a statement was made by the Canadian delegation that our airframe capacity could be built up to a monthly production rate of 120 by October 1953. The use of this airframe capacity for NATO is dependent upon suitable arrangements being made for financing extra production and upon the provision of GFP's including engines by the United States. A further meeting is being held in June with Eisenhower at Paris. We expect that this will result in an increased allocation of GFP's to Canada. However, the needs of the R.C.A.F. even in relation to anticipated increases in GFP's are such that no aircraft would be available for NATO in the current fiscal year. Any proposals for mutual aid with respect to 392 F86 airframes for the U.K. could be dealt with on the basis of existing policy, as laid down in the Cabinet Defence Committee Memorandum of April 11th. However, for any quantities in excess of this, the matter would have to be given entirely new consideration by Cabinet.

(c) AA No. 4 Mark VI Radar. A decision from Cabinet regarding the recommended allocation of 300 radar sets is expected shortly. Whilst we hold no very strong views our thinking here is that the Standing Group should apportion deliveries. However, before making any statement to this effect in the Defence Production Board we suggest you consult Wilgress. We are very much interested in producing additional sets for sale to the United Kingdom (see telegram 620 April 14th).† We await with interest the report on heavy AA radar requirements. Enquiries have been received from friendly non-NATO countries for these radars and replies are delayed pending examination of the report. With regard to the possibility of offering this item as mutual aid in 1952/53, so far we are only prepared to offer the 300, and as you are aware, this will involve some expenditures in 1952/53. However, if the DPB recommends that Canada supply more of this equipment in future years, we will of course give such recommendations full attention when considering any further aid programme.

(d) Walkie Talkies. We are tooling up for 50,000 sets and deliveries are expected to commence in March or April 1952. The first 5,000 are required by the Canadian Army. A statement regarding European requirements for this set together with your comments on the prospects for sale would be useful. The presently estimated cost is $300 per set but the figure may run considerably higher due to increasing costs. We agree that discussions leading up to a decision to produce the sets for aid purposes should be cleared through the Board. The distribution of the sets however, would be a matter to be handled by the Standing Group.

(e) Military Vehicles. The estimated American dollar content of the three types of vehicles is between 60 and 70%. On this account, together with the fact that the Transport Vehicles Task Force Report indicated that there was ample capacity in Europe, we do not think that military vehicles can be considered for future aid to Europe at this time. This holds as long as the production of military vehicles is on a small scale and is therefore largely an assembly proposition with only partial manufacture involved in Canada. If circumstances altered this, we would be prepared to take another look at production for Europe.

(f) Naval Craft. Are we correct in assuming that the DPB will come forward with a proposal that we produce up to 36 minesweepers and 1 destroyer escort (in accordance with the Task Force recommendations), once the Standing Group has clarified the status of the unassigned deficit in ships? A number of fundamental points are raised in such a proposal which would require interdepartmental clearance. However, we do not wish to initiate any study of the problems involved unless you can give us some indication that we are likely to be asked to produce these ships.

2. Naval Guns. You mention our possible interest in supplying guns other than the howitzers. Surplus Canadian productive capacity over and above present U.S. and Canadian naval requirements exists for the 3"50 caliber naval gun. We could offer up to 8 per month for sale to the U.K. or other interested NAT countries. If any expressions of interest are received we can supply further details.

3. In paragraphs (2), (3) and (6), you raise a number of points concerning the nature and scope of our future mutual aid programme, with which I am in general agreement. I am, however, asking the Panel on Economic Aspects of Defence Questions to examine these problems in more detail, and a fuller report will go forward to you shortly.

I. PRELIMINARY PROPOSALS FOR FILLING THE GAP IN NATO AIR FORCES FOR EUROPE

1. The Minister of National Defence recalled that General Eisenhower had suggested that the Chiefs of the Air Staffs of the United Kingdom, France, the United States and Canada consider and report on the additional national efforts that would be necessary to close the gap between air forces required in Europe by July, 1954 under the approved NATO Medium Term Defence Plan and those that member governments had so far undertaken to provide. In this connection, on April 17th, 1951, Cabinet Defence Committee had agreed that, in considering this question with the three other Air Chiefs, Air Marshal Curtis would indicate that, as resources and funds for the Canadian 1951-52 defence and mutual aid programme were fully earmarked, he was not authorized to make any commitments, although the government would be prepared to consider the longstanding proposal for Canadian production of 392 F86 airframes for the United Kingdom and would not refuse to consider such proposals for air training as might be put forward. The four Air Chiefs had met in Washington from April 30th to May 3rd and had produced a preliminary report on means of closing the gap. They would be meeting in Paris on June 6th to prepare a final report and discuss it with General Eisenhower.

In their preliminary report the Air Chiefs had agreed that NATO air forces in Europe comprising 9,212 first-line aircraft — already approved by NATO as the requirement under the Medium Term Defence Plan — were the absolute minimum required. Since the deficiency amounted to some 3,459 first-line aircraft, they considered that, without major changes in national policies, there was no possibility of producing the approved minimum forces. They had emphasized that, unless the necessary air support were provided, NATO land forces in Europe would be unable to fulfill their role; had pointed out that to operate the approved minimum air forces would involve a large organization of command structures, supply and maintenance units, fuel and ammunition supplies, airfields, depots and signals communications (the infrastructure requirements would be set down at the Paris meeting); and had indicated that the additional first-line aircraft and supporting units needed to close the gap would require an intake of an additional 10,810 pilots between July 1st, 1951 and June 30th, 1953, and the provision of at least an additional 2,410 training aircraft and 28,000 military personnel, together with corresponding schools. The additional pilots would probably have to undergo their combat training in operational squadrons owing to difficulties in producing sufficient first-line training aircraft. Their preliminary estimate was that the Canadian navigator training programme would be adequate to meet all requirements for navigators, if continued to the end of 1954.

As, during the Washington discussions, none of the Air Chiefs had offered to increase national commitments, Lieutenant-General Norstad, Commander-in-Chief, Central European Air Force, had tabled tentative proposals for a division of responsibilities between NATO countries for filling the gap, based on U.S. estimates of each country's productive and manpower capabilities and on a study made by the Joint American Military Advisory Group. These proposals, which envisaged increased responsibilities for all member countries except Luxembourg, Portugal and Iceland, had been accepted by the four Air Chiefs simply as a basis for study at the Paris meeting.

Acceptance of the Norstad proposals for filling the gap would entail for Canada:

(1) The allocation to the Integrated Force of 12 fighter squadrons with 300 first-line aircraft and 490 aircraft for reserve, etc.; of 12 light bomber squadrons with 192 first-line aircraft and 172 aircraft for reserve etc.; and of 1 long-range transport squadron with 16 North Stars, to be stationed in Canada — as against Canada's present commitment of 11 fighter squadrons with 203 front-line and 587 reserve aircraft;

(2) An intake of an additional 300 NATO student pilots in 1952-53 and an additional 1,000 in 1953-54 — the present commitment being an intake of 743 for each of these years;

(3) The production for NATO countries of 140 F86's in 1952; 450 F86's and 48 CF100's in 1953; 1,220 F86's and 58 CF100's in 1954; no fighter production except for the R.C.A.F. being presently approved;

(4) The production and/or procurement for the R.C.A.F. of:

(a) 364 light bombers, including 192 first-line bombers; no bombers being included in presently-approved plans; and

(b) 400 Harvard trainers, 217 T33 jet trainers and 16 long-range transports, all additional to those in presently-approved plans.

(5) The opening:

(a) by the autumn of 1952, of two additional basic flying training schools and 1 advanced school, these and already-approved Canadian schools training mainly Canadian pilots up to the end of 1952, with most of their intake capacity becoming available for additional NATO trainees in 1953;

(b) of one light-bomber operational training unit for Canadian aircrew, no bomber training units being presently approved.

(6) An increase of 14,120 in R.C.A.F. manpower requirements, bringing total R.C.A.F. requirements to 58,320, and necessitating maintenance of the present recruiting rate of 400 officers a month until April, 1953 (200 a month thereafter) and of the present rate of 1,000 airmen and women a month until April, 1954; 3,557 of the additional personnel required being employed initially in training Canadian and NATO aircrew;

(7) In addition to expenditures on presently-approved plans, R.C.A.F. expenditures of $272.79 million in 1952-53, $358.99 million in 1953-54 and $101.16 million in the three months ending June 30th, 1954, plus a share, as yet to be determined, of the infrastructure required by the R.C.A.F. squadrons in Europe. The Canadian Chiefs of Staff had considered the implications of these proposals for increased Canadian air contributions and had agreed that, as there were also gaps to be filled in the NATO ground and sea forces, and present information as to costs — particularly those of infrastructure — was inadequate, it was impossible to make recommendations regarding the proposals at this time.

It was desirable to consider what position Air Marshal Curtis might take at the Paris meeting.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated.

(Minister's memorandum, May 25, 1951, "Acceleration of NATO Air Force Programmes", and annex (12 pages) — Cabinet Document D284)†

2. The Chief of the Air Staff said that during the Washington meeting it had become apparent that most of the additional air training facilities required by European NATO members should be provided in North America. Training in Morocco could only be built up to an intake of 450 by 1953. The R.A.F. was having to build additional flying schools in the United Kingdom, Northern Ireland and Rhodesia, despite the fact that training in these areas presented serious difficulties and that most training units in the United Kingdom and Northern Ireland would have to be moved to North America in the event of a war.

The U.S. authorities counted on having to supply the majority of the 725 additional first-line aircraft which, under the preliminary Norstad proposals, would be manned by NATO countries other than those represented at the Washington meeting, as well as many of the 1,137 additional first-line aircraft which France would man under these proposals. The United States would also have to provide training facilities for an additional 2,060 NATO aircrew in the year ending June 30th, 1952 and for an additional 6,050 in the year ending June 30th, 1953, as against their present commitment of 900 for each of these years.

3. Mr. Claxton said that one of the most serious obstacles to increased R.C.A.F. efforts would be the difficulty of obtaining sufficient trained technicians and training personnel, of whom there were already shortages in connection with the approved programme of trebling the R.C.A.F. The manpower implications of the Norstad proposals were serious since they would entail maintenance of a total of some 14,000 R.C.A.F. personnel overseas in addition to a brigade group.

It had been indicated at the Washington meeting that the R.A.F. and U.S.A.F. were hoping that Canada would produce F86 airframes for the United Kingdom as originally proposed, although at a later date. As the defence budget for 1951-52 was now fully committed, it appeared improbable that any of these airframes could be produced during the current fiscal year even if U.S. components became available during that period. Only a minor increase in Canada's NATO aircrew training programme could be accomplished within the presently-approved defence programme.

As Canada was devoting approximately 48% of its defence budget — a greater proportion than that of any other NATO country — to the Air Force, it was difficult to see how it could undertake additional air commitments for 1951-52 — at least unless more funds were provided.

4. The Chairman, Chiefs of Staff Committee said that the Chiefs of Staff considered that there could be no changes or deferments in the various elements of the presently-approved defence programme, in view of financial and manpower limitations and as the programme represented commitments made to NATO.

As there was a serious gap in NATO land forces and a not insignificant gap in naval forces, which would have to be considered in due course, the question of filling the air gap could be more usefully examined when, later in the summer, the Standing Group made recommendations, which it was now preparing, on the overall problem. A difficulty that might arise if the four Air Chiefs submitted a solution for filling the air gap to General Eisenhower was that he was likely to accept the proposals and it might then be difficult for Canada not to comply with them. The machinery that had been established for consideration of such matters was consultation by the Standing Group with the Military Representatives Committee in Washington.

The U.S. authorities seemed to be delaying offers to contribute towards closing the gap in the hope that other countries would offer substantial contributions. Under the Norstad proposals, for instance, the United States would provide only an additional 396 manned first-line aircraft, while Canada would be expected to provide an additional 289.

5. The Secretary of State for External Affairs considered the Standing Group the competent authority to prepare recommendations of the type in question and thought that consideration of possible contributions to close the air gap should be deferred pending examination of the Standing Group's recommendations later in the summer.

6. Air Marshal Curtis said that General Eisenhower had wanted the current study to be made by the Standing Group. It had, however, been felt desirable to have a representative of the one non-Standing Group country that had significant potentialities on the air side participate in the study and that the Standing Group could not invite such Canadian participation without also inviting representatives of NATO countries which were of far less importance on the air side. It appeared to the right and duty of the Supreme Commander, under his terms of reference, to make recommendations to the Standing Group with regard to his force requirements, and to be in order for him to ask the four Air Chiefs to make a report in this connection. The reason why the study had been undertaken in this way was that General Eisenhower had become very concerned at the failure of the Standing Group to date to produce any recommendations on means of closing the gap in air forces.

The Norstad proposals would entail little, if any, additional expenditure before 1952-53 and under them most of the R.C.A.F. programme would only reach its peak in 1954.

It appeared that the reason why the United States was holding back offers of increased contributions was that it was afraid that, otherwise, the other NATO countries would leave it to the United States to make good most of the gap.

7. The Secretary to the Cabinet pointed out that, having complained at not being consulted in the preparation of the Medium Term Plan force requirements, Canada would be in an awkward position in objecting to being asked to participate in preliminary discussions of means of closing the air gap.

8. The Prime Minister thought the main problem that would arise from an additional contribution of the scope envisaged by General Norstad would be that of implementation. It had previously been agreed that, in approving the defence programme for 1951-52, Canadian resources were being stretched as far as possible under present conditions. Again, it would be some time before there would be sufficient infrastructure available in Europe for the expanded air forces envisaged by General Norstad.

9. The Minister of Defence Production thought that Air Marshal Curtis should indicate in Paris that the Canadian defence programme was frozen for a year, after which Canada would consider what it was in a position to do. He did not see how the country would be able to increase its contribution on the industrial side in the meantime. If there were new shifts in emphasis in the defence programme, considerably less would be accomplished in 1951-52 than originally planned.

10. The Minister of Finance said that, if Canada were to order an increased number of U.S. aeroengines, the exchange problem, which was serious, would be further aggravated. This was a consideration that had to be borne in mind in connection with any proposals for an increased Canadian military effort.

11. Mr. Robertson suggested that the fact that General Norstad had proposed doubling the air component of the Canadian contribution to the Integrated Force introduced an important new consideration, making it desirable to review the question of the forms that Canada's overall contribution should take. It might therefore be well to take the position that Canada would be prepared to examine proposals for an increased air contribution, provided its land and sea contributions were similarly open to review.

The Standing Group was likely to propose that Canada increase its Army contribution to the Integrated Force from one-third of a division to one division. Such a course, he felt, was more likely to impose severe strains on the system of voluntary recruitment than some increase in air contributions, especially if the 25th Infantry Brigade continued to be committed to Korea for some time.

12. Mr. Pearson pointed out that there was some danger of the report of the Paris meeting and of Canada's association with it being made public. There was also the difficulty that the report would suggest increased allocations for several countries which had not participated in its preparation and, at the same time, increased allocations for Canada which the government was not prepared to support. In the circumstances, it appeared undesirable for Air Marshal Curtis to sign the Paris report since his association with it would merely serve to further identify Canada with the current study. Moreover, he should presumably not allow the Paris meeting to have any illusions as to Canada's ability to accept an allocation of the size suggested by General Norstad.

13. Mr. St-Laurent, while pointing out that it would be difficult for Air Marshal Curtis not to attend the Paris meeting, agreed that he should indicate that no additional commitments could be undertaken in 1951-52 — assuming that Canada was not relieved of any of its present commitments. It should also be indicated that the government considered that the Canadian defence effort was as large a one as the country would support, short of a situation requiring an all-out effort, and that it would not be prepared to consider increased commitments for the period after 1951-52, at least until the recommendations of the Standing Group were put forward.

14. The Committee considered that it would have been preferable for the examination of the position of the air forces to have been made by the Standing Group after consultation with the Military Representatives Committee, taking into account not only the position of the air forces but also that of land and sea forces, but that, since he had attended the Washington meeting, which had been adjourned, the Chief of the Air Staff should attend the Paris meeting.

15. The Committee, after considerable further discussion regarding the position to be taken by Air Marshal Curtis at the Paris meeting, agreed that:

(a) he should indicate that the Canadian government was not able to accept additional overall defence commitments for 1951-52, and could not at present consider additional commitments for subsequent years pending further experience regarding Canada's ability to carry out the already substantial programme on which it was now embarked, and re-examination of the position of land and sea as well as air forces;

(b) he could, within the authorized financial and manpower programme, explore the possibility of making adjustments within the existing programme in the sense recommended at the preliminary meeting of the four Chiefs of Air Staff; and

(c) as Canada was not a member of the Standing Group, it would not be proper for him to participate in any report or recommendations involving increased contributions by other countries.

NATO; AIR FORCES FOR EUROPE; REVIEW OF PROPOSALS FOR FILLING THE GAP; CANADIAN POSITION

16. The Minister of National Defence recalled that Cabinet, on May 30th, 1951, had approved the decision of the Cabinet Defence Committee as to the position to be taken by the Chief of the Air Staff in reviewing, at a forthcoming meeting in Paris, a draft report to General Eisenhower on means of closing the gap in air contributions to the European Integrated Force. He proposed taking immediate action to inform Air Marshal Curtis of these instructions. Further, as a result of subsequent discussions in his department, it was considered that it would be desirable and consistent with the approved instructions to have Air Marshal Curtis explore, during the Paris meeting, the feasibility, within the agreed manpower and financial ceilings, of the Canadian squadrons assigned to the Integrated Force being of one type and of the R.C.A.F. producing what would appear to be a larger air contribution by reducing the reserves originally planned for each squadron.

17. The Cabinet noted with approval the report of the Minister of National Defence on the instructions he proposed to send to the Chief of the Air Staff as to the position to be taken, during the current meeting in Paris with certain other Chiefs of Staff, in reviewing proposals for increased air contributions to the Integrated Force.

CONSIDERATION OF THE PARIS PLAN AND THE RELATED REPLY TO GENERAL EISENHOWER'S MESSAGE OF 15 JUNE, 1951†

1. D.C. 28, Medium Term Plan Force Requirements, was prepared by the Standing Group on the basis of an analysis of the Revised Regional Medium Term Plans.† The total requirements in D.C. 28 were considered by the Standing Group as likely to prove the minimum necessary to permit the accomplishment of Regional Tasks outlined in D.C. 13, North Atlantic Treaty Organization Medium Term Plan. The Standing Group considered that the national force contributions in D.C. 28 represented first, urgent interim national targets of the NATO nations towards meeting the total requirements. There remains a force deficiency or "gap" in D.C. 28 between the recommended national force contributions and the total requirements.

2. In approving D.C. 28 on 28 October, 1950, the Defence Committee inter alia directed the Standing Group "to report what contributions they consider governments should make to close these gaps. Member nations and the Supreme Commander should supply the information upon which to base these recommendations". (Vide Appendix "A" — Defence Committee and North Atlantic Council Approval of D.C.28)†

3. Subsequently the Standing Group requested the Supreme Allied Commander Europe to supply the Standing Group, within the framework of his terms of reference, with such information, any comments and/or recommendations as he considered might be helpful to the Standing Group on the ways and means of closing the gap in D.C. 28.

4. In his reply to the Standing Group, General Eisenhower recommended that national governments individually should seek to isolate and identify the primary obstacles to further progress in increasing their respective force contributions for filling the gap, and thereafter collective efforts be devoted towards the removal of such obstacles.

5. Arising out of these recommendations and at the request of the Standing Group for all nations to comply with General Eisenhower's suggestions, the Chiefs of Staff examined the individual service programmes to determine:

(a) if any further expansion (over and above the 1951-54 programmes as they now stand) is possible;

(b) if so, to what extent and by when; and

(c) in any event, what are the primary obstacles and limiting factors to further expansion.

This examination by the Chiefs of Staff and their subsequent discussions with me resulted in the despatch of special instructions to the Chairman, Canadian Joint Staff, Washington, giving the Canadian position on closing the gap. A copy of this message is attached as Appendix "B".

6. Additionally at the suggestion of General Eisenhower, the Chiefs of Air Staff of Canada, France, the United Kingdom and the United States met in Washington from 30 April to 3 May to determine whether D.C. 28 air force requirements could be met and to consider what acceleration was required in national programmes to close the gap by 1954. The conclusions arising from this meeting, together with the implications for Canada therefrom, were considered by Cabinet Defence Committee 29 May, as a result of which instructions were given to the Chief of the Air Staff regarding the position he was to take at the further meeting of the four Chiefs of Air Staff in Paris which commenced 7 June.

7. The conclusions of the Paris meeting, which are contained in the report entitled the "Paris Plan", reach substantially the same conclusions as the preliminary study made in Washington, now known as the "Pentagon Plan". The main Washington conclusions were as follows:

"(a) it is clear that a balanced Air Force in Europe, of 9,212 front-line aircraft, is impossible before December, 1954, but that a possibility exists of meeting the front-line figure if reserves are largely depleted and all NATO production facilities are utilized to the maximum possible extent. Strenuous efforts involving changes in national policies of manpower allotment, production and finance, are essential if bottlenecks are to be alleviated.

"(b) Unless training facilities are expanded and filled immediately, with pilot trainees in particular; unless aircraft production orders are placed now, with machine tools and raw materials supplied as required; unless air installation sites be built or extended on the Continent and made available now; we see no possibility of achieving the minimum goal of 9,212 manned aircraft at any date near December, 1954."

8. The "Paris Plan", which deals with the air force gap in Europe, proposes the following insofar as Canada is concerned:

(a) The allocation to the Integrated Force of a division of 12 fighter squadrons of 300 front-line aircraft and a division of 12 light bomber squadrons of 192 front-line aircraft. The F86 requirements outside Europe would include 297 aircraft for operational training, squadron build-up in Canada and attrition for the period 1951-54. To this would be added the Integrated Force requirements of 800 aircraft as contained in the "Paris Plan", which would bring the overall F86 requirements to a total of 1,097 aircraft. This would include a 100% war reserve of 300 aircraft which the "Paris Plan" does not require to be provided until after 1954. Under this concept, the current procurement of 790 F86's is sufficient until 1954. On the same basis the procurement of light bombers would be 514 less 192 (war reserve) or a total of 322 until 1954.

(b) The production for NATO countries of additional F86 airframes up to Canadian capacity, estimated to be about 1,800, in addition to the aircraft mentioned in (a).

(c) The establishment and operation:

(1) by 1 September, 1951, of two additional basic flying training schools, and by 1 September, 1952, of 1 advanced school, to train 300 additional NATO aircrew in 1952, and 1,000 additional NATO aircrew in 1953 over and above the presently planned trained output of 1,400 per year, and

(2) of one light-bomber operational training unit in 1952.

9. The above proposals will involve:

(a) The production and/or procurement of 322 light bombers, 400 Harvard trainers, 217—T33 jet trainers and 16 long-range transports additional to those in currently-approved plans.

(b) The acquisition of eight airfields, three air depot sites, three headquarters sites and one hospital site in Europe.

(c) An increase in the RCAF of 7,638 overseas, 5,482 (this figure includes support personnel for both operational commitment in Europe and additional training commitment in Canada) home forces and 1,000 for training, totalling 14,120, bringing the total RCAF establishment to 58,320 (of this number 13,316 overseas) and necessitating maintenance of the present recruiting rate until April, 1954.

(d) In addition to expenditures on currently-approved plans, RCAF expenditure of $305 million in 1952-53, $409 million in 1953-54 and $197 million to December, 1954, including a share of the infrastructure required by the RCAF squadrons in Europe. The above figures do not include the cost of production of F86 airframes for other NATO countries.

A summary of the "Paris Plan" and its financial implications are attached as Appendices "C"† and "D",† respectively.

10. General Eisenhower has received the "Paris Plan" and has requested the following information from Canada, as well as from other nations, by 2 July, 1951, before deciding what action he will take with regard to the "Paris Plan":

"(a) What major obstacles will have to be overcome by individual nations in order to enable them to meet the suggested targets set out in the "Paris Plan" and its appendices. The major obstacles listed should relate only to the provision of air forces. The obstacles should be grouped under the headings enumerated in the index to the "Paris Plan" on page 1.

"(b) Will the attainment of these targets within the time stated have a major effect on the attainment of army and navy commitments as set out in DC 28."

The complete text of General Eisenhower's letter is attached as Appendix "E".†

11. The Department of Defence Production has considered the aircraft production aspect of the "Paris Plan" and has indicated that, while it has not been possible in the time available to base their comments on detailed production studies, including a full examination of the problems of raw materials, labour, machine tools, etc., it is fully anticipated (with the possible exception of the Canberra light bomber) the aircraft production targets could be met provided that an adequate supply of GFP could be made available.

12. The Chiefs of Staff have further considered the questions mentioned above in paragraph 5 in relation to the "Paris Plan" and the reply to General Eisenhower, all of which are concerned with closing the gap. They have concluded that the air force gap should not be examined in isolation but should be considered in relation to deficiencies which concurrently exist in land and sea force contributions, and accordingly recommend that a decision concerning the "Paris Plan" be deferred pending the completion of the Standing Group examination and assessment of national force contributions required to fill the gap in navy, army and air forces. The detailed conclusions and recommendations of the Chiefs of Staff on the above matters are attached as Appendix "F".†

[APPENDICE B/APPENDIX B]

Le secrétaire du Comité des chefs d'état-major au président de l'état-major du Canada aux États-Unis

Secretary, Chiefs of Staff Committee, to Chairman, Canadian Joint Staff in United States

TOP SECRET [n.d.]

I refer to CJS(W) 584 concerning new approach by Standing Group in closing the gap. The following Canadian view of this problem is for use in verbal discussion by our representative on MRC working group. It is not to be tabled as a paper.

2. In considering the general position of Canada there is a very important point to be made. The meeting of the NATO Council and Defence Committee at which instructions were given that enquiries be instigated with a view to measures that might be taken to close the gap took place at Brussels on 19 December 1950.

3. The October meeting had recommended that nations proceed immediately to increase their national forces with the object of meeting the national force targets as rapidly as possible.

4. At the Brussels meeting it was agreed that nations should at once re-examine their plans to see what more each one of them could do.

5. Acting in accordance with these recommendations, the government of Canada re-examined its defence programme. Such re-examination began on the return of the Minister of Defence from Brussels in December and continued until the new programme was announced by him in Parliament on 5 February, 1951.

6. The extent of the changes made in the Canadian programme between the Brussels meeting and that announced on 5 February is believed to be proportionately greater than that made by any other nation during the corresponding period. The defence appropriations made for the fiscal year 1950-51 were $425 millions. At the special session of Parliament held in August the defence appropriations were increased by $145,200,000, and in addition $300 millions was provided for mutual aid, of which relatively little would be spent in 1950-51. The programme put forward on 5 February called for an expenditure of $5 billions in three years, and with the unexpended portion of the vote for mutual aid and other sums voted for defence purposes made available for defence this year the sum of $1,879,000,000. This is $134.27 per capita, 47.5% of the national budget, 11.67% of the national income and 9.4% of the national product. On any basis of comparison this is believed to constitute a larger expenditure than any participant in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization except the United States.

7. The increase in the appropriation was intended to provide for an acceleration of our programme for the defence of Canada and the provision of Navy, Army and Air Force units for NATO as well as to maintain whatever forces were needed to carry out our undertakings in Korea. There was, however, a very substantial addition made to the programme of direct contributions to NATO itself in the offer of additional facilities to train an additional 1,100 aircrew per year, bringing the total to be trained for NATO and the United Kingdom to some 1,400 per year, with 1,900 for ourselves.

8. There are, however, additional factors of a general character which should be known in order to understand the position of Canada.

9. With full employment, a shortage of agricultural workers and an expected shortage of men in defence industries, it would become increasingly difficult to justify to the Canadian people our recruiting boys off the farms to send them to build up the forces in western Europe at the same time as we are bringing out displaced persons from Europe to provide labour on those very same farms.

10. In the case of the other smaller nations, virtually every cent of defence expenditure, every man and piece of equipment employed, every bit of construction, meets the double purpose of building up the defences of the country against direct attack and contributing to the forces of NATO. Canada is the only smaller country in the position of having to face the necessity of devoting a considerable proportion of her total defence effort to immediate defence and, in addition, having a separate force in Korea, 7,000 miles away from our west coast, and another force in Europe 2,000 miles away from our east coast, with the coasts themselves 3,000 miles apart.

11. To maintain the third largest UN force in Korea, a brigade group and eleven squadrons in Europe, and to build up a force of 100 ships, as well as to carry out the other activities for the immediate defence of Canada and the build-up of our maximum potential, is a large undertaking for a country of 14,000,000 people.

12. Regarding particularly the Air Force, the government felt than an air division of eleven squadrons with two hundred and three front-line aircraft would be as much as we could undertake. It was estimated that this would require seven hundred and ninety aircraft to provide for necessary reserves and over five thousand air force personnel overseas. In addition to 19 squadrons and extensive radar installations for the Canada-US Regional Planning Group, there were possible requirements for infrastructure — airfields, accommodation, ground control, etc., in Europe. To meet this and provide for the defence of Canada and the training programme will require a total of 3,300 new aircraft and some 44,000 personnel in the RCAF, the strength of which will have to be doubled within the years 1950-53.

13. It may be remarked that over and above the NATO force tabs, Canada has shipped the equipment for two divisions and agreed to make available the equipment for a third. We are also making considerable quantities of new equipment. Three hundred and sixty million dollars has been appropriated for mutual aid.

14. Canada is willing to consider any and every proposal by which we can with others build up our combined strength. For this year, 1951-52, the defence programme approved by the Cabinet was prepared to meet NATO force tabs as these had been indicated in DC-28. All action necessary to put this plan into effect has been taken. Construction has been planned and commenced, equipment orders placed, recruitment and training of manpower undertaken. Consequently, any changes proposed in objectives would have to take into account the fact that we are already well advanced in working out this programme, which it is believed can be carried out by or before 1954 within the limits of the five billion dollars announced by the government to meet the three years' programme. But, of course, any suggestions of modifications within the programme would be considered.

PRIMARY OBSTACLES AND LIMITATIONS TO INCREASED FORCE CONTRIBUTIONS

(a) Trained Manpower

15. The expansion of the Canadian armed forces from the strengths of Navy 9,248, Army 20,368 and Air Force 17,284 in July, 1950, to their present strengths of Navy 11,970, Army 42,555 and Air Force 24,668 has already resulted in increasing the size of the forces sixty per cent. This large percentage expansion has produced shortages of trained and experienced officers and very considerable deficits in technically qualified NCO's and tradesmen. Until schools can be expanded and many more instructional staff trained, an increased rate in the expansion of the Canadian Army, Navy and Air Force is not possible.

(b) Financial Limitations

16. Canadian defence orders placed in the US during the fiscal year 1950-51 amounted to $128,327,300, while US defence orders placed in Canada during the same period amounted to only $35,258,189. The Canadian orders placed in the US were largely for aircraft engines and ancillary equipment and for divisional equipment to replace UK-type army equipment being provided as mutual aid. In April of this year Canada placed defence orders in the US to the amount of $126,049,436, and the US placed defence orders in Canada to the amount of $40,055,767. An estimated annual expenditure of over $300,000,000 on military equipment or components required from the US is creating a serious and increasing deficit in US funds. The US is unlikely to spend anything like a corresponding amount in Canada. If the US were to spend $100,000,000 on defence expenditures in Canada in 1951 (probably an outside figure), we would be spending $22.00 on defence equipment in the US for each head of the Canadian population while the US would be spending in Canada $0.66 per head of the US population, or proportionately about 1/33. If the adverse balance of trade between Canada and the US continues at the present rate there is a serious possibility that we will have difficulty in implementing the present accepted programme.

(c) United Nations Operations in Korea

17. The Canadian contributions to the UN ground forces in Korea consist of one Brigade Group of approximately 7,400 men. A further force of 6,000 men is being raised and trained to provide for rotation and replacements of casualties occurring in this Brigade Group. Wastage rates have been calculated on the basis of 500 men per month although the accuracy of this figure cannot be assessed until the force has been engaged in operations for some months. This commitment in Korea amounts to the employment of 13,000 men for this year. Whatever the future of the fighting in Korea, it will be necessary for the Canadian forces to be maintained at strength and at a high degree of efficiency and this will require constant replacement of trained officers, NCO's and tradesmen. The effects of this have already been felt in raising the required numbers to permit the force to be committed to operations.

18. Since July, 1950, a heavy transport squadron of twelve North Stars has been serving on the Korean airlift in support of the United Nations. The Navy maintains three destroyers (ocean escorts) in Korean waters, and it has been necessary to allocate five ships in rotation for this duty.

POSITION OF THE ARMED FORCES IN THE PROBLEM OF FILLING THE GAP

(a) Navy

19. Canadian naval rearmament plans already entail doubling the manpower of the RCN in three years which, if the present standard of efficiency is to be maintained, is considered to be an extremely rapid expansion.

20. Not only does this provide for a commitment of looking after our own coast and seaward defences and escorting all merchant shipping in Canadian coastal waters, but also in the case of NAOR, taking care of ten per cent of the defensive protection of trans-Atlantic convoys.

21. The programme calls for a total of about 100 ships to be built or refitted and rearmed by 1954. It will stretch the capacity of industry to meet this programme. It is further noted that the completion by 1955 of an additional 7 destroyer escorts is also being undertaken. While these ships do not constitute an increase in the Canadian NATO contributions, they will be used to replace obsolescent vessels which will in turn be invaluable for operational training purposes.

22. Training is already approaching an all-out effort within existing training of establishments. Serious limiting factors in the expansion of personnel over and above the current programme are the critical shortages of both officers and technical ratings.

23. In view of the very considerable Canadian naval effort outlined above, expansion beyond the 1951-54 programme as it now stands does not appear to be feasible at the present time.

(b) Army

24. In addition to the Korean force and its replacements, Canada, under DC 28, will provide one-third of an infantry division (1 infantry brigade group) to the Integrated Force in Europe by 1954. We expect that this will be done by 1951 or early in 1952 at latest. This brigade group, together with sufficient men to provide replacements for non-battle wastage and rotation, involving a commitment of some 10,000 men, is now being raised. Approval by Parliament has yet to be obtained for the despatch of the force to Europe but this is considered to be a question of time as this is declared government policy.

25. On mobilization, two infantry divisions are earmarked for assignment to SHAPE, one at D plus 90 and the other at D plus 180, although neither of these will be available for operations until after D plus 360.

26. Plans for the defence of the Canada-US region include an Army commitment by 1954 of three infantry battalion groups for airborne operations, four composite AA batteries, 18 heavy AA regiments plus 1 heavy AA battery and 10 light AA regiments.

27. The expansion in the Army as a result of these commitments has placed a heavy strain on available resources of trained officers, NCO's and tradesmen. Further expansion does not appear to be feasible at the present time.

(c) Air Force

28. The problem of additional Canadian contributions towards closing the NATO gap in Air Forces has been under recent active consideration in meetings of the four Chiefs of Air Staff in Washington and Paris. The Cabinet Defence Committee, after discussing the Washington proposals, which were identical to those made in Paris, concluded, when considering the position to be taken by Air Marshal Curtis at the Paris meeting, that:

> "(a) he should indicate that the Canadian government was not able to accept additional overall defence commitments for 1951-52, and could not at present consider additional commitments for subsequent years pending further experience regarding Canada's ability to carry out the already substantial programme on which it was now embarked, and re-examination of the position of land and sea as well as air forces; and
> (b) he could, within the authorized financial and manpower programme, explore the possibility of making adjustments within the existing programme in the sense recommended at the preliminary meeting of the four Chiefs of Air Staff."

Projet d'une réponse du ministre de la Défense nationale au commandant suprême des Forces alliées en Europe

THE ACCELERATION OF NATO AIR FORCES PROGRAMMES

1. Following for the Supreme Allied Commander Europe from the Minister of National Defence for Canada, begins.

2. 30 June 1951. Your letter 15 June 1951, Report by the Chiefs of Air Staff of USA, United Kingdom and France, on the Acceleration of NATO Air Forces Programmes.

3. In addition to the questions raised in your letter on the Acceleration of NATO Air Force Programmes, the Canadian Government also has under consideration the whole current Canadian defence programme as a result of your suggestion to the Standing Group that national governments individually should seek to isolate and identify the primary obstacles to further progress in increasing their respective force contributions for filling the gap.

4. At the outset it may be noted that Canada is the only smaller country in the position of having to face the necessity of devoting a considerable proportion of her total defence effort to immediate defence at home and, in addition, having a separate force in Korea, and another force in Europe. In the case of the other smaller nations, virtually their entire defence effort serves the double purpose of building up the defences of the country against direct attack and contributing to the forces of NATO.

5. It is our opinion that the problem of closing the air forces gap cannot reasonably be considered except in relation to the similar problems in NATO sea and land forces. With this in mind we have already forwarded to our representative on the Military Representatives Committee in Washington our preliminary views on the Canadian position towards closing the gap in sea, land and air forces, which views we feel we should mention here in dealing with the air forces problem.

6. Examination of the current Canadian defence programme shows the position of the Canadian armed forces to be:

Navy

7. The Canadian Naval re-armament plans already entail doubling the manpower of the RCN in three years. If the present standard of efficiency is to be maintained, a more rapid expansion is not considered advisable.

8. This programme will provide for the protection of our own coastal waters and harbours and escorting all merchant shipping in Canadian coastal waters, and also in respect of NAORG assuming responsibility for ten percent of the defensive protection of trans-atlantic convoys.

9. The programme calls for a total of about 100 ships to be built or refitted and rearmed by 1954. Although there is adequate hull capacity in Canadian shipyards, the provision of electronics and ships machinery will strain these industries to meet the programme.

10. Our naval training establishments are already operating at top capacity. Serious limiting factors in the expansion of personnel over and above the current programme are the critical shortages of both officers and technical ratings.

Army

11. In addition to the Korean Force and its replacements, Canada, under DC 28, will provide one-third of an Infantry Division (1 Infantry Brigade Group) to the Integrated Force in Europe by 1954. We expect that this will be done in late 1951 or early in 1952. This Brigade Group, together with sufficient men to provide replacements for non-battle wastage and rotation, involving a total of some ten thousand men, is now being raised.

12. A further airborne group of three airborne battalions is required along with an appropriate air force component for the immediate defence of the Canada/U.S. region, as well as substantial AA units.

13. The expansion in the Army to meet these requirements has placed a heavy strain on available resources of trained officers, NCO's and tradesmen. Further expansion superimposed on top of a change-over from British to United States pattern arms and equipment does not appear to be feasible at the present time.

Air Force

14. The currently authorized Royal Canadian Air Force programme in support of NATO totals 40 squadrons of all types. Of these, one day-fighter air division of 11 squadrons comprising 203 front line aircraft has been committed to SHAPE. In addition, the Canadian air force programme includes:

(a) the building and manning of extensive radar installations in Canada, and,

(b) the training annually of some 1400 aircrew for other NATO nations together with 1900 for ourselves.

This requires an increase in RCAF manpower from 17,284 in July 1950 to more than 44,000 — an expansion of over 250% — very extensive construction of airfields, schools, depots, communications and other infrastructure both at home and in Europe, and the production or procurement of 3,300 new aircraft.

15. The ability of Canada to undertake an increased commitment for the RCAF is tempered by at least three inter-related major obstacles together with a number of lesser ones. These three major obstacles are:

(a) The difficulty of Canada obtaining an increased supply of government furnished property (aircraft engines, instruments, etc.) from United States sources in order to meet heavily increased aircraft production called for in the Paris Plan.

(b) Financial difficulties caused by the present adverse balance of trade between Canada and the United States which is currently giving rise to serious strains in implementing the present accepted programme. In this connection the limitations on United States military purchases in Canada is in itself an obstacle to any satisfactory balance being attained.

(c) The difficulty of persuading the people of Canada to accept a higher degree of mobilization at this time than results from the present programme which will call for an expenditure in excess of $5 billion in the next three years when related to the defence expenditures of other smaller countries which are more liable to direct attack.

16. The above considerations are governing in examination of the suggestions in the Paris Plan for increased aircraft production for front line use by other NATO nations; for increases in Canadian front line forces abroad, particularly those involving a new undertaking to procure or produce and to operate a light bomber division; and for the increased aircraft production that would be necessary for increased training of aircrew of our own and other NATO countries.

17. The measures which would be needed to overcome these obstacles in any Canadian effort to meet the Paris Plan would have a direct and serious bearing on Canadian ability to attain the Canadian Naval and Army commitments as set out in DC 28. They would necessarily have a direct impact on the availability of funds for the present Canadian Naval and Army programmes, and would seem certain to affect the availability of trained manpower for two Navy and Army at least, and quite possibly for Canadian defence industry.

18. It is therefore the opinion of the Canadian government that ways and means of closing the air force gap, at least insofar as Canada is concerned, cannot usefully be considered in isolation but should be examined in relation to the problem of deficiencies which concurrently exist in land and sea force contributions.

19. The Canadian government considers that a decision concerning the Paris Plan must be deferred pending completion of the Standing Group examination of national force contributions required to fill the gap between the totals of national Navy, Army and Air Force contributions set forth in DC 28 and the totals of NATO requirements.

Memorandum from Chairman, Panel on Economic Aspects of Defence Questions, to Cabinet Defence Committee

PAYMENT FOR SERVICES RENDERED BY THE UNITED KINGDOM TO CANADA

Statement of Present Policy

1. The question of payment for facilities and equipment provided for Canadian forces by other NATO countries was recently considered by both the Panel on Economic Aspects of Defence Questions and Cabinet Defence Committee. The main findings of the Panel were:

(a) a strong case could be made for maintaining Canada's policy of not accepting foreign aid;

(b) while this policy was applicable in a general way to NATO countries, it admitted of some modification when applied to the United Kingdom. If exceptional cases arose in which the United Kingdom was willing to provide, without charge, facilities and services not included in NATO infrastructure, it seemed reasonable to accept them.

2. Cabinet Defence Committee concurred in both these views on April 17, 1951. Specifically, it found that there was no objection to seeking arrangements under which the United Kingdom would absorb reasonable amounts of the expenses incurred by the Canadian forces in the United Kingdom as an offset for some of the expenses incurred by Canada on behalf of the U.K. Services. The Committee further agreed to the following:

(a) the United Kingdom should not be asked to absorb expenses of Canadian forces as an offset to anything already made available to it free of charge;

(b) while there might be an offsetting of equipment transferred between the two countries, equipment should not be offset against services;

(c) there should be no attempt to make U.K. expenditures on behalf of the Canadian Services balance Canadian expenditures on behalf of the U.K. Services;

(d) the Department of National Defence should prepare an outline of expenses being incurred by the Canadian Services on behalf of the U.K. Services and of the expenses being met by the Canadian Services and of the United Kingdom, to serve as a basis for recommendations, by the Panel on Economic Aspects of Defence Questions to Cabinet Defence Committee, as to possible arrangements for offsetting such expenses that might be proposed to the United Kingdom.

3. In consequence, the Panel has been considering data on this question provided by the Department of National Defence.

Statement of Services Rendered by the United Kingdom to Canada and by Canada to the United Kingdom

4. Each country sends members of its Armed Services to the other on loan, attachment and on course. In addition, small numbers of Service personnel are regularly exchanged between the two countries. Different financial arrangements, reflecting the degree of benefit received, are in effect for each of these categories. Owing to the excess in the number of Canadian (principally R.C.N.) personnel taking courses in the United Kingdom over the numbers of U.K. personnel taking courses in Canada, there is a net recovery from Canada of approximately $1,400,000, annually.

5. Under long-standing arrangements, the Admiralty issues such equipment and stores and renders such services as are required by R.C.N. ships and establishments in the United Kingdom. The R.C.N. performs the like for R.N. ships and establishments in Canada and, in additions, repairs and maintains U.K. armament and ammunition stores in Canada. Recovery action is taken in both directions. The amounts so recovered vary considerably from year to year but, on an average, they are about $1,000,000 (in addition, the R.C.N. purchases equipment and stores from the Admiralty through C.C.C. in the amount of four or five million dollars annually) annually by the United Kingdom from Canada and about $250,000 by Canada from the United Kingdom.

6. The ships Magnificent, Crescent, Crusader, and the submarine Thule (with crew), are presently on loan from the Admiralty to the R.C.N. The Admiralty is making no charge for the loan of these ships.

7. It is estimated that Canada will incur capital costs in an amount of the order of $58,000,000 for the training of U.K. aircrew whether the present bilateral agreement is terminated or continued. The buildings and major equipment which give rise to the capital costs, will, of course, remain the property of Canada. The estimate of operating expenses given below contains an element for maintenance and repair of properties that is theoretically sufficient to keep both in a perfect state of maintenance, and to replace major equipment lost through attrition.

8. On the assumption that the bilateral agreement will be terminated in July, 1952 and that the vacancies so created will not be filled, it is estimated that Canada will incur operating expenses on U.K. account in the amount of $19,300,000 for the period January 29, 1951 to March 31, 1953. The continuation of the bilateral agreement would give rise to additional trainees beginning training during the period July, 1952 to July, 1953.

9. At the present time, one R.C.A.F. Vampire squadron is stationed in the United Kingdom. Under existing plans, there will be a build-up there, over the period September 1, 1951 to March 1, 1952, to three F-86 squadrons, together with a Headquarters Wing and a Telecommunication Wing, which will remain in the United Kingdom until March 31, 1953. It is possible that an R.C.A.F. Material Base will also be required in the United Kingdom.

10. The Vampire squadron is using aircraft supplied by the United Kingdom on loan and is being served by U.K. motor transport. The United Kingdom is also providing the base and aerodrome accommodation for this squadron and will be providing similar accommodation for the other R.C.A.F. units. There is no evidence that the United Kingdom intends to make a charge for the capital costs incurred for this equipment and accommodation and no estimate of such capital costs has been possible. It is not likely that Canada would be expected to pay, with respect to accommodation and major equipment, more than operating expenses as defined in paragraph 7 above. At a later date, the aircraft and spares for F-86 squadrons will be provided by Canada and it is likely that these squadrons will also use Canadian motor transport.

11. It is estimated that the cost of the maintenance services provided by the United Kingdom to R.C.A.F. units for the period April 1, 1951, to March 31, 1953, will amount to $4,300,000 including the cost of rations. As the United Kingdom has as yet taken no recovery action and as U.K. cost data are not available here, this estimate has been based on Canadian costs and is to be taken as a rough guide only. The Vampire squadron is, at present, drawing R.A.F. rations but the R.C.A.F. hopes to draw U.S.A. rations whenever that becomes feasible.

12. Whatever be the exact cost of the services performed by the United Kingdom for R.C.A.F. forces in the United Kingdom, it is evident that it is much less in respect of both operating and capital expenses than the cost to Canada of training U.K. aircrew.

Policy Considerations Respecting the Above Services

13. The services outlined above fall broadly into two categories:

(a) those associated with activities which continue in peace and war, whatever the degree of international tension;

(b) those associated with special defence activities undertaken as a result of the present international tension.

It would seem desirable, as a matter of general policy, that existing arrangements with respect to the former be left undisturbed and that only the latter be considered as possible offsets to Canadian mutual aid.

14. When applied to the existing situation, such a policy would mean that:

(a) in spite of the fairly substantial amount of money involved in both cases, Canada would continue to pay for courses taken by Canadian personnel in the United Kingdom and for stores, equipment and services rendered to R.C.N. ships and establishments in the United Kingdom;

(b) existing arrangements respecting the ships on loan from the Admiralty would continue unchanged. The Admiralty is probably quite satisfied to have these ships kept in a state of operational efficiency at no cost to the United Kingdom;

(c) the only present candidate for offsetting purposes, apart from exchanges of equipments of approximately equivalent value, is the group of services provided and to be provided by the United Kingdom for R.C.A.F. units in the United Kingdom.

15. While it is considered that a sufficiently strong case can be made on general grounds for the policy outlined in paragraph 13 above, there are a number of additional reasons for not accepting free courses and free services for Canadian ships as "aid" from the United Kingdom. These are:

(a) the expansion of defence activities has not yet brought about an increase in the number of Canadian personnel on course in the United Kingdom or in the value of the services rendered to R.C.N. ships. While there might be an increase in R.C.N. and R.C.A.F. personnel on course in the United Kingdom in the next few years, the number of Army personnel taking such courses is likely to decline;

(b) if the United Kingdom were to provide courses without charge, vacancies on course might not be made so readily available to Canada in future;

(c) the promptitude with which services are presently rendered to R.C.N. ships might not be unconnected with the fact that the Admiralty is receiving payment;

(d) if the United Kingdom did not charge Canada, it might be faced with demands by other Commonwealth countries to provide courses to personnel, and services to ships, free of charge. Similar requests might be made of Canada by other Commonwealth countries;

(e) in both cases, the value of services performed by the United Kingdom for Canada exceed in value the services performed by Canada for the United Kingdom. They could be offset only against the training of U.K. aircrew in Canada. This would involve offsetting services provided by the R.C.A.F. with services provided for the R.C.N.

16. If, as is most unlikely, no further vacancies in the Canadian air training scheme, beyond the present bilateral arrangement with the United Kingdom and the Standing Group allocations, are allotted to the R.A.F., to propose that the United Kingdom provide its services to R.C.A.F. squadrons free of charge, would not be wholly consonant with the principle that Canada should not request offsets for anything already made available to the United Kingdom without charge. However, since the original offers were made, correspondence has been exchanged between the Minister of National Defence and the U.K. Secretary of State for Air indicating that the United Kingdom would not be averse to discussing such an arrangement. Moreover, it now appears likely that the R.A.F. will receive, as a result of Canadian efforts, a substantial proportion of training vacancies in Canada.

Recommendations

17. Considering all the circumstances, the Panel recommends:

(a) that, apart from exchanges of equipments of approximately equivalent value, offsetting arrangements be confined, for the present at least, to services arising out of special activities associated with the current international tension;

(b) that services provided by one of the Armed Forces of Canada be not offset by services provided by the United Kingdom for another of the Armed Forces of Canada;

(c) that the suggestion that discussions be held, made by the Minister of National Defence and agreed to by the Secretary of State for Air, be followed up, and that Canadian representatives urge that the services provided by the R.A.F. for R.C.A.F.

units in the United Kingdom be offset against the services provided by the R.C.A.F. in respect of air training of R.A.F. personnel.[17]

Memorandum from Panel on Economic Aspects of Defence Questions to Cabinet Defence Committee

CANADIAN MUTUAL AID TO NATO IN 1952-53

This memorandum from the Panel on Economic Aspects of Defence Questions is simply a report, for the information of Cabinet Defence Committee, as to (1) the items of mutual aid in 1952-53 to which Canada is committed; and (2) other items which, on the basis of present information, would appear advantageous to include in a mutual aid programme for 1952-53 if there are to be additional Canadian offers of mutual aid for that year. The Panel assumes that the government may not wish to receive recommendations as to additional mutual aid in 1952-53 until it has examined the recommendations that the Standing Group will be making in due course as to means of filling the gap between forces so far committed to NATO by member countries and total NATO forces required by July, 1954.

1. On April 17th, 1951, Cabinet Defence Committee indicated that it was prepared to consider proposals for the provision of additional items of mutual aid in 1952-53. In view of the time required to accomplish planning and production, it agreed that proposals for additional production in 1952-53 would have to be received at an early date.

2. The Panel has given preliminary consideration to the two main questions that arise in connection with a mutual aid programme for 1952-53 — the general dimensions of such a programme, and the types of items which it could most usefully include.

3. A partial answer to these questions lies in existing mutual aid commitments to NATO that involve expenditures running into and beyond 1952-53. These include the authorized NATO air training plan in Canada (1,400 training spaces per year), 300 No. 4 Mark VI radars, and 180 155 mm. howitzers, which will entail expenditures in 1952-53 estimated at $73 million, $15 million and $3 million respectively, or a total of $91 million. Cabinet has also approved in principle, subject to certain conditions, the inclusion of walkie-talkies in the mutual aid programme which would entail an expenditure of $8.2 million in 1952-53.

[17] Approuvé par le Comité du Cabinet sur la défense, le 29 juin 1951./Approved by Cabinet Defence Committee on June 29, 1951.

4. The government agreed that the U.S. and U.K. authorities be informed that it would be prepared to consider provision of F-86 airframes to the United Kingdom, provided the Standing Group recommended their allocation to that country and the United States furnished the necessary government-furnished property. The Standing Group has recommended allocation of Canadian F-86 airframes to the United Kingdom and there are now indications that the R.A.F. desires 450 F-86's in 1953 and that, in this connection, the United States can arrange to provide up to 100 sets of GFP per month, beginning January, 1953. The U.K. Government has not formally confirmed a requirement for these aircraft. It is at present estimated that, assuming delivery of United States GFP as indicated above, the Canadian cost of 450 airframes, including 10% airframe spares, would be of the order of $80 million, of which $47 million might be required in 1952-53 and $33 million in 1953-54.

5. Thus, if F-86's and walkie-talkies ($8.2 million) were added to present mutual aid commitments ($91 million) for 1952-53, the mutual aid programme for that year would involve the expenditure of $146.2 million.

6. It is considered that the following conditions should apply to any additional mutual aid from production (beyond that already mentioned) to be provided after 1951-52:

(a) items chosen should fit in with the Canadian defence production programme;

(b) they should meet NATO needs as recommended by the Defence Production Board;

(c) the U.S. dollar content should be at a minimum and, where possible, arrangements should be made for joint provision of items by the United States and Canada along the lines of those proposed in the case of F-86 aircraft.

7. There follows an analysis of items of additional mutual aid which, on the basis of present information, Canada may be asked to undertake after 1951-52. This analysis takes into account the conditions just mentioned.

(a) Additional No. 4 Mark VI radar sets. On the basis of the conditions listed above, additional radar sets would be a suitable item of future mutual aid and Mr. MacMillan, Canadian representative on the NATO Defence Production Board, has indicated the probability of largely increased European demand. However, the results of a conference of experts being held to determine the additional quantities needed is still awaited.

(b) Naval Ships. On February 22nd, 1951, Cabinet approved, as part of the defence programme, the establishment of naval shipbuilding capacity in Canada in excess of that required to meet the presently-authorized R.C.N. programme of 14 destroyer escorts and 14 coastal minesweepers. This excess capacity, while not sufficient to satisfy Canadian naval requirements for full-scale war, will provide the necessary base from which Canadian industry could be expanded fairly rapidly to foreseeable wartime requirements.

From a pure production point of view, there would be obvious advantages in making use of the surplus capacity being established for destroyer escorts and minesweepers by meeting some of the NATO deficiencies in these ships. European shipbuilding facilities will not be able to meet all NATO deficiencies in escort ships and minesweepers by mid-1954. In the circumstances, the NATO Task Force report on shipbuilding indicated (if the subsequently approved R.C.N. building programme is taken into account), that there is a NATO requirement for immediate construction in Canada of one destroyer escort and 36 minesweepers.

Engines and generators for minesweepers have to be obtained from the United States at a cost of approximately $500,000 per ship. If minesweepers were offered to NATO, arrangements would have to be made with the Americans for a joint mutual aid project under which they would provide the engines from M.D.A.P. funds. This would reduce to $1 million the total cost for Canada of a minesweeper, and would avoid the necessity of spending U.S. dollars. A destroyer escort costs approximately $12 million, including electronics and armament, and will be almost entirely Canadian in content. Thus, the total cost of 36 minesweepers (at $1 million each) and one destroyer escort would be $48 million.

It is estimated that such an additional programme for NATO could be undertaken without any appreciable amount of capital assistance beyond that presently authorized, and that present facilities for berths would be sufficient to handle these ships for delivery by mid-1954 — assuming that orders for additional ships would be placed in the near future.

(c) 3"50 Naval Guns. Investigations are proceeding regarding the interest of European countries in obtaining these guns which are now being made in Canada. Production for NATO would fit in with the Canadian defence programme. Lack of European ability to pay for such guns, together with the establishment of European requirements for them, would determine whether they should be considered in connection with mutual aid.

(d) Training Aircraft. Facilities are being established in Canada for the large-scale manufacture of complete Harvard trainer aircraft, including engines. Some European countries have expressed interest in obtaining spare parts.

If negotiations for the manufacture of a jet trainer in Canada are successful, there will probably be a NATO interest in such production.

(e) 155 mm. Howitzer Ammunition. This calibre of ammunition is to be made in Canada and its production for NATO would have the advantage of reducing the unit costs of Canadian army requirements. Canada will be providing howitzers as mutual aid.

(f) Spare Parts. Some spare parts are being provided with the equipment from new production that this country is furnishing as mutual aid, and Canada will tend to be looked upon as an appropriate source of supply for additional spare parts. Further, there are indications that the requirements for spares provided with new equipment will in some cases be much greater than originally contemplated.

8. It is clear, then, that the Canadian defence production programme includes a number of items which European countries will wish to obtain to fill gaps in their programmes. Present information indicates that, of these countries, probably only the United Kingdom and Belgium might in some instances be able to make some cash payment for items produced in Canada. Any ability of European countries to pay cash will, of course, tend to reduce the necessity to provide mutual aid. United States "off-shore" purchases in Canada under the Mutual Defence Assistance Programme would have the same effect and this possibility would bear further investigation in Washington. The possibilities of payments by European countries and of United States "off-shore" purchases would be influenced by the results of NATO burden-sharing exercises. It is possible that, with a view to ensuring that NATO countries only request provision of consumable stores in quantities that they really require, it would be desirable to ask them to pay, say, 10% of the cost of any additional consumable stores, such as ammunition and spare parts, furnished to them as mutual aid from new production. It is, however, expected that, for all practical purposes, provision of military items to NATO countries (other than the United States) will have to be on a straight gift basis.

9. The scale of the Canadian mutual aid programme in 1950-51 and 1951-52 is relevant to the question of the appropriate level of aid for 1952-53. In 1950-51 mutual aid funds were encumbered to the amount of $195 million to provide for replacement of U.K.-type equipment transferred to NATO. In 1951-52 authorization is provided for mutual aid funds amounting to $61 million which, together with the balance of $105 million from the original $300 million, total $165 million. In terms of impact on the economy, expenditures connected with mutual aid will likely be considerably higher than $165 million in the current year, since only $20 million of 1950-51 funds, amounting to $195 million, were expended (on purchases of U.S.-type equipment), and a number of the remaining purchases will be completed this year. At the same time, some U.K.-type equipment approved for transfer this year, may not be replaced until 1952-53. Of the total authorized for transfers to NATO in the present year ($165 million), new production will account for approximately $33 million, aircrew training for $56 million, and transfer from existing stocks for the remaining $76 million.

Tentative Conclusions

10. So far there are the following elements for a mutual aid programme for 1952-53:

	1952-53 Expenditure
(1) NATO Air Training (1400 training spaces)	$ 73,000,000
(2) 300 No. 4 Mark VI radars	15,000,000
(3) 180—155 mm. howitzers	3,000,000
(4) Walkie-talkies	8,200,000
Total:	$ 99,200,000

11. In considering the implications of a mutual aid programme for 1952-53, expanded beyond $99.2 million to include such items as F-86 airframes for the United Kingdom, naval ships and guns, training aircraft, howitzer ammunition and spare parts, it is necessary to bear in mind:

(a) Canada's balance-of-payments position, particularly the balance of military transactions with the United States.

(Until recently it was thought that, in the calendar year 1951, Canada's overall current deficit would be on the order of $500 to $600 million. It now appears that this figure might rise to about $700 million. A large portion of this deficit will be due to the excess of Canadian defence expenditures in the United States over U.S. expenditures in Canada. Appendix "A"† gives recent estimates of the probable scale of these expenditures, indicating that, in 1951-52, Canada will spend $275 million in the United States for the purchase of military end items, components, parts and materials and, in 1952-53, approximately $400 million, and that the corresponding figures for U.S. expenditures in Canada on military end items, manufactured components, and construction of defence projects, will be $60 million and $125 million respectively. There are, however, now indications that these figures for U.S. expenditures may be low and that they may be raised by a total of $100 million for the two years.)

(b) It is not unlikely that the Standing Group will, in due course, propose, as part of its recommendations for closing the gap in NATO land, sea and air forces, production of 1,800 F-86 airframes in Canada for NATO countries (apart from the 450 that may be required by the United Kingdom) and an expansion of the authorized NATO air training scheme in Canada to train an additional 300 NATO aircrew in 1952 and an additional 1,000 in 1953.

(Such an expansion would require, in the way of additional facilities and training staff, 2 basic and 1 advanced training schools, 400 Harvard and 217 T.33 jet trainers, and some 3,000 R.C.A.F. personnel (including about 600 civilians). This additional plant and staff would be used first for additional R.C.A.F. aircrew training (also expected to be recommended by the Standing Group) before being devoted to training the additional NATO aircrew.)[18]

I. "PARIS PLAN" FOR CLOSING THE GAP IN NATO AIR FORCES AND REPLY TO GENERAL EISENHOWER

1. The Minister of National Defence recalled the decision at the meeting of May 29th, 1951, as to the position of the Chief of the Air Staff at the meeting in Paris on June 6th-8th with the Chiefs of the Air Staffs of the United Kingdom, France and the United States, at which the latter had prepared and transmitted to General Eisenhower their final report — the "Paris Plan" — on possible means of closing the gap in NATO air forces.

Noted by Cabinet Defence Committee on June 29, 1951. This memorandum included an appendix on the U.S. dollar content in the Canadian defence program which is not printed.

The increased Canadian air effort proposed in the Paris Plan, which was very similar to that envisaged in the earlier version of the plan discussed at the meeting of May 29th, was as follows:

(a) The allocation to the Integrated Force of a division of 12 fighter squadrons with 300 front-line aircraft; a division of 12 light bomber squadrons with 192 front-line aircraft; and 1 long-range transport squadron with 16 aircraft to be based in Canada. The F-86 requirements outside Europe would include 297 aircraft for operational training, squadron build-up in Canada and attrition for the period 1951-54. To this would be added the Integrated Force requirements of 800 aircraft as contained in the Paris Plan, bringing F-86 requirements to a total of 1,097 aircraft, including a 100% war reserve of 300 aircraft not required until after 1954. Thus, the current procurement of 790 F-86's would be sufficient until 1954. On the same basis, the procurement of light bombers would be 514, less a war reserve of 192, or a total of 322 up to 1954. (Present Canadian air commitments to the Integrated Force were 11 fighter squadrons with 203 front-line aircraft and 587 aircraft for reserve, etc.).

(b) The production for NATO countries of F-86 airframes up to Canadian capacity, estimated to be about 1,800 — apart from the aircraft mentioned in (a) and airframes possibly required by the United Kingdom

(c) The establishment and operation:

(1) by September 1st, 1951, of two additional basic flying training schools and, by September 1st, 1952, of 1 advanced school, to train 300 additional NATO aircrew in 1952, and 1,000 additional NATO aircrew in 1953 (beyond the presently-approved 1,400 per year); and

(2) of one light-bomber operational training unit in 1952 for R.C.A.F. aircrew.

(d) The production and/or procurement by 1954 of 322 light bombers, 400 Harvard trainers, 217 T-33 jet trainers and 16 long-range transports additional to those in currently-approved plans.

(e) The acquisition of eight airfields, three air depot sites, three headquarters sites and one hospital site in Europe.

(f) An increase in the R.C.A.F. of 7,638 overseas, 5,482 home forces (including support personnel for both operational commitment in Europe and additional training commitment in Canada) and 1,000 for training, totalling 14,120 and bringing the total R.C.A.F. establishment to 58,320 (of this number 13,316 overseas) and necessitating maintenance of the present recruiting rate until April, 1954.

(g) In addition to expenditures on currently-approved plans, R.C.A.F. expenditure of $305 million in 1952-53, $409 million in 1953-54 and $197 million in the 9 months ending December, 1954, including a share of the infrastructure required by the R.C.A.F. squadrons in Europe, but not the cost of production of F-86 airframes for other NATO countries.

On receiving the Paris Plan, General Eisenhower had asked that the NATO Defence Ministers provide answers by July 2nd to the following questions:

"(a) What major obstacles will have to be overcome by individual nations in order to enable them to meet the suggested targets set out in the Paris Plan and its appendices? The major obstacles listed should relate only to the provision of air forces...."

"(b) Will the attainment of these targets within the time stated have a major effect on the attainment of army and navy commitments as set out in DC 28?"

The Department of Defence Production had considered the proposals in the Paris Plan for Canadian aircraft production and had indicated that, while it had not been able in the time available to base its comments on detailed production studies, it was fully expected that (with the possible exception of the Canberra light bomber) the Paris Plan production targets could be met provided an adequate supply of GFP were made available.

The Chiefs of Staff had considered the Paris Plan and the related question of possible Canadian contributions towards closing the gap in NATO land and sea forces, and had concluded that the air force gap should not be examined in isolation but rather in relation to concurrent deficiencies in land and sea force contributions. They had, accordingly, recommended that a decision regarding the additional Canadian air effort proposed in the Paris Plan be deferred pending the completion of the Standing Group's study of national force contributions required to fill the gap in navy, army and air forces.

In the circumstances, it was recommended that a reply be sent to General Eisenhower indicating the problems being encountered in realizing the presently-approved programme, pointing out difficulties that would arise in expanding it, and stating that the Canadian government could not reach a decision regarding the Paris Plan pending receipt of the Standing Group's recommendations for closing the gap in NATO land, sea and air forces.

Two papers had been circulated.

(Minister's memorandum, June 26th, 1951, "Consideration of the Paris Plan and the related reply to General Eisenhower's message of June 15, 1951" — Cabinet Document D-288; "Draft reply to General Eisenhower on the acceleration of NATO air forces programmes".)

2. Mr. Claxton said that, to do justice to those who had drafted the Paris Plan, it was necessary to add that most of the additional Canadian effort that it proposed would relate to the years 1953 and 1954 and, so far as physical and manpower factors were concerned, could be accomplished by Canada because the presently-approved programme called for a rapid build-up in 1951 and 1952 and a subsequent levelling-off.

3. The Prime Minister saw no reason for departing at this time from the decision made at the meeting of May 29th that no additional overall defence commitments could be accepted for 1951-52, and that additional commitments for future years could not yet be considered.

He suggested that there be deleted from the draft reply to General Eisenhower the second part of paragraph 15(b) and the whole of paragraph 15(c), which referred to limitations on U.S. military purchases in Canada and the difficulty of persuading the Canadian people to accept a higher degree of mobilization than that resulting from the current defence programme. With the deletion of paragraph 15(c) it would be necessary to change the opening words of both paragraphs 15 and 16 so as to remove any impression that the remaining factors listed in paragraph 15 constituted the major obstacles to an increased Canadian air effort. The beginning of paragraph 19 should be revised to indicate that the Canadian government considered that, insofar as Canada was concerned, a decision regarding the Paris Plan must be deferred pending completion of the Standing Group's study.

4. The Chief of the Air Staff said that, during the Paris meetings, he had explained to General Eisenhower that the Canadian defence programme was felt to be a large one for this country and that, before it could consider any additional air effort, the government would require the Standing Group's assessment of the additional land, sea and air forces required. General Eisenhower had said that he appreciated the position. He had added, however, that since, in an emergency, European countries were likely to demand the protection of their national air forces, he attached great importance to the R.C.A.F. and U.S.A.F. components of the Integrated Force as the only ones over which he would have undisputed operational control. He had gone on to say that he thought that, for the next few years, Canada. the United Kingdom and the United States should produce considerable airpower because, having been under enemy occupation during the last war, most of the continental NATO countries had serious deficiencies in technically-trained personnel and therefore could not produce the air effort required of them during the years immediately ahead.

General Eisenhower had stated that he believed that the United Kingdom was doing everything of which it was capable, short of total war conditions, and that the manpower situation in Norway was very serious since all men and women were fully employed. Lieutenant-General Gruenther, General Eisenhower's Chief of Staff, had questioned France's ability to increase its air effort by some 1100 front-line aircraft as contemplated in the Paris Plan, without seriously affecting the build-up of its land forces. General Vandenberg, Chief of Staff, U.S.A.F., had indicated that the U.S.A.F. could assume the responsibility for providing these additional 1100 manned aircraft, although it would require further manpower and funds for the purpose. It was a question whether, in view of the terms of the Italian Peace Treaty, Italy could build up its air force to the level contemplated in the Paris Plan. The U.K. and Belgian Chiefs of Staff had indicated that their countries were physically capable of meeting the Paris allocations, and that they expected their governments to accept them. It had been noted that Belgium and Italy would have to be provided with additional U.S. aircraft and funds if they were to meet their increased allocations.

5. The Committee, after further discussion, noted the report of the Minister of National Defence regarding the proposals as to means of closing the gap in NATO air forces embodied in the "Paris Plan", and approved the general lines of the Minister's draft reply to General Eisenhower regarding the plan, subject to the modifications suggested by the Prime Minister.

III. PROCEDURE FOR FORMULATING RECOMMENDATIONS ON GAP-CLOSING; U.S. PROPOSALS

16. Mr. MacKay said that it was expected that, at the Ottawa meeting of the NATO Council, there would be preliminary discussion of closing the gap in the Medium Term Defence Plan as regards finance and production, and that proposals on gap-closing would be presented at the Rome meeting of the Council and possibly discussed in a preliminary way at the Ottawa meeting.

A Joint Working Group, drawn from NATO agencies, was preparing a statistical report on the cost of the Plan for the Ottawa meeting.

Also, the U.S. government had circulated a memorandum indicating the hope that decisive action on gap-closing would be taken in Rome.[19] This stated that Washington had made an analysis of the approximate orders of magnitude of the total costs of the MTD Plan and of the capabilities of NATO for meeting it; that the screened costs of European force requirements for the full Plan and essential European non-NATO requirements were estimated at $66 billion, of which $36 billion (including $3-$4 billion for European forces needed to fill the gap) represented the major material requirements; and that less than $2 billion of the remaining $30 billion corresponded to the forces gap. It added that the U.S. government was prepared to support a continuation of the U.S. contribution to North Atlantic security at about the present level if the other NATO countries indicated a comparable intention to meet the full requirements of the MTD Plan and joined in making realistic plans.

Appended to the U.S. memorandum was a proposed "Programme of NATO Action" from which it appeared that the U.S. government hoped that in Ottawa the Council would agree to directing the Council Deputies to arrange for the recently-established Joint Working Group, drawn from the FEB, the DPB and the Standing Group, or for a similar body or bodies to put together in time for the Rome meeting a comprehensive report on the various aspects of gap-closing that they have had under consideration, indicating the additional financial, production and force efforts that might be made by each NATO country. The "Programme" indicated the hope that this exercise would bring out the possibility of greater Canadian efforts.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated.

(External Affairs memorandum, August 31st, 1951 and attached U.S. Embassy memorandum, August 28th, 1951 — Panel Document ED-42)†

17. Mr. MacKay undertook, at the request of Mr. Drury, to enquire whether a copy of the U.S. screened analysis of MTD Plan costs was obtainable at this time.

18. Mr. Drury thought that the proposal that the NATO agencies prepare a report for consideration in Rome was perhaps inescapable and not unreasonable, although it would mean that all the additional efforts that Canada might be in a position to make would be brought into focus.

19. Mr. Deutsch agreed that the result would be somewhat embarrassing for Canada. At the same time, if the North Atlantic countries were sincere in their desire to close the gap, the procedure proposed might be the most effective.

20. Mr. Plumptre wondered whether the task of preparing recommendations for additional national efforts was a matter for experts drawn from NATO agencies or for the Council Deputies. His understanding was that the procedure probably contemplated was for the agencies to prepare material for the Deputies where national political considerations would be introduced and the material weighted accordingly prior to submission to the Council in Rome.

21. The Chairman expressed concern at the possibility of experts preparing recommendations on national contributions towards gap-closing, since such recommendations appeared to be more properly a matter for negotiation by national representatives in a position to put forward national political considerations. A report from an expert group might acquire such recognition as to make it difficult for governments to bring about modified proposals.

22. The Deputy Governor of the Bank of Canada thought that an expert group would not be able to produce a report in time unless it used a U.S. analysis as the basis for its studies.

23. The Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs wondered what alternatives there were to the procedure proposed by the United States. The Deputies themselves would not be in a position to undertake the detailed work on the combined report although they could discuss recommendations put forward by the various experts. Should there be bilateral or multilateral negotiations and, if so, by whom?

24. The Deputy Minister of Defence Production thought that there might have to be a combination of bilateral and multilateral negotiations.

25. Mr. Robertson agreed that there would probably have to be bilateral negotiations but suggested that the results of these would have to be processed on a NATO basis since what was involved was a merger of national interests with a view to agreement on solution of a common problem.

26. Mr. Heeney said that his department would draft material on this question, outlining the difficulties in the U.S. proposals, for use by the Canadian ministers attending the Ottawa Council meeting.

27. The Panel, after further discussion, noted Mr. MacKay's report and agreed that the Department of External Affairs would:

(a) endeavour to obtain an advance copy of the U.S. screened analysis of Medium Term Defence Plan costs;

(b) draft material on the U.S. proposal as to procedure in preparing recommendations on gap-closing for use by Canadian ministers attending the NATO Council meeting in Ottawa.[20]

II. U.K. REQUEST FOR 395 F-86 AIRFRAMES

5. The Minister of Defence Production said that from December, 1950, the government had taken the position that the U.K. authorities could be informed that, if they could obtain U.S. engines and other GFP and the Standing Group made an appropriate recommendation regarding allocation of airframes, Canada would be likely to accommodate them in their desire to obtain Canadian-built F-86 airframes as mutual aid.

The Standing Group had recommended that Canada meet the U.K request for airframes and the United Kingdom had recently completed negotiations with the United States looking to provision of U.S. components in time to permit Canada to supply 395 F-86's to the R.A.F. between June, 1953 and January, 1954. In the circumstances, the U.K. government, before making formal application to the U.S. government for provision of these components under the Mutual Defence Assistance Programme, had now asked for formal confirmation of Canada's willingness to supply 395 airframes as mutual aid during the 8-month period mentioned. The aircraft would meet the requirements of 6 R.A.F. squadrons allocated to the Integrated Force under the Paris Plan.

On the fate of the American proposal on gap-closing, see Document 476.

The cost of 395 airframes, with 10% spares, would be about $71 million — representing roughly 3/5 of the total cost of the complete aircraft — of which some $30 million would be required in 1952-53 and $41 million in 1953-54. Present firm commitments for mutual aid involved expenditures in 1952-53 of some $91 million. Thus, with the provision of F-86 airframes, the mutual aid figure for 1952-53 would be $121 million.

As the production of 395 F-86's could be fitted into the defence production programme, he recommended approval for their inclusion in the mutual aid programme and for the United Kingdom to be advised that they would be allocated to the R.A.F.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated.

6. Mr. Howe added that, if there were to be any additional Canadian mutual aid commitments for the period after 1951-52, F-86 airframes appeared to be the most useful contribution to make and the one that would fit in best with the defence production programme. Present F-86 orders for the R.C.A.F. would be completed by the time the U.S. components became available for the R.A.F.

7. The Minister of National Defence said that, while the F-86 proposal had been discussed from time to time with the R.A.F. and U.S.A.F., his department had merely indicated that the government "would give the matter consideration" if provision of U.S. components proved feasible. The point of view of his department in the matter was affected by the consideration that the Standing Group was now suggesting substantial increases in the Canadian forces as a contribution towards closing the gap in North Atlantic Treaty forces at a time when it was calculated that, in the first three years, the presently-approved Canadian defence programme could not be carried out within the $5 billion forecast, and, in fact, was now considered likely to cost something like $5.9 billion, without any allowance being made for contributions towards gap-filling. Thus, any additional mutual aid commitments would require still further appropriations beyond the three-year figure forecast.

8. The Prime Minister said that, as it had proved difficult to get some portions of the defence programme under way rapidly, it appeared that fairly substantial sums appropriated might not be spent in 1951-52 which could lead to embarrassment in maintaining present tax levels and requesting large appropriations for 1952-53. The F-86 project, on the other hand, was one that Canada could be sure of carrying out and, at the same time, would make a substantial contribution to gap-closing. It therefore deserved consideration. There was a general feeling that a production contribution to NATO appealed to the Canadian public and that, as Canadian forces cost much more per man than European forces, employment of Canadian manpower in the industrial field, where the Canadian competitive position was good, represented efficient use of the country's resources.

9. Mr. Claxton said that the defence production programme was now pretty close to its planned rate. Possibly not more than $100 million of the funds available for 1951-52 would remain unspent at the end of the fiscal year.

Again, more than originally contemplated would have to be spent to carry out the 1952-53 portion of the present programme. In examining the F-86 proposal it appeared desirable to take into account this factor as well as the consideration that there was now mounting pressure for large additional force contributions to NATO. The Standing Group proposals on gap-closing were likely to be largely unchanged when submitted for consideration during the NATO Council meeting in Rome in October or November when there would be a strong appeal to member countries to agree to provide the additional forces proposed. The U.S. and U.K. governments would accept their allocations since they had approved these before they were incorporated in the Standing Group proposals. France, Belgium and the Netherlands were expected to accept something like the allocations proposed in their cases. Thus, Canada would be in a somewhat embarrassing position if it refused to agree to provide some part of the additional forces requested of it.

10. Mr. St-Laurent said that, if he were satisfied that it would be more effective for Canada to provide airframes than additional forces, he would not be anxious about NATO criticism. It would not be efficient to try to make the maximum possible contribution of military manpower. There being a gap to be filled in NATO forces, if others had military manpower available, it would be more efficient for Canada to provide that manpower with equipment than to try to man a larger proportion of the equipment it could produce.

11. Mr. Claxton thought that, since the Standing Group proposals would have to be carefully examined by the government between the Ottawa and Rome meetings of the NATO Council, it would be advantageous to defer decision on the airframe question for 3 or 4 weeks. Also, should it then be decided that the airframe project should be undertaken, it could be indicated to NATO, at the time when the pressure for gap-closing contributions would be greatest, that Canada was prepared to contribute the F-86's.

12. Mr. St-Laurent thought that it would be desirable to approve the airframe proposal now and, in due course, inform NATO that such a contribution represented the decision of the Canadian government. It appeared wiser to make contributions that would be in the best interests of NATO as a whole than to try to make the best showing for Canada by contributing large forces.

13. The Secretary of State for External Affairs thought that if $71 million would result in increasing NATO strength by 395 aircraft it would be an important contribution. While there had been no firm undertaking to produce airframes, he thought that the discussions with the U.K. authorities could not have failed to leave them with the impression that the project would be given sympathetic consideration by the government if U.S. components became available.

14. Mr. Howe agreed with this view and thought that it had been the intent of earlier discussions in Cabinet and Cabinet Defence Committee to consider a formal U.K. request sympathetically, if one were made.

15. The Deputy Minister of Finance enquired whether the airframes would have any U.S. dollar content. Since the current account position for 1951-52 presented difficulties and it was not yet known what the U.S. content of the present Canadian defence programme would cost in 1952-53, it would be necessary to examine carefully any proposals involving expenditures of U.S. dollars in the coming fiscal year.

The defence programme was expected to cost more in 1952-53 than anticipated earlier and the defence budget for that year appeared likely to have to allow also for some expenditures deferred from 1951-52. His Minister would probably consider it desirable in the circumstances to examine the airframe proposal in relation to the expected total budgetary position for 1951-53 rather than in isolation.

16. Mr. Howe said that the U.S. content of the airframes — apart from the components to be provided as free U.S. aid to the United Kingdom — would be very small.

17. Mr. St-Laurent said that the government would in due course decide on an overall figure for the defence-mutual aid programme for 1952-53 and would stick to it in the face of any subsequent pressures for increased contributions. Meanwhile, his feeling was that the airframe project was the kind of thing that it would be easier to undertake than the provision of additional manpower.

18. Mr. Claxton said that the deficiency of some 2700 aircraft shown in the Paris Plan had been the basis of the suggestion in the Standing Group proposals that the front-line strength of Canada's air contribution to the Integrated Force be increased from 203 to 300 aircraft. If, instead of meeting some portion of the Standing Group proposals regarding air contributions, Canada gave aircraft to the United Kingdom, it would not get much credit as making a contribution to gap-closing.

19. Mr. St-Laurent thought that the emphasis should be on doing what would most benefit NATO as a whole rather than on seeking to obtain credit for contributing large forces.

20. The Deputy Minister of National Defence said that there were some doubts as to the effect of a Canadian contribution of F-86's. Mr. Henderson, U.K. Secretary of State for Air, had indicated, before the U.K. formal request was received, that if these aircraft could not be made available for 2 or 3 years, the United Kingdom might have to make arrangements to use instead the F-3 that it was developing. In providing F-86's, Canada might, therefore, be merely relieving the United Kingdom of the expense of resorting to aircraft that it could make itself, rather than making an addition to the strength of the Integrated Force that could not be made by the United Kingdom.

21. The Chief of the Air Staff said that the position was that, in 1953, there would be no aircraft other than the F-86 that could deal with the Soviet MIG-15 and that it was not expected to be possible to initiate large-scale production of the U.K. F-3 until the early part of 1954.

22. The Chairman, Chiefs of Staff Committee said that the effect of provision of F-86's to the United Kingdom would be to ensure that six squadrons would be equipped about the beginning of 1954 rather than late in 1954.

23. Mr. Pearson suggested that the equipping of 6 squadrons a year earlier than would otherwise be possible would represent a useful step.

24. Mr. Claxton said that it would only be possible to provide the airframes if the defence budget for the next two years were increased beyond the figure contemplated when it had been forecast that the defence programme would cost $5 billion during the first three years.

25. Mr. Pearson said that, if this position were taken, it would probably mean that Canada would not provide any mutual aid, beyond present commitments, after 1951-52, and that it was useless for further consideration to be given in NATO agencies to what Canada could most usefully produce as aid.

26. The Deputy Minister of Defence Production pointed out that, in compliance with the Committee's decision of April 17th, 1951, NATO had been informed that the government was prepared to consider proposals for additional aid in 1952-53 and that proposals regarding aid from production should be received at an early date. The U.K. proposal appeared to fit into this scheme of things.

27. Mr. St-Laurent said that, if provision of airframes would merely compete with other possible Canadian measures for closing the gap, it would be satisfactory, but that it would be another matter if it competed for funds with existing commitments to NATO represented by the present defence plans. He did not think it would be difficult to inform NATO that Canada was not going to increase its manpower contribution. This was a position that it could defend and which would be supported by the Canadian public.

28. Mr. Claxton said that, unless the F-86 project were classed as a separate mutual aid item and a vote provided for it over and above the funds required for the present defence programme, it would compete with the latter.

29. Mr. Howe thought that it would be a shock to the U.K. and U.S. authorities if Canada failed to provide F-86's after the lengthy discussions and negotiations that had taken place.

30. Mr. Claxton said that he had recently told Mr. Henderson that Canada might not be able to provide F-86's. While Mr. Henderson had been surprised, he did now know that the airframes might not be forthcoming.

31. Mr. Pearson suggested that, if the F-86 proposal were rejected, Canada should inform other NATO countries that they should not expect any further mutual aid from Canadian production beyond present commitments, since, as a result of earlier public statements, NATO had the impression that Canada planned to make a substantial contribution by means of production.

32. Dr. Clark said that while, earlier, it had been expected that it would be possible to provide additional mutual aid after 1951-52, it was now possible that the present defence programme would cost so much in 1952-53 that Canada could not afford to furnish additional aid.

33. Mr. St-Laurent thought that it would be undesirable to recommend the airframe project to Cabinet without its being first examined again with the Minister of Finance present. On the other hand, he would not be in favour of rejecting the project forthwith.

34. The Committee, after further discussion, noted the recommendation of the Minister of Defence Production that Canada provide 395 F-86 airframes to the United Kingdom as mutual aid in 1953, and agreed to defer decision until the matter could be discussed again at an early date with the Minister of Finance present and on the basis of a tabulation, to be prepared by the Department of National Defence, of the estimated cost after 1951-52 of presently-approved defence plans.

III. STANDING GROUP PROPOSALS ON GAP-CLOSING; REPORT

35. The Minister of National Defence gave a report on proposals of the Standing Group for gap-closing, now before the North Atlantic Military Representatives Committee, since these would be very much in the minds of those attending the NATO Council meeting beginning in Ottawa on September 15th.

The proposals, prepared with mainly military considerations in mind, would give rise to problems of finance, manpower and production. They were based on the total force requirements and national commitments originally set forth in the Medium Term Defence Plan. Since formulating its proposals, the Standing Group had received General Eisenhower's estimate of major force requirements for the defence of Western Europe, based on a "forward strategy" and a target date of July 1st, 1954. In general, these requirements were of the same order of magnitude as those in the MTD Plan, although they showed the land and naval forces as required sooner after D-Day than was suggested by the Standing Group.

The additional Canadian contributions proposed by the Standing Group were:

(a) Sea—6 escorts, 22 ocean minesweepers and 4 coastal minesweepers for the North Atlantic Ocean Region — together requiring capital expenditures of $148 million between April 1st, 1952 and March 31st, 1956, recurring expenditures of $40.5 million, and 7,800 personnel.

(b) Land—1 2/3 divisions in Europe by D plus 30 requiring (i) before D-Day, a full division in Europe with the equipment for a second, and one fully-trained division in Canada; and (ii) assuming the Korean commitment ended, 46,500 personnel and recurring expenditures of $140.5 million (for two infantry divisions), or 24,500 personnel, capital expenditures of $114.8 million and recurring expenditures of $86.1 million (for two armoured divisions).

(c) Air—for the Integrated Force, an increase of 97 aircraft in the first-line strength of the R.C.A.F. fighter division, a bomber division of 192 first-line aircraft, and one supporting long-range transport squadron; and, for NATO, facilities and aircraft to permit the training of 300 pupils in 1952 and 1,000 in 1953 — together requiring expenditures of $709.6 million between April 1st, 1952 and March 31st, 1955 and 14,120 personnel (without provision for infrastructure, war reserve aircraft or war stockpiling of POL and ammunition).

The Standing Group had asked the NATO Chiefs of Staff for comments on its proposals by September 12th. The Canadian Chiefs of Staff had made a preliminary reply, on the proposals affecting Canada, which, besides offering certain criticisms and pointing out obstacles to realization of some of the proposals, indicated that the short time available did not permit formulation of a conclusion, although the matter was under urgent examination. The Chiefs of Staff had now prepared analyses indicating the implications of accepting the full proposals, together with alternative proposals for consideration should the government be prepared to increase present commitments. Canada was, of course, not in a position to undertake all of the additional commitments suggested.

While the Standing Group proposals were not on the agenda for the Ottawa meeting of the NATO Council, the Standing Group would be commenting on the problem in its report to that meeting. As a fuller reply would have to be given to the Standing Group and the Canadian position would have to be clarified before the meetings of the Military Committee and the Council in Rome in October or November, it was suggested that Cabinet Defence Committee examine the Standing Group proposals after the Ottawa meeting of the Council.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated.

(Minister's memorandum, September 11th, 1951, "NATO Medium Term Plan force requirements; national contributions to close the gap; report" — Cabinet Document D-301)†

36. The Committee noted the report of the Minister of National Defence regarding the Standing Group proposals on gap-closing and appreciations of these proposals prepared by the Chiefs of Staff, and agreed to examine the question after the Ottawa meeting of the North Atlantic Council.

I. STANDING GROUP PROPOSALS ON GAP CLOSING; POSITION TO BE TAKEN BY CHAIRMAN, CHIEFS OF STAFF COMMITTEE

1. The Minister of National Defence recalled the report he had given at the meeting of September 12th, 1951, regarding the proposals on gap-closing placed by the Standing Group before the Military Representatives Committee and the preliminary comments communicated to the Standing Group through the Canadian representative.

At the recent North Atlantic Council meeting Canadian and other delegations had emphasized that when proposals for national force contributions were being drafted in the Standing Group organization all member governments, and not merely those of the Standing Group countries, should be fully consulted at all stages through their military representatives. The Standing Group had agreed that its paper on gap-closing was merely a working paper and was open to discussion and change before being reported to the Military Committee or the 12-nation Ministerial Committee concerned with gap-closing. It was prepared to discuss immediately with the Chairman, Chiefs of Staff Committee the proposals affecting Canada.

It appeared desirable for General Foulkes to have a discussion with the Standing Group before any further written comments were made on its proposals. He might again explain to the Standing Group the Canadian position with regard to manpower, production and finance, neither firmly rejecting, nor committing Canada to, the Standing Group proposals, and indicating that the government was prepared to consider any adaptations of its defence plans not requiring any additional men or money for the present.

As regards the Standing Group proposals that Canada provide 22 ocean minesweepers and an additional 6 escorts and 4 coastal minesweepers, the reference to the ocean minesweepers was a mistake that should be corrected and General Foulkes might say that construction of the additional escorts and coastal minesweepers would depend on how the present Naval construction programme progressed, but that additional ships could not be completed by July 1st, 1954.

With regard to the proposal that Canada provide an additional one and two-thirds Army divisions in Europe by D plus 30, he might indicate that this was not practical but that, if the Korean commitment were ended, Canada might be able to provide an additional two-thirds of a division in Europe by D plus the time required to move this formation overseas, and should be able to provide a second division some time after D plus 180. When the Korean commitment came to an end, there should be enough men and equipment available to provide the additional two-thirds of a division in Europe in the manner outlined, although this would deplete reserves. Preliminary discussion indicated that the Standing Group was likely to consider these revised Army proposals as realistic.

The Standing Group had proposed that Canada provide 12 fighter squadrons, each with 25 aircraft, instead of 11 squadrons with 16 aircraft; a light bomber division; a long-range transport squadron; and facilities to train an additional 300 NATO aircrew in 1952 and an additional 1,000 in 1953. This would mean that, by D-Day, Canada would be expected to have in Europe about one-third as much air strength as the United States. This was utterly unrealistic. He suggested that General Foulkes might say that it might be possible to increase the fighter squadrons to 12 and raise the number of aircraft in each squadron somewhat beyond the 16 now planned; that a light bomber division could not be provided; that Canada would have a heavy transport squadron available for use where most appropriate; and that it was prepared to train as many additional NATO aircrew as possible without further expansion of present training facilities. These facilities might possibly produce 100-200 additional aircrew per year.

2. Mr. Claxton suggested that it would be a good thing if, after the Rome meeting of the North Atlantic Council, the nations stopped talking about "closing the gap". Direct negotiations would produce better results. After the Rome meeting General Eisenhower should be in a position to know what forces he could count on receiving from member countries.

3. The Chairman, Chiefs of Staff Committee said that the Standing Group had indicated that it hoped to reconcile force requirements and probable contributions within the next few days and report its conclusions to the NATO Ministerial Committee which would be meeting in Paris on October 9th. It was therefore important that he meet with the Standing Group immediately and discuss its proposals with it along the lines suggested by Mr. Claxton with a view to having the proposals modified in advance of the Standing Group's report to the Ministerial Committee. He did not feel that he need discuss with the Standing Group the provision of the second division towards the end of the first year after D-Day, since the Standing Group proposals only related to forces to be provided by D plus 90.

4. The Prime Minister remarked that the position on gap-closing suggested by Mr. Claxton represented what was physically possible for Canada.

5. The Minister of Finance considered the proposed approach to the problem a sensible one.

6. The Committee, after further discussion, approved the recommendations of the Minister of National Defence that, for the present at least, the Standing Group be given no further comments in writing on its proposals on gap-closing and that, during his forthcoming discussion of the matter with the Standing Group, the Chairman, Chiefs of Staff Committee should:

(a) explain the Canadian position with regard to manpower, production and finance, neither firmly rejecting, nor committing Canada to, the Standing Group proposals and indicating that the government was prepared to consider any adaptations of its defence plans not requiring additional men or money for the present;

(b) state that construction of the proposed additional 6 escort vessels and 4 coastal minesweepers would depend on how the present naval construction programme progressed (also pointing out that the proposal for the contribution of 22 ocean minesweepers had been made in error);

(c) as regards the proposal for an additional one and two-thirds Army divisions in Europe by D plus 30, state that this was not practicable but that, if the Korean commitment were liquidated, Canada might be in a position to provide an additional two-thirds of a division in Europe within the time after D-Day required to move this formation overseas;

(d) as regards the Air Force proposals, state that it might be possible to increase the fighter contribution to the Integrated Force from 11 to 12 squadrons and raise the number of aircraft in each squadron beyond the 16 now planned; that the government could not consider providing a light bomber division; that it would have a heavy transport squadron available for use where most appropriate; and that it was prepared to train as many additional NATO aircrew as possible without further expansion of planned training facilities.

III. PRODUCTION OF F-86 AIRFRAMES FOR THE U.K.; PURCHASE OF TANKS IN THE U.K.

17. The Minister of National Defence recalled that, at the meeting of September 12th, 1951, it had been agreed to give further consideration to the U.K. request for Canadian provision of 395 F-86 airframes as mutual aid between June, 1953 and January, 1954. This would strengthen the Integrated Force. It was feasible from the point of view of Canadian productive capacity, but he had suggested that it would have to be considered as part of the general Canadian defence programme.

It had been found that the United States could not give an undertaking as to when it would be able to supply the tanks required for three divisions; that present U.S. types of tanks were less satisfactory, and likely to be about three times more costly, than U.K. "Centurions"; and that the United Kingdom might be able to provide such tanks at a satisfactory rate of delivery between 1951 and 1953. In the circumstances, and as the 27th Canadian Infantry Brigade would be grouped with, and maintained by, the U.K. army in Europe, it appeared preferable to obtain the necessary tanks in the United Kingdom rather than pursue the question of buying them in the United States.

There was a possibility of criticism if the government agreed to give a large number of airframes to the United Kingdom and, at the same time, decided to make a large purchase of tanks in the United Kingdom. After consulting the Prime Minister, he had therefore sent a message to London suggesting exploration with the U.K. authorities of the possibility of an arrangement whereby Canada would provide the airframes as mutual aid as requested and the United Kingdom would in effect barter up to 280 "Centurions" for military equipment to be ordered by it in Canada. The Canadian High Commissioner had taken up the matter with U.K. officials who, while not excluding the possibility of agreeing to an offsetting arrangement of the type proposed, had suggested that it would be preferable for dollars realized on the sale of "Centurions" to Canada to be devoted to the reduction of the sterling area's balance of payments deficit with Canada, and had enquired whether, in addition to Canadian military equipment, Canadian strategic materials could be included in the proposed offsetting arrangement.

(Telegram 2451, October 1st, 1951, to the Secretary of State for External Affairs from the High Commissioner, London)†

18. The Minister of Defence Production and the Minister of Finance thought it preferable to avoid a bilateral offsetting arrangement of the type in question.

19. Mr. Abbott also considered that the tanks should be bought in the United Kingdom on a normal commercial basis without reference to the provision of airframes. Purchasing tanks there as against the United States would conserve foreign exchange and the United Kingdom would spend in Canada its dollar earnings from the tanks. Since it was generally understood that North America was spending relatively large sums on production aid to Western Europe instead of committing large numbers of troops to the Integrated Force, there should be no misunderstanding if airframes were given to the United Kingdom when tanks were being bought there. There was the further consideration that Canada did not produce tanks and was apparently not in a position to purchase them in the United States on satisfactory terms.

20. The Prime Minister said that, as the 27th Brigade would be grouped with U.K. forces, possession of "Centurions" would be useful as facilitating maintenance of the brigade's tanks.

The F-86 project would represent a tripartite contribution to the Integrated Force.

21. Mr. Abbott considered F-86 airframes a rational contribution for Canada to make and noted that they would have to be paid for out of the overall figures eventually set for expenditures on the general defence programme in the fiscal years 1952-53 and 1953-54.

22. Mr. Claxton said that, if approved, the F-86 project was likely to become public knowledge when the U.S. government submitted its aid programme to Congress. Care would, perhaps, have to be taken in handling publicity on this project and on the tank purchase in order to avoid criticism that Canada was assisting the United Kingdom but receiving nothing in return.

23. Mr. Abbott did not believe that the two transactions would be linked in this way or that publicity need be given to the tank order which was merely one of a large number being placed under the current defence programme.

24. The Committee, after further discussion, noted the report of the Minister of National Defence and agreed that:

(a) 395 F-86 airframes, with 10% spares, be provided to the United Kingdom as mutual aid, at a cost of about $30 million in the fiscal year 1952-53 and about $41 million in 1953-54; the U.K. government to be informed accordingly;

(b) rather than pursue the question of procuring from U.S. sources the tanks required for three divisions, steps be taken to purchase, if possible, up to 280 "Centurion" tanks in the United Kingdom, on the understanding that this purchase would be on a normal commercial basis and not form part of a transaction involving the airframes mentioned in (a) or U.K. purchases of military equipment in Canada.

EXCHANGE OF VIEWS WITH STANDING GROUP ON CANADIAN FORCE CONTRIBUTIONS — STANDING GROUP PAPER MRC 5/2.†

I thought that you should be kept advised of recent exchanges of views with the Standing Group on force requirements and contributions to fill the gap and other related matters.

At its meeting on October 2nd Cabinet Defence Committee discussed Standing Group paper MRC 5/2, the report of the Working Group on filling the gap. It was understood that the Standing Group intended to send their proposals to the temporary Committee of Twelve in Paris by October 10th without submitting them first to the Military Committee. As you know, Canada objects to Standing Group proposals being put forward without proper consultation, and as the Canadian Chiefs of Staff had several objections and corrections to make in the paper, it was decided that General Foulkes should go at once to Washington to discuss the matter with the Standing Group. For the present no further comments on the report will be made in writing.

Following is an outline of the views which General Foulkes was authorized to express to the Standing Group:

(1) The Canadian position with regard to manpower, production and finance was to be discussed and, while he was neither to reject the Standing Group proposals nor commit Canada to them, General Foulkes was to indicate that the Government is prepared to consider any adaptation of its defence plans which do not require additional men or money for the present.

(2) Regarding the additional Naval contribution suggested in MRC 5/2, General Foulkes was to point out that the proposal for 22 ocean minesweepers must have been made in error. The suggested additional 6 escort vessels and 4 coastal minesweepers could not be completed by 1954 and their construction would depend on the progress of the present Naval programme.

(3) As to the additional Army contribution, it was not practicable for Canada to provide an additional one and two-thirds divisions in Europe by D plus 30. Canada might, however, be in a position to provide an additional two-thirds of a division should the Korean commitment be liquidated, this additional force to reach Europe within the time required after D-Day to move the formation overseas.

(4) As regards the Air Force proposals, the Government could not consider providing a light bomber division, but it might be possible to increase the contribution to the Integrated Force from 11 to 12 fighter squadrons and to raise the operational strength of each squadron beyond the 16 aircraft now planned. A heavy transport squadron would be available, and the Government is prepared to train as many additional aircrew as possible without further expansion of the planned training facilities.

It was stated during the discussion on the Army contribution that an additional division could be ready by D plus 180, but it was decided that General Foulkes should not mention this to the Standing Group, as the present exercise did not deal with forces that far in the future.

On the point of increasing the operational strength of the fighter squadrons, it was felt that they might be raised to 25 operational aircraft, but General Foulkes will not suggest any specific increase to the Standing Group.

It was also the opinion of the Cabinet Defence Committee that the gap-closing exercises should be considered finished after the Committee of Twelve report at the Rome meeting and the Military Committee and Council have acted on their report.

General Foulkes saw the Standing Group on October 3rd and reported on his discussions at the next meeting of the Canadian Chiefs of Staff Committee. He explained that he had had satisfactory discussions with the Standing Group at a meeting where the working team concerned with the preparation of the Standing Group paper on NATO force requirements was also present.

In regard to the army contributions the Standing Group agreed that the suggestion that Canada should provide a full division in Europe by D plus 30 was in error, as it would be militarily impossible for Canada to assemble ships and move a force of this size within thirty days after D-Day. The attention of the Standing Group was drawn to the necessity of carefully studying all the practical aspects of its suggestions before they are circulated, as errors of this kind adversely affect the Standing Group's military prestige. The meeting was told that Canada was prepared to consider the provision of one division as soon after D-Day as shipping became available but that this increased commitment could not be undertaken until after October, 1952.

Regarding the suggested increase in naval force it appeared that the Standing Group had not been clear on the construction capability of Canada in respect of escort vessels and that the ocean minesweepers had been added in error. This would be corrected.

On the subject of the air force contribution, the Standing Group expressed disappointment that Canada could not make the recommended increases. It would help if the fighter air group could be increased from 203 to 300 high-level day fighters but General Foulkes advised that this could only be accomplished by using some of the reserve aircraft intended to back up the original force of 203.

It appeared that no progress had been made by the Standing Group in allocating air training space. The Standing Group found itself in a most awkward position because while Canada was adhering to the original decision that the Standing Group would allocate all NATO training spaces, it had been decided that the allotment of U.S. spaces for NATO trainees would continue to be the responsibility of M.D.A.P. It was pointed out to the meeting that this problem could only be resolved by the Standing Group.

It was learned that the Standing Group had accepted the Canadian amendment concerning the status of the Military Representatives' Committee and planned to present it to the Military Committee as a part of a Standing Group paper. This amendment would mean that military representatives in committee or individually could deal with matters on behalf of their national chiefs of staff when specifically empowered to do so, whereas in the past some of these had been handled exclusively by the Military Committee.

It was also learned that the Standing Group had agreed that military advice to the Council Deputies should come from the twelve nations in the Military Representatives' Committee instead of from the Standing Group. It was recognized that this policy should be spelled out to ensure complete clarity on a working level.[21]

393. B.C./Vol. 102

Note du chef de l'état-major général pour le ministre de la Défense nationale

Memorandum from Chief of General Staff to Minister of National Defence

GROUPING OF CANADIAN FORCES IN EUROPE[22]

1. The decision as to whether Canadian forces allocated to the Integrated Force in Europe under General Eisenhower should be placed under UK or US command is one having repercussions extending far beyond purely military considerations of ease of maintenance. Major issues of national concern must be weighed along with the factors of immediate military expediency. The decision is one which should be made by the Canadian Government after most careful consideration of all the issues. This memorandum attempts to present those issues as the basis for a decision.

2. It is manifestly impracticable for Canada to establish a separate line of communication to maintain her forces in the European theatre either in peace or in war. Our forces must be maintained on the lines of communication of either the US or the UK, or a combination of the two. The choice for Canadian forces is therefore that of being grouped under either US or UK command.

INTERNATIONAL POLITICAL CONSIDERATIONS

[21] Pour l'étude ultérieure des contributions des forces canadiennes et les mesures prises pour combler l'écart, voir les documents 492-504.
For subsequent consideration of Canadian force contributions and the gap closing exercises, see Documents 492-504.

[22] Au sujet de la décision d'envoyer des troupes canadiennes en Europe, voir le document 375.
On the decision to send Canadian forces to Europe, see Document 375.

3. In building resistance to the expansion of Russian communism it is important to foster and maintain a "balance of power" within the western democratic alliance. Following the First World War, the term "balance of power" was represented as inferring an obsolete and dishonest system of diplomacy, antagonistic to the principles upon which international relations should be conducted in a democratic world. "Balance of power" is, in fact, essential to any democratic group of persons or nations. It implies a balancing restraint upon arbitrary unilateral action. Its practical application within NATO at the present time is to find a counter-balance to the disproportionate and preponderating power of the US. If Canada is to continue to develop as an independent nation on the North American Continent, we should be in the van of those interested in contributing to such a counter-balance. This is not intended to imply any unfriendliness to our neighbour to the south. It is merely facing the elementary facts of our situation. The US has risen to an unprecedented position of dominance in the modern world. She is still young in experience of world affairs and her policies are, at times, subject to unpredictable emotional influences. Without some balancing restraint, it is just conceivable that in the grip of sudden emotion, the US might carry the democratic world to the very debacle it is attempting to avoid in accepting the leadership of the US under the North Atlantic Treaty — namely to a third world war.

4. Nor is there any need for the issue to sharpen into a choice between domination by the USSR or domination by the US. The building of strength to check Communism is not incompatible with the development of a proper balance within the North Atlantic alliance. It is of the highest importance to foster this balance as the military strength of NATO increases. Many influential political and military leaders in the US have doubts as to the ability of American democracy to stand up to a really "long pull" — an armed truce lasting for many years accompanied by a continuous war of nerves — once sufficient strength is available to provoke a showdown.

5. It appears from every point of view that the best interests of Canada will be served by helping to provide a counter-balance to the power of the US rather than by augmenting that power. Many of the smaller NATO countries take their lead from Canada and if our contribution goes towards augmenting the power of the US theirs will go also, and we may lead a movement which will wreck all possibility of eventually establishing a balance.

6. The question for Canada to decide is whether it is in her best interests to move in a direction which may start a land-slide towards the US camp and assure the complete dominance of the US, or whether her influence should be used as one of the locking stones in building a dam against this strong pressure.

Preservation of Canadian National Identity

7. As a result of cooperation in two world wars, the British are fully conscious of the importance of respecting the national identity of Canadian forces serving with them. With an historical and traditional background of partnership in alliances and the growth of understanding of the real nature of the Commonwealth association, British leaders have learned to respect and even to be indulgent towards the national wishes and peculiarities of armed forces of other countries serving with them.

8. Most US leaders are still, even if unconsciously, forcefully crusading for the "American Way of Life", are less indulgent in accepting differences in others and, in fact, are inclined to the view that anything different is wrong and should be changed. We have had ample and recent experience of the tendency on the part of US military leaders to ignore Canadian national susceptibilities in matters concerning continental defence.

9. Canadian forces are going to be more and more closely associated with US forces in North American defence. It seems desirable that outside of North America, there should be a counter-balance to integration and absorption.

Influence on Other Members of NATO

10. In the US zone Canadian forces would be cooperating with US forces and possibly on occasions with the French. The French army is extremely sensitive to anything which savours of tutelage and it is unlikely that the presence of a Canadian element would prove any great stimulant to the tempo of French military training. In the British zone Canadian forces would be in close touch with Dutch and Belgian forces of comparable size as well as with UK forces. In the course of conversation General Eisenhower stressed the importance of stimulating morale, training and battle worthiness of the Belgian and more particularly of the Dutch forces at the present time. The prestige of the Canadian Army stands very high with both the Belgians and the Dutch. Prejudices stemming from historical background rather than from any objective consideration of present realities give rise both in Belgium and Holland to a subtle and indefinable resistance to UK leadership. The presence of a Canadian brigade to set an example in vigorous military training might well spark the Belgian and Dutch military efforts into far greater and more realistic activity. This consideration alone would provide an adequate explanation to the US as to why we are not grouping our forces with theirs, should Canada's decision lead to this conclusion.

Relations with German Population and Europeans

11. The relations between the German population and occupying troops are better in the British zone than in the American, though in the latter zone they have lately improved. The large influx of partially trained American troops within the next few months is likely to result in a new deterioration. The reputation of Canadian forces for good conduct and discipline stands at a high level throughout Western Europe and in terms of relationships both with the Germans and with our allies it is most desirable that this reputation should be maintained. Regardless of the extent to which strictures on the discipline of US troops, as compared to those of other countries, may be justified, it is inevitable that as representatives of the major and dominating member of NATO, they will be the main target for criticism by Europeans. If Canadian forces are grouped with those of the US, Canadians will fall heir to such criticism. Having regard to the role of stimulating European morale, in the event that the present tension continues and related to the "long pull", it is highly important that good relations should exist both with our European allies and the Germans.

SIGNIFICANCE OF THE CANADIAN CONTRIBUTION

12. In comparison with the US forces in Europe, the Canadian contribution will be numerically insignificant. In the event of war this disparity would become even greater.

13. Though in terms of the peacetime strength of forces the British contribution on the continent is comparable to the US and numerically the disparity in the Canadian contribution will appear almost as great as in contrast with the US forces, in war the Canadian contribution would be highly significant. The UK would definitely want the physical contribution that Canada could make. The US attitude is one of helpful friendliness which suggests that to the US the Canadian contribution is not significant in a material sense but is appreciated as a token of allied cooperation and acceptance of their leadership.

Sentiment Within the Canadian Army

14. There is no doubt that the Canadian Army would prefer to be grouped under British command. Canadian officers and men have confidence in the professional capacity and skill of British commanders and feel with every good reason that the British are fully cognizant of the importance of observing the national identity of a Canadian force. The decision to group the 25 Canadian Infantry Brigade in the Commonwealth Division in the Far East was enthusiastically received throughout the whole Canadian Army.

15. If Canadian forces are grouped with British forces it represents merely the continuation of an association which has existed in two world wars and which has been profitable and deeply satisfying to both parties. To group with the US forces now means severing a past connection and establishing a new. Both in UK and among the other Commonwealth countries, this will be interpreted as a drift from that association at a time when it is in greatest need of support. Canadian statesmen have reiterated on numerous occasions that it is Canadian policy to support the Commonwealth. The grouping of Canadian forces in Europe with those of the US will certainly be widely interpreted as a change from such a policy and as implying on Canada's part some loss of confidence in the practical value of the Commonwealth association.

Command, Staff Training and Tactics

16. There is an eminently practical aspect growing out of this historical association. The Canadian Army trained in the past and fought in the last war on tactics, staff training and command procedures, for practical purposes identical with those of the British Army. Canadian Army organization is similar to the British Army, which even some senior US officers admit is more economical and more efficient than their own. The psychological outlook of the Canadian officer is more akin to the British than to the US. It was the experience in the last war, and has been in Korea, that US commanders, coming from a nation with large resources of manpower and great manufacturing potential incline to be more prodigal of both manpower and equipment in the conduct of operations. Since the First World War, the British have had to husband their resources, and will usually achieve the same result with smaller losses, making up for lack of numbers and lavish supplies of equipment, by careful operational planning and close tactical integration of all arms and weapons. The British economize by teaching a high standard of care and maintenance of equipment, and abuse or abandonment of equipment is treated with severity. The Americans tend to the attitude of expendability of equipment and "there's lots more where that one came from". It is obviously to the advantage of the Canadian Army to adhere to a tactical doctrine which stresses high operational efficiency with a view to economizing both in manpower and material.

17. Though since the last war much greater emphasis has been placed upon the teachings of US as well as British staff and command procedures in our active force, Canadian trained reserves represented by officers and men who served during the last war are familiar only with British practice.

THE PROBLEM OF MAINTENANCE

18. Though the 27 Canadian Infantry Brigade which is being raised for service in Europe is to be equipped with US type of equipment (except for motor transport), should an emergency arise within the next 18 months and Canada be called upon to fulfil her commitment to provide two divisions in the first twelve months of war, these divisions would have to proceed overseas with UK type of equipment. Our only existing mobilization plan, resting upon tripartite planning before NATO came into being, is based upon the grouping of Canadian Army forces under UK command, and these plans include detailed studies and tentative agreement between the Canadian Army and the War Office as to the provision of administrative units by each party to maintain Canadian forces in operations. This arrangement is highly advantageous to Canada from the point of view of manpower overhead in rearward echelons, and it would take a long time and detailed international staff studies to reach a similar arrangement with the US Army.

19. The regrouping of the Integrated Forces in Europe is under consideration at the highest levels at the present time. At the moment the British forces, with the Dutch and Belgians under command, are in the northern sector, extending from the North Sea roughly to a line including the Ruhr and passing north of Kassel. The UK communications are designed in war to run from Antwerp towards Gladbach. The central sector bounded by a line excluding the Ruhr but including Kassel in the north to, roughly, the line Frankfort-Fulda in the south, is occupied by a mixture of French and American troops. The southern sector, from the Frankfort-Fulda to the Swiss Alps, is also occupied by a mixture of French and American troops. The present dispositions are based more upon available accommodation than upon considerations of strategy. The US communications, designed to run from Bordeaux to Metz, cut across the communications which would have to maintain the French armies in operations. It is the view of the US General Staff that national forces should be regrouped to place all the US forces in the central sector with their communications running from Metz up the Moselle Valley. The southern sector would be the responsibility of the French forces. This would result in a better alignment in the communications supporting both. If this regrouping takes place it would eventually bring the communications maintaining the UK and US forces closer together and would ease the problem of maintaining Canadian forces regardless of the command under which they were grouped. It would be highly desirable if the arrangements made permitted our forces to be served by either the UK or the US lines of communication. At the present time, of course, UK forces are being maintained from Hamburg and US forces from Bremerhaven, so that no immediate obstacles should arise in maintaining 27 Brigade in peacetime.

Geographical Location

20. If the Canadian brigade serves under American command in the US zone of Germany two alternative locations are offered:

(a) In the area of Kassel on the extreme northern limit of the central sector next to the British zone and in direct contact with the Russian zone.

(b) On the extreme southern edge of the US zone south of Munich and again in an area nearest to the Russian zone. Either of these locations would ensure the Canadian brigade being immediately involved should the Russians make an aggressive move.

21. If located in the British zone the Canadian brigade would be positioned on the east bank of the Rhine just north of the Ruhr available in an emergency to man a lay back position on the west bank of the Rhine. This would be a much better operational position for the brigade and in addition it would have better access to training areas and better training facilities than in either of the areas proposed in the US zone.

ADMINISTRATIVE MANPOWER COMMITMENT

22. Whatever arrangements are finally decided upon, it should be made clear that the maintenance of a Canadian force abroad will always entail a small administrative "tail" to ensure the timely delivery of distinctively Canadian items of supply. This will apply to Canadian uniforms and items of dress and in the case of 27 Canadian Infantry Brigade will apply to motor transport. In other words, it will probably never be feasible to have the Canadian supply line absorbed completely into that of any other country.

23. The details of the administrative arrangements for 27 Canadian Infantry Brigade can, of course, not be made firm until the major decision has been taken, but it would appear that the supplementary detachments and liaison sections would require about the same numbers and types of officers and men whether our communications run through British or American channels.

Maintenance of Equipment

24. Unless the American forces are concentrated in the central sector next to the UK forces the maintenance of equipment would be easier if the Canadian Brigade is grouped under US command. The present controversy over small arms has a bearing on the equipment problem. If Canada decides to adopt the .30 the advantage would lie from the equipment point of view in grouping with the US forces. If Canada decides to adopt the .280, or to await more conclusive tests for the .280 and retain the .303 in the interim period, the advantage would lie in favour of being grouped with the British forces. Canadian type vehicles with 27 Brigade will remain a Canadian responsibility in any case, and will account for the greater part of the repair work. In the longer term both the Dutch and Belgian forces are converting to the US type of equipment, though they will continue to operate under British command. In this event the maintenance of the Canadian brigade in US type of equipment whilst grouped under British command would provide no insurmountable obstacles.

Financial Considerations

25. It is desirable that the cost of maintenance of the Canadian brigade overseas should be financed by capitation rate arrangements payable to the US or UK government, whichever is responsible for maintenance. The situation vis-à-vis US dollar exchange would appear to favour the grouping with British forces where payment would be in sterling (even though the capitation rate offered by the US may be less).

Dependents

26. The location of dependents of soldiers serving in Europe is a most aggravating problem to both the US and UK forces. It is of particular concern to the US forces in the light of their policy of maintaining married personnel abroad for a year and single for two years. The despatch of a Canadian brigade to Europe without making provision for dependents accompanying the troops will create a precedent. Apart from National Service men, UK personnel posted to Germany are sent there for long service, many have been serving there for 6 to 7 years. The inclusion of dependents is more justified under such conditions than it is in the US zone, where personnel are posted for short service only. The dependents problem is less likely to cause us difficulties if our troops are serving in the British zone rather than in the American zone where troops are serving under similar conditions but are permitted to have dependents with them.

THE TIME FACTOR

27. Whether it is decided to group the Canadian brigade with the UK or US forces, 4 to 6 months notice is required to the military authorities concerned with making arrangements. An early decision is therefore required as to the date on which the 27 Canadian Infantry Brigade is to proceed to Europe and the command with which it is to be grouped on its arrival there.

28. When the decision was made to raise the 27 Canadian Infantry Brigade and the second line companies to provide rotational personnel, it was made clear that if these troops wintered in Canada they would fill all available winter accommodation. Should the truce in Korea materialize and a decision be taken to repatriate part or whole of the 25 Canadian Infantry Brigade the public demand that those troops released should be returned to Canada before Christmas is likely to become irresistible. Though it might be desirable to release from the service the personnel of the 25 Canadian Infantry Brigade who are still on a short service engagement there is a high proportion which still wishes to continue serving, and accommodation may become an acute problem this winter unless the 27 Canadian Infantry Brigade is despatched overseas. There is a moral commitment to make this brigade available to the Integrated Forces of General Eisenhower during 1951.

Importance of the Present Decision

29. It is critically important that the decision taken concerning the grouping of 27 Canadian Infantry Brigade be a decision which will continue to be valid in the event of war when our forces in Europe can be expected to increase greatly. Once the command and administrative machinery has become settled and is working smoothly for 27 Canadian Infantry Brigade it will be relatively easy to build on that foundation to care for a larger number of troops. It would prove difficult and probably impossible in a sudden emergency to transpose our forces with their lengthy communications to another command and another supply system. Furthermore, the larger the Canadian force involved, the more administratively self-contained will it become. For this reason, it would be wise to make the present decision in the light of long term possibilities as influenced by major national factors and not to permit any immediate local administrative factors to weigh unduly in the balance.

30. It appears that when the decision was made to convert the Canadian Army to US type equipment, it was accepted that on that account alone any Canadian forces allocated to the Integrated Forces in Europe should be based upon the US lines of communication and be placed under US command. To this end, informal approaches were made to General Collins, Chief of Staff US Army to ascertain whether the US Army would house and maintain a Canadian brigade group in the US zone of Germany. General Collins agreed that this could be done if Canada wished it. From recent conversations, this agreement was only tentative and is not irrevocable should it now be decided to change the Canadian grouping. However, in the light of the trouble taken by the US Army to study our needs, it is entitled to some explanation should a decision now be made to group with the British, Dutch and Belgians. It is considered that there is an adequate explanation in the morale aspect underlying the decision to despatch Canadian forces to Europe at this time. Taking all factors into consideration, we can make a more useful contribution to enhancing the morale of European allies by grouping with the British, Dutch and Belgians, than by association with the US and French forces, the former of which needs no stimulant, and the latter of which would be most unlikely to accept it.

RECOMMENDATION

30. Taking all factors into consideration it is recommended that the 27 Canadian Infantry Brigade Group be despatched to Europe in October 1951, that it be grouped under British command in Germany where it will be serving in cooperation with British, Dutch and Belgian troops, and that the UK and US governments be informed of this decision forthwith.

Note du sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures pour le secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

TOP SECRET [Ottawa], July 31, 1951

GROUPING OF CANADIAN FORCES IN EUROPE

Attached is a memorandum prepared by General Simonds. It is a powerfully written document and deserves careful reading in full.

2. In very brief, the argument is that it is desirable to maintain a balance of power within NATO; that the best way to do this is to strengthen the forces which would be associated with the United Kingdom, Belgium and the Netherlands; that the Canadian association with these forces would tend to preserve this balance of power; that Canadian identity would be better preserved in this way than if Canadian forces were associated with those of the United States, which would so greatly overshadow the Canadian forces in numbers; that we would have more confidence that Canadian forces would be used more economically under British than under American command; that, from the standpoint of supply, it would be feasible to associate Canadian forces with the British, even if Canadian forces were using mainly United States type equipment — in any event, Belgian and Netherlands forces are likely to be in much the same position.

3. General Simonds' paper raises important questions bearing upon Canada's relations with the United States, the Commonwealth and our NATO allies. In this note, only these international political aspects of the paper will be considered as the military and other factors do not directly concern this Department. The general political arguments put in paragraphs 3 to 6 of General Simonds' paper are very much in line with the development of our own thinking at the official level. General Simonds puts very succinctly the argument for a balance of power within the North Atlantic Alliance. Our experience in the last year or two has shown the value of such groupings which can from time to time influence the course of United States policy in a way which no one country could hope to do alone in view of the overwhelming power of the United States. This has been true of groupings within the United Nations and within NATO. It is also an argument for the continued usefulness from a practical political point of view of the Commonwealth. It is not, of course, suggested that such groupings should be designed to obstruct United States policies and purposes. Their value, however, is increasingly apparent in acting as a curb upon precipitate decision and in giving the United States Government an opportunity to hear and consider the points of view of its more important allies. In the long term, there is little doubt that there cannot be a healthy organization of the Western World without these balances to United States power. Without them the United States would be dealing individually with "clients" dependent upon United States aid, militarily and economically. This would be unhealthy both for the United States and the rest of the Western Allies.

4. It may be considered at first sight that these general considerations are fairly far removed from the concrete question of the grouping of Canada's forces in Europe. The disposition of our forces in Europe cannot, however, be considered simply as a practical operation. Whether we wish it or not, both in the United Kingdom and in other Commonwealth countries, there will be some tendency to see in our grouping with United States forces the severing of a Commonwealth link. Yet it would be a pity if the realistic political argument were to become interwoven with sentimental considerations and to raise old controversies and prejudices in the form of a discussion as to whether we preferred the "British or American connection". (Incidentally, it is only too probable that if Mr. Shinwell and some of his senior service advisers enter the discussion, they will contrive to give it this twist and thus to obscure the real issue.) For while there is a case at this time for avoiding any action which may seem to weaken the Commonwealth vis-à-vis the United States, this case does not rest on sentimental grounds nor is it restricted to the Commonwealth.

5. The argument in favour of the Canadian forces overseas being grouped with the forces of the United Kingdom, Belgium and the Netherlands rather than with those of the United States and France has a bearing on our relations with the Continental European countries concerned. The most important case is that of France. The French are the most sensitive of all the nations of the European Continent to the possibility of United States domination. For all their recognition of the importance of the United States to their own survival, there is no doubt that their relations with us are more cordial and that they have treated us with greater confidence in the past than either the United Kingdom or the United States. We have a special position in France as is demonstrated by the reception given to the Prime Minister when he visited Paris and by the increased importance which the Quai d'Orsay attributes to Franco-Canadian relations. The Canadian army had indeed a unique place in the regard of the French people. The French have since the war come to understand the international position of Canada. The grouping of Canadian forces with United Kingdom forces would cause no misunderstanding on this ground in France. On the other hand, the grouping of Canadian troops with United States troops would not be so readily understood. In fact, it is to be feared that our contribution would be quite submerged in the eyes of the French and of our other European friends in the vaster mass of the United States forces. Unfortunately also the United States forces in Europe are very far from popular in France. Most recent reports agree that this trend in French public opinion is on the increase.

6. The political argument against Canadian troops being grouped with United States troops is also strong so far as Germany is concerned. United States policy towards Germany may in the course of the next four or five years give rise to considerable differences of opinion within the Allies. The tempo of rearmament of Germany, the decision as to the restoration to Germany of her full sovereign rights, the possible admission of Germany to NATO, these are all questions to which the Germans are acutely sensitive and to which the French and other European allies are equally sensitive. We shall have to steer a difficult course on these subjects. It is particularly desirable that we should not appear to the Germans in any role which suggests that we are "United States satellites". They are more easily impressed by military dispositions and more ignorant of Canadian policy and position than our European allies. From the German point of view, if our forces grouped with those of the United States, they might appear as a mere minor adjunct of the United States power.

7. A positive advantage of our grouping with the Netherlands and Belgian forces would be that it follows our natural tendency to align ourselves with these middle powers who are so often associated with us politically and over whom we have considerable influence. There is little doubt that the Canadian forces overseas would have their maximum political and psychological usefulness in an association with the forces of the Netherlands and Belgium. General Simonds' recommendation that the morale effect of our grouping with these two countries should be put forward to the United States as the grounds for our decision seems an excellent one and should appeal to the United States who are concerned about the morale of these countries.

8. There is no doubt that the decision as to the grouping of our forces will have a considerable political and psychological effect on our relations with the European peoples and governments. It is particularly important that Canada whose separate national identity has only really penetrated the European mind in the years since 1939 should reappear on the European military scene in a way which does not give us the appearance of being a mere unit of United States power — and a small one at that. It may also be important from the point of view of public opinion in this country that the many forms of United States military activity on Canadian soil for the defence of this continent should be balanced by a decision to avoid the grouping of our forces in Europe with those of the United States.

Note du président du Comité des chefs d'état-major

Memorandum by Chairman, Chiefs of Staff Committee

CGS PAPER 16 JUL 51

Para 2

1. I entirely agree that it is most impractical to maintain a separate L of C.[23] Even when the Canadian Army was at its peak of five divisions, it was maintained on the British L of C.

Para 3

2. I am not in agreement with the concept of balance of power within NATO: surely the Canadian position within NATO must be judged on the merits of each case and not on any idea of acting either for or against the US. The main reason for [23] Line of Communication.

US domination in NATO is because she is the one country who can afford at this time to assist the others by reason of her internal strength and prosperity. It should therefore behoove the one country who does not need US help (Canada) to always strive in any way she can to merge and reconcile the differences of points of view that may arise from time to time within NATO. This can best be achieved by not aligning ourselves with any particular group of nations but considering and deciding our course of action on each problem as it arises on its own merits. If there is a divergence of opinion between two major factions, we should do our best to bring together the two points of view. I cannot subscribe to the adoption of any other policy in our NATO discussions.

Influence of Other NATO Countries

3. It has been my experience that the best way to assist the other NATO countries, especially the smaller nations, is by maintaining our entirely independent position and not aligning ourselves with either of the higher powers.

Significance of Canadian Contribution

4. Surely what is to be aimed at in NATO is an integrated force under a unified command and not a group of national forces clinging onto the US or UK Army Group. The real criterion is where can we make the greatest contribution with the smallest expenditure of men and material.

Command — Staff Training and Tactics

5. While it is true that in the past we have used UK command system, training methods and tactics, we have long since realized that sooner or later we must be capable of fighting with US forces, if Canada should be attacked. We have constantly urged the adoption of a unified system of command and training. This will likely be produced by SHAPE. There is a great deal to be said for Canadians learning more about US methods and perhaps urging the Americans to adopt certain UK methods which we consider better than their methods.

The Problem of Maintenance

6. This is the most important factor in this discussion. As stated, the 27th Brigade will be equipped with US type equipment. I do not agree with the statement "except for motor transport". The 25th Brigade is equipped with US vehicles and, as far as I am aware, the 27th will have to be equipped with either vehicles purchased from the US, or US type vehicles assembled in Canada. There is no thought of ever equipping the Canadian troops with UK type vehicles.

7. I cannot visualize a Canadian Brigade with US equipment and vehicles being maintained on a per diem rate by a British L of C. Even in the last war when we were completely on UK types (except for clothing), it was necessary to maintain a fairly large group of Canadian Ordnance in the UK depots to ensure the Canadian troops were maintained.

8. The original concept, which was presented to the Cabinet Defence Committee, was for a Canadian Brigade Group or Regimental Combat Team to be stationed in Germany under US command. The US was to maintain the Group as an American formation, providing all facilities required in a similar manner to that provided at Fort Lewis. This included American Rations, use of P.X., training ammunition, and complete maintenance on a per diem rate. The concept was that no Canadian Maintenance Group would be required but Canadian uniforms, etc., would be put in the US pipeline.

9. The US would be asked to make transport arrangements at both ends similar to that made for Korea. Our experience with such an arrangement has been quite successful. Our troops prefer American rations to British rations which are now unacceptable to Canadians. The Canadians never liked the NAFFI in war and much prefer the P.X. and U.S. entertainment arrangements.

Conclusion

10. If the factors raised by the CGS are considered to outweigh the disadvantages of trying to maintain a Canadian Brigade on US equipment in the British Zone, I would recommend consideration be given to reversing the decision to adopt US equipment and revert to UK types. I can see nothing but confusion and a extravagant waste of manpower in attempting to maintain a force on US equipment on a British L of C.

11. As this matter was originally discussed at CDC I would suggest that the matter should finally go to CDC for discussion.[24]

Extract from Minutes of Meeting of Cabinet Defence Committee

I. CANADIAN ARMY AND AIR FORCE CONTRIBUTIONS TO THE INTEGRATED FORCE; GROUPING UNDER SACEUR; DESPATCH OF 27TH BRIGADE

1. The Minister of National Defence said that it was necessary to decide whether the 27th Canadian Infantry Brigade should be sent to Europe and, if so, when. It had been raised to meet the Canadian commitment, under the Medium Term Defence Plan, respecting land forces for the Integrated Force. On January 30th, 1951, the Speech from the Throne had indicated that the assent of Parliament would be sought at an early date for Canadian participation in the Integrated Force.[25] Action to that end had been delayed owing to the changed complexion of the war in Korea resulting from Chinese intervention.

There were already 4 U.S. divisions in Europe, and 2 more would follow very shortly. This force would represent 18 times the strength of the 27th Brigade. Altogether there would be some 250,000 U.S. Army and 60 - 70,000 U.S. Air Force personnel in Europe. There were 2 1/2 U.K. divisions in the Integrated Force and a further 1 1/2 would be added before the end of 1951.

There is no record of this original discussion in the minutes of the Cabinet Defence Committee for 1951.

The Canadian manpower situation was good — much better than had been anticipated. The 25th Brigade in Korea had not suffered anything like the casualties expected. There were 6,000 men in action in the Far East, with some 1,500 reinforcements in the theatre and 3,000 in Canada which alone would probably be enough replacements for Korea for a year. There were enough men for rotation to Korea as it was planned to rotate units of the Mobile Striking Force, gradually giving the whole permanent force experience abroad. As the strength of the 27th Brigade now stood at about 10,500, of which about 6,000 could be despatched to Europe and 4,000 would be ready for rotation a year later, there were enough troops to meet the Canadian contribution to the Integrated Force, in present conditions, for about 2 years. With 6,000 men in action in Korea and another 6,000 men in Europe, there were today another 13,000 officers and men in units or schools available for reinforcement and rotation. Further, recruiting was satisfactory except as regards specialists.

If the Korean war ended shortly, those of the 25th Brigade who had enlisted to serve 18 months and had not re-engaged would be released. Probably more than 50% would want to stay on. This winter there would be accommodation in Canada for only 36,000, and this only on the basis of double bunking and dispersal in small groups. There would thus be obvious difficulties in having both the 25th and 27th Brigades winter here.

It was considered desirable to allocate the 27th Brigade to the Integrated Force and to despatch it in November in view of the foregoing considerations, for reasons of morale, to permit continuation of training in proper climatic conditions and as NATO now expected the force to be sent as soon as possible.

An early decision was required on the grouping of the brigade, for purposes of command, with the U.K. or U.S. components of the Integrated Force and on whether it should be based on U.K. or U.S. lines of communication.

He outlined the contents of a paper prepared on these questions.

The Paris Plan, discussed at the meeting of June 29th, 1951, had called for the R.C.A.F. contribution to the Integrated Force to be grouped with the U.S.A.F. and to use the U.S.A.F. supply organization to the maximum.[26] Negotiations had since been completed for the development of this arrangement.

Certain political factors, notably the desirability of maintaining the identity of the Canadian land forces in Europe, made it appear desirable to group these forces with the U.K. rather than the U.S. forces under SACEUR.

From the military point of view there were three alternatives for the grouping and maintenance of the Canadian Army in Europe: grouping under U.K. command with the United Kingdom responsible for maintaining the Canadian force on U.S.-type equipment; grouping under U.S. command with the United States responsible for maintaining the forces on such equipment; and grouping under either U.K. or U.S. command with Canada responsible for maintaining the force.

The advantages of grouping under U.K. command were that the Canadian Army had confidence in U.K. commanders; it had used similar tactics and staff and command procedures during the war; its organization was similar to that of the United Kingdom and was more efficient and economical than that of the United States; the United Kingdom recognized the importance of respecting the national identity of Canadian forces; and, in the U.K. zone of Germany, the Canadian force would probably be just north of the Ruhr, available to man a position on the west bank of the Rhine, would have better training facilities than in the U.S. zone and would be adjacent to the Belgian and Netherlands forces.

A disadvantage of such grouping was that, while the U.S.-type equipment needed by Canadian forces could be drawn from U.S. depots in the theatre and made available through the U.K. supply system, special arrangements would have to be made for heavy repairs of such equipment. The War Office had, however, been asked if it could maintain the 27th Brigade in the U.K. zone.

The advantages of grouping under U.S. command were that the supply and maintenance of U.S.-type equipment would be easier and more economical; Canadian troops assigned to North American defence would in any case have to train and co-operate with U.S. troops; grouping with U.S. forces in Europe would reduce the problem of reconciling, in North American operations, differences in certain equipment and methods; and the U.S. forces would provide rations and amenities of types to which Canadians were more accustomed.

A disadvantage was that, if the 27th Brigade were in the U.S. zone, it would probably be in one of two positions adjacent to the Russian zone.

The alternative of a purely Canadian supply line to maintain relatively small forces would be costly and might not be reliable in all circumstances.

Apart from the above considerations, if, in a war within 18 months, Canada carried out the present plan to provide 2 divisions within the first 12 months of hostilities, these might have to be despatched with U.K.-type equipment, and simplicity of maintenance would then be achieved by grouping with the U.K. forces for which plans had been prepared with the War Office. If there were no war within 18 months, any forces mobilized subsequently would have U.S.-type equipment, and ease of maintenance would then suggest grouping the Canadian forces under U.S. command. Grouping with U.K. forces would, however, not pose insuperable difficulties as there would be many items of U.S.-type equipment in general use in the European theatre and these could be supplied to the Canadian Army under the theatre arrangements for distribution of such equipment.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated.

(Minister's memorandum, August 27th, 1951, "Canadian Army contribution to Integrated Force; grouping under SACEUR; despatch of 27th Canadian Infantry Brigade" — Cabinet Document D-295)†

2. Mr. Claxton, referring to a statement in the document that, if Canadian forces were grouped with U.S. forces, Europeans would identify them with such forces, said that this might be equally true of grouping with U.K. forces.

3. The Prime Minister, stating that there were recent indications that even some leading European statesmen still regarded Canada as a dependency of the United Kingdom, suggested that it was important not to miss any opportunity of making it clear to Europeans that there had been important modifications in Canada's position as a nation.

4. Mr. Claxton said that he had found that European military leaders had a clear understanding that Canada was an independent nation.

It was now a question whether the choice on the question of grouping outlined in his department's paper was in fact still open to the government. The question of accommodation in Germany had been explored with both the United States and the United Kingdom. Some time ago, the former had expressed a willingness to receive the 27th Brigade in Germany in November. Major-General Smith had, however, just reported from London that the War Office had indicated that it could not accommodate the brigade in Germany for another 6 to 8 months, but that it would be happy to accommodate it temporarily in the United Kingdom at any time. On the question of maintenance, it had replied that it was prepared to maintain the brigade, both in the United Kingdom and subsequently in Germany, and anticipated no insurmountable difficulties in this connection. Thus, if the brigade were to be sent to Germany in November, the only choice open might well be to group it with the U.S. forces. Whatever decision was taken as to grouping should be considered as subject to review from time to time. During the war forces of all nations had been frequently re-grouped.

5. The Chief of the General Staff said that General Handy had informed him in Germany in June that the U.S. Army there would require 4 to 6 months' notice to make accommodation available for the brigade.

6. The Chairman, Chiefs of Staff Committee said that, on August 25th, General Marshall had intimated that General Collins might be able to arrange for the U.S. Army to accommodate the brigade in November.

7. Mr. St-Laurent thought that it would not be satisfactory to station the brigade for a period in the United Kingdom in peacetime and, on the question of grouping in Germany, that, if the men of the brigade did not have rations and amenities equal to those of the U.S. forces, they would be likely to spread dissatisfaction when rotated to Canada. In war, Canadian troops would prefer being with the U.K. forces but, under present conditions in Europe, they would be more concerned with physical comforts. If the Canadian troops were stationed for the present with the U.S. forces, there would presumably be re-groupings in the interests of efficiency in the event of war.

8. General Simonds said that if the Russians attacked there would be no opportunity for re-grouping until a stable front was established. In June, the U.S. authorities in Germany had offered accommodation for the brigade in the Kassel area. This, while in direct contact with the Russian zone, would be satisfactory if still available, having the advantage of being between the U.S. and U.K. forces. The brigade would deteriorate if it wintered in Canada.

9. Mr. St-Laurent said that, as the troops should not remain in Canada, it appeared unlikely that there would be accommodation in the British zone before spring and there was uncertainty as to whether there would be accommodation in November in the Kassel area, which was considered satisfactory, the prospects of reasonably satisfactory facilities in either zone should be further explored as soon as possible.

10. General Foulkes said that General Eisenhower was pressing for an indication as to when the brigade would arrive and that there might, for reasons of accommodation, be pressure to station the brigade in Norway if a decision were delayed. He hoped, therefore, that it would be possible for the Committee to agree to inform the Supreme Commander that the government desired to despatch the brigade in November.

11. The Secretary of State for External Affairs doubted, in the light of existing information regarding accommodation, the advisability of agreeing that the brigade be sent to either the U.K. or U.S. zone in November if accommodation could be found in either. It might be satisfactory to send the brigade to the U.S. zone until spring. However, the alternative of stationing the force in Northern Europe temporarily perhaps deserved some consideration. It was already arranged that the R.C.A.F. contribution be grouped with the U.S.A.F. There would be advantages in not grouping the whole Canadian contribution to the Integrated Force with the U.S. forces.

12. Mr. Claxton thought that, if the brigade spent the winter in the U.S. zone, it would probably be possible to move it to the U.K. zone later.

13. General Simonds said that, an accommodation in Western Europe was heavily committed, he doubted that such re-grouping could be carried out in 1952.

14. The Committee, after further discussion, noted the recommendations of the Minister of National Defence regarding the despatch of the 27th Canadian Infantry Brigade Group to the Integrated Force and the grouping of the Canadian Army in Europe with, and its maintenance by, the U.K. or U.S. forces in Germany, and:

(a) agreed that:

(i) the 27th Brigade be despatched to Germany in November, 1951, assuming that satisfactory facilities were obtained for it by that time with either the U.S. or U.K. forces;

(ii) General Eisenhower be informed accordingly in confidence;

(iii) whether the brigade were grouped with the U.S. or the U.K. forces during the winter, the question of grouping and maintenance of the Canadian Army contribution to the Integrated Force would be open to review whenever necessary;

(b) noted with approval the Minister's report that arrangements had been completed for the R.C.A.F. contribution to the Integrated Force to be grouped with the U.S.A.F. and to make maximum use of the U.S.A.F. supply organization.

NATO EUROPEAN INTEGRATED FORCE; DISPATCH OF 27TH BRIGADE

23. The Minister of National Defence said that Cabinet Defence Committee had discussed the question of dispatching the 27th Canadian Infantry Brigade to the NATO European Integrated Force. It appeared desirable for a number of reasons and had so been agreed by the committee that the brigade be dispatched to Europe in November.

There was some difficulty, however, in reaching a decision as to whether the brigade should be stationed with and maintained by U.K. or U.S. forces in Germany. There appeared to be advantages and disadvantages to both courses of action.

After considering all aspects of the problem, the Committee had agreed that:

(a) the 27th Brigade be dispatched to Germany in November, 1951, assuming that satisfactory facilities were obtained for it by that time with either the U.S. or U.K. forces;

(b) General Eisenhower be informed accordingly, in confidence; and,

(c) whether the brigade were grouped with U.S. or U.K. forces during the winter, the question of grouping and maintenance of the Canadian Army contribution to the Integrated Force would be open to review whenever necessary.

24. Mr. Claxton added that there were now approximately 13,000 men available as reinforcements for both the 25th Brigade in Korea and the 27th Brigade to be dispatched to the Integrated Force. Both the United Kingdom and the United States would have fulfilled their obligations in respect of the Integrated Force by this autumn. The 27th Brigade was at the present time about half trained and it would be preferable if such training could be completed in Europe rather than under Canadian winter conditions. For these and other reasons, it seemed clear that it would be advisable to dispatch the 27th Brigade as recommended.

Insofar as rotation was concerned, it was intended that single men should serve for two years and married men for one year before being returned to Canada. It was not intended to provide married quarters for Canadian troops in Europe, although it was understood that the United States were providing such quarters for all officers and for non-commissioned officers down to and including the rank of staff sergeant.

25. The Minister of Finance pointed out that, whether Canadian troops were stationed with U.S. or U.K. groups, a per capita payment would have to be made either to the United States or to the United Kingdom in respect of Canadian military personnel. Balance of payments considerations would make it preferable to station Canadian troops in the U.K. sector. However, this did not appear to be a serious factor nor one which need weigh too heavily in the decision ultimately reached.

26. The Prime Minister was of opinion that the Canadian troops would prefer to serve under U.K. command in the event active hostilities broke out in Europe. However, it was to be hoped that such would not be the case for some time to come and, in the circumstances, it might be preferable to arrange for the stationing of Canadian personnel in one of the United States sectors in order that Canadian soldiers might have the benefit of U.S. rations and amenities, which were closer to Canadian standards than those normally provided by the United Kingdom. If, as was hoped, hostilities could be averted in Europe, it was important that the morale of Canadian troops be maintained at the highest level.

27. Senator Robertson thought that the married quarters privileges to be extended to U.S. troops might cause some difficulties if similar privileges were denied Canadian military personnel and the latter were stationed in U.S. sectors.

28. Mr. Claxton suggested that it would be advantageous if General Eisenhower could indicate his preference as to the stationing of Canadian troops on the basis of military efficiency and requirements.

29. The Cabinet, after considerable further discussion, agreed that:

(a) General Eisenhower be approached informally to ascertain whether he had any views as to the stationing of Canadian troops; and,

(b) final decision as to the grouping of the 27th Brigade within the European Integrated Force be taken by the Minister of National Defence in the light of the discussion.

1. Visited SACEUR today accompanied by Moncel. He and Gen Gruenther were present during discussion.

2. SACEUR opened conversation by confirming that the move of 27 CIB did not in any way conflict with presently planned build-ups. He then went on to state that he recommended that 27 CIB should be placed in the UK Zone for the following reasons:

[27] Non retrouvé./Not located.

(a) The present disposition of allied forces leaves a weakness in the centre, ie, the Frankfurt-Kassel gap. Presently planned build-ups will eventually alleviate this position. In the meantime any available additional forces which could be placed north or south of this area would greatly strengthen those flanks. The ultimate accommodation which will be made available for 27 CIB is well situated on the north flank of this gap in the area Iserlohn-Soest. The accommodation which could be provided for 27 CIB in the US Zone is too far to the south to be of tactical advantage re the central weakness.

(b) There is a preponderance of armour over infantry in the UK Zone where additional infantry is required to provide a better balance.

(c) Both the temporary UK accommodation in the Hanover area as well as the suggested permanent accommodation indicated above are ideally situated for field training, being adjacent to the Paderborn training area. The accommodation available in the US Zone was not satisfactory from the point of view of training areas.

(d) The locating of 27 CIB in the UK Zone would have a very great morale effect on both Dutch and Belgian Forces.

(e) The psychological importance of the continued association of UK and Canadian Forces.

(f) The very strong desire on the part of the UK to have the 27 CIB located in the UK Zone.

3. SACEUR pointed out that his recommendation that 27 CIB should go to the UK Zone could be used officially and publicly as might be desired by you or the Canadian Government.

4. Dependent on Canadian acceptance of SACEUR's recommendation he suggested that Ottawa should advise the Standing Group of the final Canadian decision. On receipt of this decision at SHAPE SACEUR would officially advise CINCLANDCENT, BAOR and EUCOM. In the meantime the following message is being sent to these Commands:

Quote. After due consideration of the factors involved, pending formal Canadian governmental agreement, it is the decision of SACEUR that the Canadian Brigade be deployed to the Northern Army Sector. The military representative of the Canadian Government has been so informed this date. Following Canadian governmental decision, direct communication is authorized between representatives of the Canadian Government, CINCLANDCENT, BAOR and EUCOM, for the purpose of finalizing detailed arrangements. It is requested that this Headquarters be kept informed as to the progress of such arrangements. Unquote.

An additional paragraph is being added to this message requesting commands to maintain security of this information until the Canadian Government decision is announced.

5. He also suggested that if the Canadian Government accepted his recommendation you should feel free to communicate at once with Field Marshal Slim in the event that you might wish to express your appreciation of his offer.

6. SACEUR felt that there was no requirement in so far as SHAPE was concerned for a formal approach on the problem of locating 27 CIB as you suggested in your telephone conversation.

7. He stated that he would take very personal interest in the arrival of 27 CIB and the provision of accommodation and suggested that you might wish to make an early visit to inspect the area and accommodation which he had recommended.

8. With reference to the proposal to align the RCAF contribution with that of the USAF as outlined in the Paris Plan, SACEUR gave his whole-hearted concurrence in these arrangements.

PERSONAL AND CONFIDENTIAL Bonn, September 24, 1951

Dear Arnold [Heeney],

If you look at the file on German [Canadian?] troops arriving in Germany I do not think you will fail to notice that the Bonn Embassy is not entirely happy about its position in this matter. The first we heard of the fact that they were coming to the British Zone was a statement from the War Office which appeared in the London Times of September 18. Before that I had been given to understand that they would be going to the U.S. Zone. This, of course, is a change of no great consequence to us in Germany. What is of more importance, however, is that the German authorities should first hear of this officially through the U.K. High Commissioner and that I should not have received any instructions either to associate myself with the U.K. High Commissioner or to make a separate approach to the German authorities.

Legally, there is no doubt that the Germans need only be informed of this by the Occupying Powers, and that it is of no concern to them whether the troops are Canadian or Afghanistan, but at the present stage of relations with Germany I do not have to say how shortsighted it would be to stand upon this rapidly disappearing legal position.

We have only recently established diplomatic relations with the German Government, and unless the Germans are to assume that London is still conducting our foreign affairs while allowing us to play at diplomacy, they would, I think, expect to hear something from me on this subject.

It is true, of course, that no official action is possible by Ottawa until such time as the House of Commons decides that the Brigade shall go to Europe and that any action which has been taken has been taken upon the Minister's statement to the press of September 18.

It would seem at this distance that some leak somewhere forced the Minister to make that statement and that someone in London, either by specific instruction from somewhere, or relying on the Minister's statement, has instructed Sir Ivone Kirkpatrick to convey the information to the Chancellor.

I would think, therefore, that when the time comes for an official communication it may move straight from Ottawa to the German Government, either through us here or through the German Embassy in Ottawa.[28]

I think that it is highly important that the fact that Canada is a completely independent nation and that these troops are her contribution at the moment to NATO should be intimated by Canada and not by the United Kingdom.

We have never been consulted at all about this whole thing and being a military and political matter, no doubt we should not have been. However, once the decisions were reached I think that it might have been well if we had been immediately notified. To be completely in the dark in this matter of such importance could be very embarrassing and in fact was when the British asked us about it. It was a bit more embarrassing in relation to them when they got the answers before we did.

I think that it would be well if we were informed as soon as possible all about how this unit is to function.[29] Is it to become part of the British Army or what? Is it to be paid for by Canada or on Occupation costs?

Please have the matter looked into and drop me a note.[30]

Thanks ever so much,

Yours sincerely,
T.C. DAVIS

PERSONAL AND CONFIDENTIAL Bonn, October 2, 1951

Dear Arnold [Heeney],

RE MOVEMENT OF 27TH CANADIAN INFANTRY BRIGADE TO GERMANY

On the 24th of September I wrote you a personal note on the above topic and since then I have received official instructions to notify the Government of Germany directly in the matter.

I attach herewith copy of my despatch No. 758 of October 2† which will bring you up to date on developments.

Let me say that there are very few Englishmen over here whom I have had the privilege of meeting who seem to have any knowledge whatsoever of the constitutional changes which have taken place in Commonwealth relations in recent years. To the most of them Canada is still a colony. I think that perhaps this conception may be a bit stronger in the army than elsewhere. We try to disabuse their minds of these misconceptions when we have the opportunity to do so.

This way of thinking may have some repercussions in the future as a result of the movement of the Canadian Brigade to Germany because of the tendencies of British Army personnel, unless a very close relationship is established between this Mission and the Canadian Brigade.

In this transaction it strikes me that someone in the Defence Department must have decided that this matter was one for attention by his Department alone and that there was a failure to realize that the channel of communication between governments is through our Department.[31] As things have developed it would seem quite clear that the whole thing down to the present has been handled purely on an army basis when, besides being a military matter, it has tremendously important political aspects.

I think that it would be well if it were made clear at the outset to those who will command these forces that in matters not of a strictly military nature any negotiations with the Government of Germany must be done after consultation with our Department and with its help. There may well develop a tendency to feel that by reason of the placement of our forces with the British forces, the Brigade is to be considered completely as part thereof and function accordingly. I can well appreciate that it will be a bit difficult to make this distinction clear, but I think that when it is thoroughly understood that this is a Canadian force created and provided for by

no [A.D.P. Heeney]

Canada, it will follow that its dealings except in the field of immediate military matters must be handled through Canadian channels.

In fact, whether we wish it or not, I can foresee that we at this Mission will be involved up to our ears in every kind of matter arising from the presence of the force and that therefore our Department should have much to say about its arrangements so that we may also be informed and act according to a policy formulated jointly at your end.

I think that to mark the occasion and this relationship, it would be wise if I should be on hand to officially welcome the force when it comes to Germany.[32] I happen to know Brigadier Walsh personally, and I know we can make satisfactory arrangements on the spot. I think, however, that it would be well if it were put up to him that very soon after the establishment of the Brigade in Germany he and I should get together and establish the contact from which will spring all later relationship.

The RCAF is meticulously careful, through their Department, to keep us advised of the posting to Germany of any of their senior personnel and recently we were advised of the fact that certain senior members of that force would be coming to Germany and I believe that they witnessed the recent British army manoeuvres.

I am afraid that the Army has not been as careful in this matter. I have reported earlier cases to you; the latest in point in my learning after the British army manoeuvres were completed that General Kitchin (I may have his name spelled incorrectly), head of R.M.C., had been in attendance at these manoeuvres. I had been invited to go but could not arrange it. It is an opportunity that I will not miss next year when our force is here and is no doubt included in the manoeuvres. I would have liked to have met General Kitchin, and I am sure that the meeting would have been mutually profitable. Not only did I miss this opportunity, but as on previous occasions, it could have been embarrassing if this Mission, which did not know of his presence, had heard of it through the press or through an inquiry from some German official quarter.

Regardless of what we may think or wish, inevitably this Embassy is going to be called upon to deal with innumerable problems consequent upon the coming of this force to Germany. I therefore think that the framing of policy except in strictly military matters should be done in very close contact between the two Departments in Ottawa and implementation attended to in similarly close contact at this end. Our Department and this Mission will have a great deal to do as a result of the presence of the Canadian force in Germany. It is through our Department and through it alone that the official voice of Canada speaks to the German Government. Only in that way can we speak with a single voice, and I would foresee and fear great trouble if the Department of Defence followed its tendency to "go it alone". It cannot, and it would be our Department and this Mission which would have to attempt to mend the fences.

Yours sincerely,

Le sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures au sous-ministre de la Défense nationale

Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to Deputy Minister of National Defence

CONFIDENTIAL Ottawa, October 10, 1951

Dear Mr. Drury,

The purpose of this letter is to record my understanding of the discussion with you and General Simonds on October 4 regarding the movement of the 27th Brigade to Germany.

Command Instructions and Possible "Political" Directive

2. The CGS is drafting Command Instructions for Brigadier Walsh which will deal with purely military matters. General Simonds is not in favour of dealing with political matters in that document. However, he is willing to consider recommending to your Minister a second document in the nature of a letter of guidance, which might cover the following subjects of special concern to this Department:

(a) Relations between the Commanding Officer and the Canadian Embassy;

(b) Political aspects of the incorporation of the Brigade in a larger United Kingdom formation;

(c) The attitude of Canada towards Germany.

3. We will prepare a first draft of such a letter and send it as soon as possible to you and the Acting CGS. I understand that the Acting CGS will shortly be sending me for information the draft Command Instructions.

Assignment of Brigade to General Eisenhower

4. I understand that consideration will be given to the question of whether there should be a formal document placing the Brigade at the disposal of General Eisenhower. I hope that we may be kept informed of developments in this regard.

Legal Status of the Members of the Brigade in Germany

5. The Judge Advocate General, in consultation with our Legal Division, will prepare an explanation of the legal position. It seems likely that we cannot avoid the legal status of "occupation forces" until such time as the Occupation Statute is repealed and replaced by a new contractual relationship between Germany and the three Occupying Powers.

6. The NATO Forces Agreement is inapplicable because the German Government is not a party to it and, of course, is not at present a consenting party to the stationing of the Brigade in Germany.

Financial Arrangements

7. I gathered that, at present, the German Government bears, as "occupation costs", a major part of the cost of maintaining the United Kingdom forces. The CGS naturally wishes to make a simple arrangement with the United Kingdom authorities whereby Canada will reimburse the United Kingdom on a fixed per capita basis for the cost of maintaining the Canadian Brigade in Germany.

8. This gives rise to a major political question which, in my view, should be considered by Ministers. There are, it seems, roughly three possibilities as long as the present occupation system continues.

(a) Canada reimburses the United Kingdom on a fixed per capita basis for costs borne by the U.K., i.e. the German Government will bear a large part of the cost of maintaining the Brigade. This puts us financially in the position of a satellite "occupying power".

(b) Canada pays to the U.K. on a fixed per capita basis the total cost of maintaining the Brigade (actual U.K. disbursements plus Germany's share). This enables Canada to say that she is paying her way in full, but will make no impression on the Germans if the U.K. pockets all the money.

(c) Canada pays the U.K. on a fixed per capita basis for costs borne by the U.K., and in addition voluntarily reimburses to the German Government the estimated value of goods and services which have been provided by the German Government. This might be politically satisfying to Canada but might also be very unsatisfactory to the U.K. (and the other two Occupying Powers) who are now engaged in complicated negotiations with the Germans on all aspects of their relationship. A generous gesture by Canada would no doubt be used by the Germans as a weapon in those negotiations.

9. I am not offering an opinion at present, but I would be grateful to receive from you, for the information of my Minister, an explanation of the present "occupation costs" system. What kinds of things does the German Government provide for the United Kingdom forces and in what manner? Roughly what proportion of BAOR maintenance costs is borne by Germany? In very round figures, what could be the financial implications for Canada of following course (c) above instead of course (a)?

National Military Representative to SHAPE

10. The Representative at present is Major General Smith, Chairman of the CJS, London. He personally visits SHAPE whenever necessary and has a full-time Assistant Representative in Paris who is, I believe, a Wing Commander. As I understand it, the official channel of communication between the Canadian Government and SHAPE is through the National Military Representative.

11. General Simonds did not think that there is any need, at least at present, to consider stationing a higher-ranking officer in Paris for this representational task.

Leave Centres Outside Germany

12. I gather that the Canadian Army will not create such leave centres but will use United Kingdom (and U.S.?) facilities. The CGS indicated that it would probably be necessary to put provost detachments in some of the European capitals.

13. Although it is not an immediate problem, I should be glad to have a little more information about the probable leave system in so far as it may affect, and be of interest to, the Canadian Embassies in Europe.

I am sending a copy of this letter to the Acting CGS.

Sincerely yours,
A.D.P. HEENEY

SECRET. IMMEDIATE.

Following for Lieutenant-General Guy Simonds from Honourable Brooke Claxton to be passed to him in time for meeting understand he is having with SHAPE in Paris Friday morning, Begins: As you know we are greatly concerned here about the status in Western Germany our Forces will have. If it is possible by any means we want to avoid necessity of their being regarded as Occupying Forces. Preliminary discussion here indicates possibility that Government might postpone whole movement until occupation had ended rather than accept that status.

2. Accordingly I would be glad if you would be extremely careful to avoid any action or discussion which would tend to indicate that we might be willing to accept role as part of Occupying Forces. Also in no circumstances should British Civil or Military Authorities negotiate in our behalf with Western Germany or SHAPE regarding matters such as this.

3. We are actively exploring various possibilities here and would be obliged for any information you might have bearing on this problem.

4. Rather than accept status of occupying powers our present disposition is to send the Force to Germany under arrangements made with Western German Government either directly by U.S. or by SHAPE regarding passport, customs, and other similar matters pending adoption of general agreement with Western Germany. This would mean that we would not expect Western Germany to meet costs of maintaining our Forces. We would anticipate that UK civil and military authorities would find serious administrative and possibly other difficulties through our arriving at some such arrangement but serious though these might be we would still endeavour by every means to make such arrangement and perhaps even retain troops here until Western Germany had made a general arrangement.

5. Alternatively it might be possible to have Force moved to Europe without specific arrangement in detail on general understanding with Western German Government pending coming into force of general arrangement.

6. Understand you are meeting SHAPE Friday morning and hope this will reach you in time as no doubt this will be one of matters you will be discussing. At this stage talks should be exploratory and designed to secure strong support of SHAPE in meeting problem. You will recall offer to facilitate arrangements made in telegram of acceptance.

7. Would be obliged if you would discuss this with Mr. Abbott and General Foulkes. Perhaps one or both might participate in discussion as matter is of greatest urgency, importance and complexity.

8. This has not yet come before Cabinet or Prime Minister. It may be raised in preliminary way at Cabinet meeting Saturday morning but pending fuller information including report by you no final decision will be taken as to action we propose to follow.

9. You will be interested to learn that parade of 27th on Plains of Abraham was splendid and obviously impressed their Royal Highnesses most favourably.

10. State dinner went off very well last night and your wives looked splendid.

11. Please convey greetings to Eisenhower, Gruenther and others.

STATIONING OF 27TH CANADIAN INFANTRY BRIGADE IN GERMANY

1. My immediately following telegram repeats a telegram from the Chief of the General Staff (in Paris) to the Minister of National Defence received here this afternoon.

2. While I have not yet had an opportunity to consider with the Prime Minister or other colleagues the full implications of the course proposed by Simonds, the general line described in paragraph 5 of his message commends itself to me. It will be in order for you to participate in the proposed meeting with Kirkpatrick, Simonds and the German authorities. No doubt Simonds has already been in direct touch with you about this. I assume that the meeting will have to be exploratory in character and that we shall have a full report for Cabinet consideration here before any public statement is made.

3. There are at least two particular questions which may offer considerable difficulty, viz., the legal status of the troops and financial arrangements for avoiding any burden on the German economy. Moreover, you will appreciate the delicacy of the relationship of any special arrangements which we make to the negotiations presently going on between Germany and the occupying powers.

4. Please report developments to us as soon as possible and let us have your own views.

STATIONING OF 27TH CANADIAN INFANTRY BRIGADE IN GERMANY

Following is the text of the message referred to in my immediately preceding telegram, Begins: Your message MND-15 received just before meeting with Eisenhower and Gruenther. Following meeting with them had further discussions with Abbott and Foulkes.

2. All agreed that postponement of move of 27 CIB would have most depressing effect and cause considerable administrative difficulties.

3. All agree that suggestion in Para. 5 of your message offers best solution, and in agreement with Abbott and Foulkes am now trying to arrange meeting between Davis, self and U.K. High Commissioner in Germany or his representative with Dr. Adenhauer [sic] to ensure no misunderstanding as to status of Canadian troops.

4. Was given information at SHAPE clearly indicating that Adenhauer under no misapprehension regarding status Canadian troops going to Germany and in fact in conversation with McCloy Adenhauer is quoted as differentiating clearly between U.S. and U.K. forces under occupation statute, French Belgium and Netherlands forces as part of European Army and Canadian troops as part of the NATO forces.

5. I propose in meeting at Bonn Saturday, Sunday or Monday to reassure and obtain acknowledgement from Adenhauer in presence of Davis and U.K. High Commissioner:

(a) Canadian troops are arriving in Germany under NATO auspices to strengthen Western defence and will have no part in occupation duties.

(b) That financial arrangements will ensure that cost of maintaining Canadian troops will be borne in full by Canada and will not in any way be a burden to German economy.

(c) That in interests of administrative simplicity it is desirable to follow present U.K. arrangements respecting passports, customs, and similar matters but these are to be a temporary arrangement pending general agreement and to be without prejudice to status of Canadian forces as a non-occupational force.

6. British are absolutely clear that under no circumstances will Canadian troops be used for any occupational duties or aid to civil power in Germany.

7. Finally, and this for British only, that services which the British provide for us, which they in turn may obtain from the Germans under the Occupation Statute and for which we finally pay shall be paid for in full by us and arrangements shall be made so that the British do not profit financially at our expense.

8. It would be my hope that Dr. Adenhauer will understand the situation and will be prepared to make a statement setting for the conditions surrounding the arrival of the Canadian forces. Further that he will realize the need for grouping with the British forces as a military and administrative convenience and that any arrangement made now would be a temporary one subject to further negotiation at the appropriate time.

9. General Eisenhower has agreed to meet the first main group of the Brigade at Rotterdam on 21st November 1951 and to take part in an appropriate welcoming ceremony. Further he has stated that the public relations facilities of SHAPE are at our disposal if they can be of any assistance in making sure that the conditions surrounding the arrival of the Brigade in Europe are fully understood by all concerned.

10. I will keep you informed of situation. Ends.

STATUS OF CANADIAN TROOPS IN GERMANY

1. General Simonds, Brigadier Moncel and I had conference this morning with United Kingdom High Commissioner who is presently Chairman of the Allied High Commission.

2. Sovereign power in Germany rests with the High Commission and defence is reserved power under the Occupation Statute.

3. As a matter of courtesy, notification of arrival of troops was given simultaneously by the United Kingdom High Commissioner and this Embassy.

4. Advent of our troops has been used by the Germans as bargaining point in present negotiations for transfer on contractual basis.

5. Germans are attempting to establish the right to say what troops shall come here and the conditions of their coming.

6. Under no condition will this right be acknowledged and the High Commission will insist on the retention of full power in this field under any contract.

7. If we attempt to enter into any (word omitted) with the German Government which implies their right so to do, we would thereby seriously prejudice Eisenhower's freedom to dispose of his troops. In any event, any arrangement to be legal would require High Commission approval.

8. Legal position, therefore, is that our troops can only come here under the auspices of and by arrangement with the Allied High Commission and must depend upon High Commission law for maintenance of their own security.

9. High Commission law is based upon four-power agreement, including Russia, which permits former belligerents to send troops to Germany. Any arrangement outside of the law could be challenged by Russia.

10. In my opinion imperative that these troops come as planned as delay now might seriously affect present contract negotiations and would be used by the Germans for domestic political purposes.

11. All appreciate your desire that these troops shall not be occupation troops nor become an additional burden on the German economy.

12. Suggest joint public announcement by the Canadian Government and the United Kingdom High Commission along these lines, Begins:

These troops have been assigned to General Eisenhower's command, and he has placed them in Germany with the concurrence of the Allied High Commission, at present the competent defence authority in Germany.

So far as Canada is concerned, their activities will be limited to defence purposes and their presence will not, repeat not, add to the occupation costs. Ends.

13. To sum up it is understood by all concerned that, while the legal basis for the arrival of our troops is the Occupation Statute, yet in actuality they will have no, repeat no, occupation duties.

STATUS OF CANADIAN TROOPS IN GERMANY

The Cabinet have this morning discussed this matter and have agreed that a joint public announcement along the lines of that set out in paragraph 12 of your telegram No. 103 of October 13th would be satisfactory. The Government assume that this course is agreeable to the powers represented on the Allied High Commission.

2. The Government intend to table in Parliament this week (if possible tomorrow), an Order in Council to authorize the despatch of the Brigade to Germany. At that time the Minister of National Defence would like to make the public statement referred to in the preceding paragraph of this telegram.

3. Will you therefore confer urgently with the Allied High Commission in order to obtain their agreement to immediate announcement along these lines, telegraphing the exact text which would be acceptable to them.

4. You are dealing with Kirkpatrick as Chairman of the Allied High Commission. Are we correct in assuming that Kirkpatrick will carry his U.S. and French colleagues with him in agreeing to the action proposed? On this assumption we are merely informing the U.K., U.S. and French Governments through our Missions of the course to be followed.

5. Obviously the details of legal and financial arrangements will have to be worked out at greater length. It seems to us that this could best be done in London, but we will be glad to have your views and those of General Simonds on this question. Ends.

STATUS OF CANADIAN BRIGADE IN GERMANY

In order to simplify your immediate consultations and to make it possible for Mr. Claxton to make a statement in Parliament on Tuesday or Wednesday, we suggest following revised text of joint public announcement:

Begins, The 27th Canadian Infantry Brigade Group will from the time of its arrival in Europe form part of the integrated force under General Eisenhower and will be placed in Germany with the concurrence of the Allied High Commission, the present competent defence authority in Germany.

Their activities will be limited to defence purposes under the North Atlantic Treaty. End of draft.

2. This omits reference to occupation costs, which could be subject of a further statement later on.

PERSONAL AND TOP SECRET Ottawa, October 15, 1951

Dear Tommy [Davis],

I received your letters of September 24th and October 2nd regarding the movement of the 27th Brigade to Germany, and am glad to have your frank personal opinions at all times.

2. Dealing first with your letter of September 24th, I regret that the Embassy was not given notice of Mr. Claxton's press release of September 18th. The reasons for this were:

(1) The interested members of this Department were entirely preoccupied with the NATO Council meeting during the week commencing September 15th, and

(2) The Department did not have advance notice of Mr. Claxton's release of September 18th, or for that matter of the final decision to deploy the brigade in the U.K. Zone of Germany.

3. When the matter was discussed by Cabinet Defence Committee on August 30th, the decision was that:

"(i) the 27th Brigade be despatched to Germany in November, 1951, assuming that satisfactory facilities were obtained for it by that time with either the U.S. or U.K. forces;

(ii) General Eisenhower be informed accordingly in confidence;

(iii) whether the brigade were grouped with the U.S. or the U.K. forces during the winter, the question of grouping and maintenance of the Canadian Army contribution to the Integrated Force would be open to review whenever necessary."

This left it to the Minister of National Defence to choose between the U.K. and U.S. Zones. (Enclosed is an extract from the minutes of Defence Committee for August 30).

4. Also enclosed is a copy of my letter of October 10 to the Deputy Minister of National Defence, which discusses many of the questions that interest you. I shall let you know what happens to the proposed "letter of guidance" on political questions mentioned in the letter to Drury. The main questions are, of course, the subject of urgent telegrams now being exchanged with you.

5. With reference to your letter of October 2, I think that General Simonds agrees that a close relationship should exist between the Brigade and the Embassy, and I hope that the letter of guidance will put this requirement in the forefront.

6. I heartily agree that you should be on hand to welcome the Brigade officially when it arrives in Germany. I don't think that you need any special authority for this purpose. We will, of course, pass on to you any information we receive about the movements of the Brigade.

7. We have reminded National Defence of the desirability of notifying you, through this Department, of visits to Germany of senior Service officers.

8. I am sorry that you have had such a deluge of "immediate" telegrams during the past few days. I realize what difficulties it has created for your limited staff.

Yours sincerely,

A.D.P. HEENEY

SECRET. URGENT. Ottawa, October 24, 1951

Dear Mr. Drury,

I think that it is urgently necessary to clarify the Canadian position on the financial burden of maintaining the Canadian Brigade in Germany.

2. You will recall that on October 15th Cabinet approved the draft public statement submitted by the Ambassador in Bonn (in consultation with General Simonds

[33] Le Cabinet a pris un décret C.P. 5598, le 18 octobre 1951, en vue de placer jusqu'à 12 000 membres de l'armée canadienne ou de l'ARC en service actif dans les forces militaires unifiées sous la direction du Commandant suprême des Forces alliées en Europe.
Cabinet passed Order-in-Council P.C. 5598 on October 18, 1951 which placed up to 12,000 Canadian Army or R.C.A.F. personnel on active service as part of the integrated force under the Supreme Allied Commander, Europe.

and the U.K. High Commissioner in Bonn) which included the phrase "their presence (i.e. of the Brigade) will not add to occupation costs".

3. Later on October 15th, with the approval of Mr. Claxton, I asked the Embassy to delete this phrase from the text of the first agreed public announcement. My reason was to allow time for the courtesy notifications of our intentions to the Government of the United States and France.

4. The position at this moment is therefore that no public statement has been made on the Canadian position concerning occupation costs but that the three Occupying Powers have been told of the Canadian desire not to add to occupation costs. I am sure that they think the Canadian position to be that Canada wishes to pay in full for the upkeep of the Brigade.

5. So far as I know, the only thing that has been said to the German Government on this was the following statement in the U.K. High Commissioner's note of October 2nd to the German Government (enclosed with despatch No. 758 of October 2nd† from the Canadian Embassy):

> "The stationing of the Brigade in the British Zone will not result in any increase to the Occupation account during this financial year."

We do not know why or on whose authority this statement was made, or what it is supposed to mean in accounting terms.

6. There has been no unfavourable reaction from the three Occupying Governments to the Canadian wishes. Therefore, the logical step now would be for the Canadian Embassy to tell the German Government (and to announce publicly) that the Brigade will not add to occupation costs (not merely in the current financial year but so long as the occupation costs regime exists).

7. However, we are not clear as to what is comprised in "occupation costs". In your conversation yesterday with Mr. Wershof, you expressed doubt as to whether the Canadian Government would wish to bear the cost of new buildings required for the Brigade. If such construction is covered by "occupation costs", there may be difficulty in our having it both ways. Do we expect the German Government to bear such construction costs but not to bear any other "occupation costs" relating to the Brigade?

8. It is of course expected that the current tripartite discussions with Germany will produce new and satisfactory arrangements relating to the cost of defence in Germany. However, it may be several months before such arrangements are concluded and in the meantime it seems necessary for the Canadian Government to take a definite position covering the interim period.

9. I should be grateful for your advice as to what we should now say to the Ambassador in Bonn. Also, if it is expected that very substantial new construction will be required during the next couple of months, would it be desirable to bring this aspect of the problem before Cabinet Defence Committee as quickly as possible?

Sincerely yours,

C.S.A. RITCHIE

DESPATCH 823 Bonn, October 24, 1951

SECRET

Reference: My telegram No. 109 of October 17, 1951.

27TH CANADIAN INFANTRY BRIGADE TO GERMANY

I attach a copy of a letter† addressed to me by the Legal Adviser of the United Kingdom High Commissioner's Office on the status of the 27th Brigade under Occupation Law now in force in Germany. I attach a copy of the text† of Allied High Commission Law No. 2 defining the categories of persons and authorities covered by Occupation Law.

2. Law No. 2 was enacted when the Allied High Commission was set up to be the governing body acting for the Western Occupying Powers in the field of competence reserved to themselves under the Occupation Statute. The occasion was the creation of the Federal Republic. Law No. 2 is one of a series enacted by the High Commission under its reserved powers defining the status of the armed forces and Occupation authorities in Germany. This included provisions to ensure the armed forces' ability to maintain their own security, to avail themselves of certain facilities and to claim certain legal immunities.

3. In previous correspondence we have, I think, made it clear that the present Occupying Powers would not be happy if we were to take any action that might prejudice the legal basis created by these laws and on which their position in Germany depends. On the other hand, I doubt if, from our point of view, we would like to see Canadian troops in an inferior position to that occupied by the other forces in Germany. It is therefore clear that the 27th Brigade will have to have the same privileges, immunities and facilities as the troops of the Occupying Powers. The problem is to see that these requirements do not conflict with our position that the Brigade should not be styled an Occupation force.

4. The attached legal opinion, if I read it correctly, merely states that it is possible for a force not engaged in Occupation duties to be termed an Occupation force for the purposes of receiving the privileges, immunities and facilities mentioned. But nothing in the opinion suggests that they could have these privileges, immunities and facilities without being termed an Occupation force. I do not think that the last sentence of paragraph 3 of the attached opinion is strictly correct inasmuch as from our point of view there may be some very practical significance, or at any rate, political significance if a Canadian soldier is obliged to plead immunity to German legal processes on the grounds that he is a member of the Occupation forces, which I assume from the opinion would have to be the case. (Although Law No. 13 on Legal Immunities uses the term "Allied Forces" which is unexceptionable, that term is defined in Law No. 2 in such a manner as to make it necessary to call the Canadian Brigade an "Occupation Force" if it is to be included in the more general term "Allied Force").

5. The opinion does not mention the amendment to the Charter of the Allied High Commission quoted in my telegram No. 107 of October 15.† It seems to me that our position would be less equivocal if a more direct connection were made between the revised Article 1, paragraph 3 of the Charter of the Allied High Commission and Law No. 2 of the Allied High Commission by amending the latter to include in the term "Allied Forces" those troops stationed in Germany by virtue of the former.

6. I am told by Mr. Wilgress that a representative of the Judge Advocate General's Branch will be coming with Mr. Alex Ross and others to discuss detailed arrangements here next week. I am sending a copy of this despatch and enclosures to London in the hope that the representative of the Judge Advocate General will comment on it. When the party arrives from London and a detailed agreement is reached I assume that that will substitute for the note to the High Commission referred to in my telegram under reference.

LEGAL STATUS OF CANADIAN BRIGADE

In your telegram No. 107 of October 15 you quoted the U.K. High Commissioner as saying that (with the aid of new Commission legislation if necessary) he would try to ensure that the Brigade should have all the immunities "presently possessed by occupation forces without their being designated at all as such".

2. From despatch No. 823, it appears that the Brigade will have all the immunities of occupation forces only because the expression "Occupation Forces" in Law No. 2 is defined as including "auxiliary contingents of other Powers serving with" the armed forces of the Occupying Powers. In other words, the Brigade will be part of the "Occupation Forces" within the meaning of Law No. 2 and related Commission laws.

3. This result is not what the U.K. High Commissioner forecast in your telegram No. 107 and we are reluctant to advise the Government to acquiesce in it.

4. The Occupation Statute reserves to the Commission the subject of "Allied Forces"; it does not say "occupation forces". It seems to follow that the Commission could, if it wished, amend Law No. 2 (and if necessary other laws) to cover a new category of "Allied forces" which could be defined as "forces of any other Allied Nation participating in the defence of Western Europe" etc, using the wording employed in Art. 1, paragraph 3 of the Commission Charter. If that were done, the Brigade would have the protection of all existing laws relating to occupation forces but would not, even as a legal technicality, be styled "Occupation Forces".

5. Unless you see some serious objection, please discuss this immediately with U.K. High Commissioner and press for solution on lines of preceding paragraph. We realize that Commission may be reluctant to enact amendments of laws which may be abolished in a few months, but we do not consider such reluctance as a sufficient reason for forcing an inaccurate legal style on the Canadian Brigade even for a few months.

SECRET Ottawa, November 6, 1951

COMMAND INSTRUCTIONS

General

1. 27th Canadian Infantry Brigade Group will proceed to Europe under your command for integration with the forces of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization assigned to Supreme Headquarters, Allied Powers in Europe.

2. The Supreme Allied Commander in Europe is placing 27th Canadian Infantry Brigade Group under command of the Commander-in-Chief, British Army of the Rhine, upon arrival of the Brigade Group on the Continent of Europe. The Commander-in-Chief, British Army of the Rhine, will therefore be responsible for the training, operations and administration, except for certain administrative matters as set out in your Administrative Instructions, of 27th Canadian Infantry Brigade Group.

Composition

3. The general composition of 27th Canadian Infantry Brigade Group will be the 27th Canadian Infantry Brigade with certain supporting arms and service troops. Details of the exact composition will be notified to you separately.

Role

4. (a) Your immediate mission will be to complete the task of raising the standard of efficiency of your force to that required for operations.

(b) To undertake training and operations with UK forces in Europe or with such other components of the Integrated Force as may be ordered by the Supreme Allied Commander in Europe.

(c) The Force under your command will not undertake any occupation duties, or any tasks in aid of the civil power in Germany. In the event of riot or insurrection you may take such action as you consider necessary for the security of your own Force.

Status

5. An Order of Detail will be issued, placing 27th Canadian Infantry Brigade Group in combination with UK Forces in Europe under Section 6 of the Visiting Forces (British Commonwealth) Act, 1933.

6. It will be necessary for you to establish a working arrangement for the exercise of mutual powers of command between officers of your Force and other North Atlantic Treaty Organization Forces in Europe.

7. The legal right of your Force to be stationed in the British Zone of Western Germany is to be found in Article I, paragraph 3 (a) of the Charter of the Allied High Commission which provides that Forces of nations, other than the Occupying Powers, deployed in Germany for the defence of Western Europe may be stationed in such areas of the zone of occupation as are agreed by the High Commissioner and the Commander-in-Chief of the zone concerned.

8. The question of the legal status, privileges and immunities of the members of your Force is now under negotiation between the Canadian Ambassador in Germany and the Allied High Commission, and a separate letter of instructions will be issued to you as soon as possible. Guidance on political matters, including your relationship with the Canadian Ambassador in Germany, will be detailed to you in a separate communication.

9. The principle of the separate entity of the Canadian Force shall at all times be maintained. You will ensure that this principle is brought to the attention of commanders of formations in which you may be serving, so that your tasks and undertakings may be so allotted or arranged, with due regard to operational necessity and to the size of the Canadian Force, that its Canadian entity will be preserved.

Discipline and Administration

10. You will be the Senior Canadian Army Officer with the North Atlantic Treaty Organization Forces in Europe.

11. You will be responsible for discipline and purely Canadian administration of all Canadian troops in the European theatre, less troops in the UK under command Canadian Joint Staff (London), and less Canadian Army Officers and Other Ranks serving at Supreme Headquarters, Allied Powers in Europe or attached to other NATO forces under exchange arrangements.

12. Details concerning your special powers with respect to discipline have been communicated to you by separate instructions.

13. Administration of the Force will be in accordance with existing instructions and such other instructions as may be communicated to you from time to time.

Channels of Communication

14. No limitation is placed on your direct channel of communication on any matter with the Chief of the General Staff.

15. Various other matters, including the rendering of reports and war diaries and procedure with respect to honours and awards, will be dealt with in subsequent administrative instructions.

16. Channels of communication will be as follows:

(a) Routine administrative correspondence from Army Headquarters will be sent direct to 3 Canadian Administrative Unit.

(b) Correspondence other than the above will be sent to Headquarters, 27th Canadian Infantry Brigade. Copies of such correspondence from Army Headquarters, Ottawa, relating to policy will be sent to Army Member, Canadian Joint Staff, London.

SUPPLEMENTARY INSTRUCTIONS

General

1. This instruction supplements the Command Instructions issued to you 6 Nov 51. It embodies my direction to you in respect of your relations with the Canadian Ambassador in Bonn, the British Army of the Rhine and the German Federal Republic. This instruction has been reviewed by officials of the Department of External Affairs and is in accord with their views.

Relations with the Canadian Embassy in Bonn

2. The Ambassador, Mr TC Davis, is the representative of the Government of Canada to the German Government, and is the official channel of communication between the Canadian Government and the German Government. As Ambassador, he is concerned with everything that may affect the relations of the two governments or the opinion of Canada held by the German people.

3. The mere presence of a Canadian Brigade in Germany is a political fact of considerable importance. Accordingly, it is desirable that you should keep the Ambassador informed of any developments concerning the Brigade which might have an effect on political or public relations.

4. Also, although the Ambassador has no authority over the Brigade, he will naturally wish, as the representative of the Government, to give you any assistance possible in matters affecting the welfare of the members of the Brigade, as you may desire such assistance.

5. Without at present laying down channels or methods of communication and discussion between yourself and the Ambassador, it is desired that you should, for your part, endeavour to ensure the establishment of close and cordial relations in the light of the preceding paragraphs. A copy of this letter will be sent to the Ambassador by the Department of External Affairs.

Relations between the Brigade and the British Army of the Rhine

6. The deployment of the Brigade in the UK Zone of Germany under command of Commander-in-Chief, British Army of the Rhine, may give rise to political misunderstanding among many people — Germans, British and even Canadians. It is hoped that you, and the officers and men under your command, will be able to reduce such misunderstanding without injury to anyone's feelings.

7. The United Kingdom is one of the three Powers occupying Western Germany. The British Army of the Rhine has a double role —

(1) it assists the UK High Commissioner in carrying out the occupation and

(2) it has been assigned by the UK Government to General Eisenhower as part of the Integrated Force for the defence of Western Europe created by the North Atlantic Treaty nations.

8. Canada is a full and equal member of NATO and shared in the decision to establish the Integrated Force. The Government, with the approval of Parliament, has decided to assign the 27th Brigade to the Integrated Force. On informing General Eisenhower of its decision to offer 27 Canadian Infantry Brigade Group to the Integrated NATO Force in Europe, the Government of Canada asked his advice on the question of the location and command grouping which would be most advantageous from the military point of view. General Eisenhower recommended that 27 Canadian Infantry Brigade should be located in the Northern Sector of the Western European Defence Zone and grouped under command of British Army of the Rhine. The fact that the Canadian Brigade is grouped under British command in no way affects its status as a formation of the Canadian Army.

9. You will receive separate advice on the legal status of the Brigade under the laws now in force in Germany. Whatever the technical legal position may prove to be under the Occupation Statute, the important fact is that politically the Brigade is not part of the occupation.

10. The basic fact, which should be kept to the forefront, is that Canada is contributing the Brigade to a North Atlantic army under General Eisenhower, an army which has been created to deter aggression in Western Europe against the North Atlantic Treaty alliance. By helping to deter aggression, the Brigade will be protecting and defending Canada and serving the national interests of Canada.

Relations with Germany

11. At the conclusion of the tripartite meetings in Washington in September, 1951, the Foreign Ministers of the United Kingdom, the United States and France announced that they had agreed to the negotiation of mutually acceptable arrangements with the German Federal Republic which would completely transform existing relationships with Germany. The guiding principle was described as "integration on the basis of equality within a European community, itself included in a developing Atlantic community" — a development which would be "inconsistent with the retention in future of occupation status or of the powers to interfere in the Federal Republic's domestic affairs".

12. This statement reflects the profound changes which have taken place over the last two years, beginning with the setting up of the German Federal Republic in September 1949, and leading, in the case of Canada, to the termination of the legal state of war in July of this year, an act which was soon followed by the establishment of normal diplomatic relations.

13. At the same time, the way has been paved for a new status on the part of the German Federal Republic in the military sphere. As was noted in the final communique of the North Atlantic Council in Ottawa in September, 1951, the Occupying Powers have also welcomed the plans for a European Defence Community of which Germany would form a part. Discussions of possible German participation in this field have been going on ever since it was approved in principle by NATO in September, 1950, and it is hoped that negotiations now in progress will result in the formulation, in the near future, of concrete measures not only for a new political relationship on a contractual basis, but also for a specific German defence contribution.

14. In the light of the above developments, you will gather that, in spite of special privileges and rights which may be retained for Canadian troops stationed in Germany, your attitude of dealing with the German authorities should be based on the fact that Germany is an important potential ally. It is important that this position be understood by all ranks under your command and particularly by those who may deal directly with German authorities.

15. In the past, the West German Government and people have shown some reluctance to re-arm because of the obvious fear of seeing their country overrun and demolished in the event of war. More recently the West Germans have gone a long way to overcome this defeatist attitude and the presence of your troops along with others under the Supreme Commander will further strengthen their national spirit and morale. Although any people is inclined to resent the presence of large numbers of foreign troops stationed on their soil in time of peace, the Germans have become adjusted to the presence of such forces and appreciate the need for them from the point of view of their own security.

16. Nevertheless, the attitude and behavior of the forces under your command is of extreme importance from a political point of view, in fostering a spurt of wholehearted co-operation on the part of the German people with Allied aims and objectives. Further, the German government has made clear that its participation in the Western defence effort would be on the principle of complete equality and this has now become a domestic political issue of prime importance. It follows that any actions on the part of our troops at this stage giving the German people the impression that they are being treated as a defeated or subordinate people will not only be bitterly resented but will do harm to the Allied cause. At the same time, any impression that we are trying to curry favour with the Germans would also be harmful.

17. The very fact, however, of the special status of the Canadian Brigade in Germany creates a situation of some delicacy in maintaining a proper balance in your relations both with the Germans and with the forces with whom you will be associated. While it is desirable that there should be no misunderstanding of your position with respect to the Occupation, it is equally important that the distinction between the status of the Canadian Forces and of those actually on occupation duty should not be used by the Germans to embarrass the Occupying Powers in their current negotiations with the Government of the Federal Republic in connection with the proposed new contractual relationship and the German contribution to a European Army. It is to be expected that the Germans will do everything they can to improve their bargaining power, and there are already indications, in the form of apparently inspired press accounts regarding the Canadian Brigade, that the Germans are not above seizing any opportunity to suggest that their authority in this matter is considerably greater than is in fact the case. Every care should be taken, therefore, to avoid giving the Germans any opportunity to use your presence in Germany as a means to divide the Western Allies, whether through attempting to curry favour with one at the expense of another or by other methods.

DRAFT CONVENTION ON THE STATUS OF FOREIGN FORCES STATIONED IN GERMANY†

Following from Claxton for Davis and Wilgress, Begins: A copy of the draft Convention enclosed with Canada House despatch under reference was sent to Bonn in Mr. Heeney's letter of October 30, 1951.† A preliminary review of this Convention, both in National Defence and this Department, has disclosed certain features which we regard as open to the most serious objections from the point of view not only of Canada but of every other country participating in NATO but not an occupying power.

2. The first is the use of the word "attached" in the definition of the term "members of the forces" in Article I. It does not seem to us that the force of a country party to the North Atlantic Treaty but not an occupying power can in any sense be said to be "attached". Moreover, this word has an established connotation in connection with the Visiting Forces (British Commonwealth) Act 1933. In this Convention, which is designed to establish a relationship between forces stationed in Germany and the German Government, we can see no reason why reference should be made to the relationship of the forces of one NATO power to those of any other NATO power.

3. The second objection is that we see no reason to underline in this Convention the pre-eminent position of the three present occupying powers in Germany. This is more appropriately provided for in the proposed "Agreement on General Relations with the Federal Republic" which will take the place of the Occupation Statute. The present draft Convention is apparently designed not to deal with the over-all command structure of armed forces in Western Europe, but rather to create a relationship in respect of armed forces only between the Federal German Government and the governments of other NATO countries providing forces to be stationed in Germany. Obviously it is undesirable to place the forces of any NATO country in a position subordinate to that of any other NATO country insofar as the German Government is concerned.

4. It would seem to us that the Convention should be drafted in such a way that it could be signed originally by the three occupying powers but its terms would provide that it could be acceded to by any other NATO government which would have forces stationed in Germany and that such other government, after accession, would have rights and privileges to the same extent as the original signatories. This would obviate the necessity for the delegation mentioned in Article 2, paragraph 2, of the draft Convention.

5. I should be grateful if Mr. Davis in Bonn and Mr. Wilgress in London would let me have their comments and if they concur immediately put these views before the United Kingdom High Commissioner in Germany and the Foreign Office in London respectively. We intend to ask our Embassy in Washington to present these views to the State Department.

DRAFT CONVENTION ON THE STATUS OF FOREIGN FORCES STATIONED IN GERMANY

My telegram under reference was repeated to you prematurely yesterday. The intention was to send you background material in a despatch together with copy of EX-2179. Following is summary of position.

The draft Convention referred to is one of the four Agreements now being negotiated with the German Federal Republic with a view to replacing the present Occupation Statute. A copy of the draft Convention which is still in the formative stage was received under cover of Canada House despatch No. 4270 of October 16.† As it stands at present, the draft Convention takes the form of an Agreement between the Three Occupying Powers and the Federal Republic. Article 1 defines "members of the forces" as (in part) "(a) members of the armed forces of the Three Powers or of contingents of other Powers attached to such forces;". In Article 2 the term "the Power concerned" is defined to mean

"(a) in the case of the armed forces of any of the Three Powers, the Power whose forces are in question;

(b) in the case of the armed forces of any other Power, that one of the Three Powers to whose forces the forces in question are attached."

Article 2 continues as follows: "However, in the case of (b) above, the Power concerned may delegate to the authority of the other Powers, whose forces are attached to its own, any right or obligation deriving from this agreement."

A copy of the draft Convention will be sent to you by air bag.

2. Propose to explore, unofficially, possibility of direct association mentioned in paragraph 4. However since we agree with reasoning in paragraph three, I doubt if direct association will prove practicable,

(a) Because agreement, as it now stands, envisages organisation of court and administrative office not, repeat not, practicable for so small a formation as a brigade; and

(b) To divide agreement into main body to which we could accede and a Protocol for major powers only would require re-drafting a document very nearly finished. The end result might make it appear that we were obtaining all privileges in agreement without accepting any responsibilities, except of course the military responsibility of defence.

3. I will report separately on results of talks with United Kingdom authorities.

LEGAL STATUS OF 27TH BRIGADE IN GERMANY

1. Draft amendment in Article 1 provides for the addition of sub para (b) in Article 1, paragraph 3, Law No. 2, which reads "the forces of any allied nation participating in the defence of Western Europe and deployed within Germany for that purpose". A consequent amendment is made to sub para (d) of paragraph 3.

2. Article 2 of the draft law reads "any provision of legislation of the Allied High Commission which relates to occupation forces shall also apply to forces of any allied nation participating in the defence of Western Europe and deployed within Germany for that purpose".

3. This is to ensure that all privileges of occupation forces shall be available to the Brigade since many important legislative texts, Law 14 and Law 43 for example, only refer to occupation forces and not, repeat not, to allied forces.

4. I consider draft amendment satisfactory as it ensures that the Canadian Brigade will in no way be afterwards designated occupation forces. By law it will have the same privileges and immunities, and Article 2 above as drafted could give it the same obligations. Solution here is in the Brigade Commander's letter of instructions.

5. Above text is as submitted by the British and, of course, subject to possible amendment by the other two members of the Allied High Commission. Will let you know progress of its discussion which, because the High Commission and its committees now meet infrequently, cannot but take some weeks.

STATUS FOREIGN FORCES IN GERMANY

As the result of conversations reported in despatch under reference, we have now received from Dugald Malcolm of the U.K. High Commission personal and secret letter dated November 16,† a copy of which is attached hereto.

2. The contents of this letter have been made known to us as the only ones outside of the negotiating parties and therefore the secrecy thereof must be carefully preserved.

3. A perusal of the enclosure indicates a line of reasoning completely in line with that contained in Mr. Wilgress' telegram No. 2762 of November 13.†

4. Let me shortly express my views. Sub-paragraph (A) of paragraph 2, of that telegram states the fact:

> "That the three occupying powers will retain supreme authority in Germany and that the right to maintain forces in Germany is not repeat not considered a proper subject for inclusion in contractual arrangements."

5. As a matter of fact this right is being tacitly reserved to the occupying powers under the contract. Although they do not propose to leave open to question their right to station troops — reserved in the General Convention, — the three powers in a self-denying gesture are prepared to put in the form of a contract, freely negotiated, the conditions which will apply to their forces which continue to be maintained here.

6. Coming now to the question which is of chief concern to us. Canada will have troops in Germany, and it seems that they may be here in one of two ways, namely by virtue of an agreement reached with Germany and the occupying powers on the one side and Canada on the other, which would make Canada a party to the contract, or alternatively by Canada being accorded this right by the three powers or one of them. It would seem to me that having reserved out this right and having it acknowledged by Germany, the three powers will wish to control conditions under which troops of other powers will be here. If we enter into a contract with Germany as a party thereto, then we automatically acknowledge that Germany has in the final analysis the right to agree or refuse to have our troops here or state condition of their presence. I think that therefore it is impossible without undermining the whole position of the three powers, for Canada to enter into a contract or agreement with Germany. The Allies would not let us, and we would have to challenge their position at the highest level, if we wished to pursue the proposal of a contract to which we and the Germans would be parties.

7. Unless we are prepared to do so, the wisdom of which I would doubt, I think we therefore must deal with the three occupying powers and receive our status under delegation from either one or the three powers.

8. It further follows that under the circumstances there is nothing we can do about it except to raise points of details in connection with the terms of the proposed contracts themselves.

SECRET Ottawa, November 19, 1951

Dear Sir,

This will refer to your letters of October 10th and October 24th about the financial arrangements for the maintenance of the Canadian Brigade in Germany.

I have now been advised by Mr. Ross that the following action has been taken resulting from discussions which he has had with appropriate officers at London, Bonn and BAOR Headquarters.

A directive has been issued to headquarters, BAOR, by the Office of the Service Relations Adviser to the United Kingdom High Commissioner indicating that the following principles have been agreed upon provisionally:

(i) The brigade has been brought into the British zone in Germany under the terms of Article 1.3(a) of the Revised Charter of the Allied High Commission as an auxiliary contingent under the command of the BAOR and to be treated as such for all purposes;

(ii) The brigade is to receive all its requirements of logistic support from German sources through BAOR by means of requisition, procurement, assessment and payment procedures at present in force in the British zone and to be subject to the regulations laid down from time to time by the United Kingdom High Commissioner for use of this machinery in the exercise of Allied High Commission mandatory powers;

(iii) Records are to be maintained of deutschemark costs which are admitted as a charge to the occupation costs and mandatory expenditures budget in accordance with present regulations and which would not have been incurred except for the presence of the brigade in the British zone. The arrangements by which reimbursement will be effected are subject to subsequent decision;

(iv) BAOR are requested to issue the necessary instructions to put these principles into effect as a provisional measure so that the immediate requirements of the brigade can be satisfied.

Mr. Ross has also advised that discussions have taken place at BAOR regarding the necessity for early action to provide alternative accommodation to that now being made available from other allotments to accommodate the 27th Brigade and which alternative accommodation will be required in the fall of 1952. It has been agreed that the acquisition of land and the construction of barracks and other accommodation will be dealt with in the first instance as one of the camp areas required by the BAOR under the existing policy and procedures, and will not be referred to as specifically for Canadian purposes. This was considered essential, firstly, in order that accommodation would be available when required and, secondly, to enable the United Kingdom and other countries with occupation forces to discuss with Germany a proposed contract agreement for the future which may influence our policy also regarding capital costs for construction.

The question of financial adjustment between Canada, the United Kingdom and Germany remains to be decided. On the assumption that Canada will pay the full cost of maintenance of the 27th Brigade in Germany, the alternatives appear to be:

(a) to make arrangements with the Federal German Republic to reimburse them directly for deutschemark costs, or

(b) to pay to the United Kingdom the full costs of maintenance of the Brigade including deutschemark costs on the understanding that settlement will be made between them and the German Government in respect of the deutschemark costs.

We believe that it is preferable for Canada to reimburse the German Government directly for costs incurred by it. We are cabling Mr. Ross, suggesting that he take the opportunity to discuss this aspect of the matter with Mr. Claxton, Mr. Abbott and Mr. Pearson while they are in Europe.

With regard to capital costs, it does not appear to be possible at the present time to reach any final conclusion as to final settlement of these costs as this will depend upon arrangements eventually made as to troop accommodation either as part of infrastructure costs or as a contribution by Germany to the cost of maintaining Western Defence Forces in Germany, or under bilateral arrangements.

Mr. Ross has not yet been able to furnish us with an estimate of the deutschemark and sterling costs of maintaining the 27th Brigade in Germany. Information has been furnished by the War Office as to rates for some of the components, but these are not complete and will be the subject of further discussion. A tentative statement furnished by the United Kingdom on the BAOR deutschemark budget for 1952-53 to the T.C.C. showed a cost in respect of the Canadian Brigade in the neighbourhood of 16 deutschemarks (27 shillings) per day for maintenance and 73 million deutschemarks for capital works services. This budget is being reviewed and revised by BAOR and is, therefore, also the subject of further discussions.

Yours very truly,

E.B. ARMSTRONG

LEGAL STATUS OF 27TH BRIGADE IN GERMANY

The draft amendments described in your telegram appear to be satisfactory, but the possibility of a delay of some weeks in completing the amendment procedure has caused some concern. In the absence of Ministers directly concerned from Ottawa, it is difficult to obtain guidance. In view of the length of time which has elapsed since the United Kingdom High Commissioner agreed in principle to the amendment, we are not happy about the prospects of further delay. It would appear reasonable to request the three Commissioners to hold a special meeting in order to complete the amendment procedure if it cannot be done in the normal course of business for some weeks.

I should be grateful if you would consider the advisability of pressing the three High Commissioners for immediate action. I have asked Washington and Paris by telegram (repeated to London) to explain to the appropriate United States and French authorities the desire of the Canadian Government to see the amendment procedure completed as soon as possible.

STATUS OF FOREIGN FORCES IN GERMANY

Our despatch under reference was shown to Mr. Claxton and the matter discussed with him by Mr. Davis as they travelled together to the welcoming ceremony at Rotterdam.

2. Mr. Davis has reported that Mr. Claxton was prepared to agree that the Brigade receive its status under delegation along the lines of Article 1 of the draft agreement on status of October 30 (S.P.COM/P(51)19, 3rd revision, enclosed with our despatch No. 862 of November 12. Mr. Claxton would, however, have expressed a preference for a delegation from the three Powers rather than from one of them.

3. On reviewing Article 1 of the draft convention I find that sub-paragraph (i) of paragraph 1 of Article 1 speaks of "arrangement with the three Powers or any one of them". The choice therefore exists there.

4. Sub-paragraph (iii) also makes provision for agreement with the three Powers when it says "that one of the three Powers designated as such by agreement between such Power (Canada in this instance) and the three Powers".

5. I would assume that the immediately following proviso would not cause difficulty. It reads: "provided that the Power so designated may delegate to that other Power to exercise of any right or responsibility deriving from this Agreement which relates to the Forces or tribunals of the latter, which shall then be deemed "the Power concerned" to the extent of the delegation."

6. Under the text as it exists I would envisage that an agreement between Canada and the three Powers would arrange for the designation of the U.K., the U.K. in turn, as it is authorized in the above text delegating to Canada the exercise of any right or responsibility deriving from the general agreement.

7. The delegation would be from the United Kingdom to Canada but it would be provided for under an agreement between Canada and the three Powers. If we are not satisfied with the above mechanism of delegation from one Power resulting from agreement with the three, we would have to request that sub-paragraph (b) be amended for the delegation to be made directly by the three Powers, although in fact insofar as Canada did not establish a complete machinery of its own it would be borrowing the machinery of only one of the three. In such a case the delegation would be from three Powers but would apply only to the services and facilities provided by one of them. The whole convention is drafted not on the basis of tripartite machinery but of parallel machinery for each "Power concerned".

8. I will appreciate your early views on whether you are satisfied with the present text of the convention as giving sufficient guarantee to us, or whether you would wish to have it changed in order that the delegation should come directly from the three Powers.

3. Second paragraph of article applies the same to families, including non-German persons in their services.

4. United States element accepted the principles of the law but raised doubt on the legal implications, for example, Canadian forces would become subject to zonal legislation in each zone. Both the French and the British believed point unimportant and only slightly relevant. I concluded, on return to charge, (group corrupt)

United States that they had only raised it in order to have time to seek approval from Washington before the Law is before the Council of the Allied High Commission.

5. Law will be taken up at the next meeting of the Allied High Commission, possibly next Thursday, likely Thursday December 20th.

6. I see no objection to above text. Trust it is agreeable to you. At our suggestion, and with United Kingdom help, it was changed from "Canadian brigade" to "Canadian forces" and "obligations" to "restrictions". First word might imply occupation duties, latter ensures what is meant is customs traffic and other restrictions.

7. Both French and United States would not, repeat not, agree to former text, because of political implications on their forces, particularly on the financial side, making an amendment to the general law with the specific "defence forces" category. Ends.

3. At the same time that your telegram under reference was being considered, we learned of a State Department suggestion to our Embassy in Washington that the amendment procedure be abandoned and replaced by a formal statement by the Allied High Commission. Memorandum by Defence Liaison (1) Division

TOP SECRET Ottawa, April 5, 1951

METHODS OF POLITICAL DISCUSSION IN THE NATO DEPUTIES AND THEIR POSSIBLE CONSEQUENCES — WITH PARTICULAR REFERENCE TO THE DISCUSSION OF YUGOSLAVIA

Basis of Political Discussions in the Deputies

1. The Deputies were created by Council resolution No. 4/7 in May, 1950. The resolution lists some particular tasks which the Council should undertake and one of these is to "exchange views on political matters of common interest within the scope of the Treaty". The resolution goes on to say that Deputies shall be appointed to enable the Council to carry out its responsibilities. The resolution then states:

> "In the intervals between meetings of Ministers, the Deputies, duly authorised by their respective governments, will be responsible, on behalf of and in the name of the Council, for carrying out its policies and for formulating issues requiring decisions by the Member Governments."

In the proposed new terms of reference of the Deputies, both of these tasks will be mentioned in much the same terms as were used in May, 1950, i.e., the task of exchanging views on political matters and the task of formulating issues requiring decisions by the Member Governments (or by the Council).

2. At the Council meeting in May, 1950, Canada was in favour of the Council and the Deputies exchanging views on political matters of common interest within the scope of the Treaty, and there has been no suggestion since then that Canada is opposed to such exchanges of views.

3. There is clearly a sharp distinction between exchanging views, on the one hand, and formulating issues for decisions, on the other hand, although exchanges of views may often lead to the formulation of issues requiring decisions.

Chronological Account of the Discussion of Yugoslavia by the Deputies

4. The Summary Record of the Deputies for January 15, 1951, states:

"THE CHAIRMAN recalled that general political problems had already been discussed by the Deputies. This procedure seemed valuable and fruitful. He suggested that at regular intervals, every week at first and later perhaps every fortnight, the Deputies might exchange ideas on one of the current political problems of a general nature. He proposed that Yugoslavia should be discussed at the following meeting on Monday, 22nd January, 1951.

"The Deputies agreed in principle with this proposal, but stipulated that it was important that there should be a genuine exchange of views and not a series of unilateral statements by one or two Deputies. It would also be necessary for the subjects to be decided in advance, in order to give every Deputy the opportunity to obtain the views of his government and to express the official view. It would not be necessary to keep a record of these discussions."

5. On January 22, the discussion of Yugoslavia took place. The Summary Record does not report on the substance of the discussion. The Summary Record states:

"At the suggestion of the Canadian Deputy it was agreed that while the discussion would not appear in the normal way in the Summary Record, it would be desirable for the Secretary to prepare a draft agreed minute setting out the points covered in the course of discussion. This draft agreed minute could then be considered by a working group on which would be represented all interested delegations. In addition to considering the Secretary's draft the working group would also discuss further those points mentioned in the discussion on which no general agreement existed. Their views thereon would be consolidated and circulated to the Council Deputies, who would, as necessary, seek further instructions from their governments thereon with a view to continuing their discussion of them at a subsequent date."

In telegram No. 212 of January 24,† Canada House reported on the discussion and listed the points on which "general agreement was reached by the Council Deputies". One of these points was that "it was most desirable that the Western Powers should continue to give economic assistance to the Government of Yugoslavia to the best of their ability".

6. On January 29, telegram No. 248† from Canada House described the contents of the draft "agreed minute" prepared by a Working Group. The Department of External Affairs did not send to London any comments on this draft before it came up at the next meeting of the Deputies on February 12. On February 12, the Deputies had before them the draft agreed minute and approved it with a few changes. The Summary Record of the meeting states:

"It was agreed that this document did not constitute an "agreement" in the sense of a commitment for the governments which were a party to it, but was merely the consensus of opinion of those governments on the particular question."

7. Telegram No. 359 of February 13† from Canada House reported on the discussion by the Deputies on February 12 and said, in part:

"In order to avoid misunderstanding and to allay the uneasiness of certain delegations (which apparently included the Danish delegation), Spofford explained that the document was not intended to represent a formal agreement for action, but was merely a record of the present consensus of the Deputies which might be helpful in assisting governments to determine their attitudes towards a common problem. The meeting agreed with Spofford's interpretation of the status of the document.

"The Belgian Deputy suggested that, if individual governments modified their views in a direction different from that indicated in the document, it might be desirable for the deputies to be advised informally of any such change. There was general agreement with this suggestion."

8. The "agreed minute" is Document D-D(51)29(Final).† It is in two main parts. The first part lists points on which "general agreement was reached by the Council Deputies", and one of these points is the desirability of the Western Powers giving economic assistance to the Government of Yugoslavia to the best of their ability. The second part summarizes an exchange of views on the question of military support in advance of any open attack; this part merely reports views which were expressed and does not purport to say that the Deputies agreed to them.

Subsequent Political Discussion by the Deputies

9. Following the precedent established in respect of Yugoslavia, the Deputies had a similar discussion on March 12 regarding the Balkan satellite states. The Summary Record states:

"THE CHAIRMAN suggested that the procedure adopted for the exchange of views on Yugoslavia should also be followed in this instance and that an Ad Hoc Working Group should be instructed to prepare an agreed summary, setting out the consensus of the views expressed in discussion, for subsequent consideration by the Council Deputies after consultation with their respective governments. This agreed summary would not constitute any commitment for the NAT countries with regard to future action. He suggested that it might help future exchanges on political questions if the Ad Hoc Working Group could devise an agreed outline which would consist of a number of specific questions, on the basis of which the respective governments would be asked for instructions. The main object of this outline would be to enable those governments whose sources of information were more restricted than others to frame specific questions on which they were anxious to obtain information from other NAT countries.

THE COUNCIL DEPUTIES:

(1) Instructed the Ad Hoc Working Group to prepare a draft agreed summary on the lines proposed by the Chairman.

(2) Instructed the Working Group to draw up an agreed outline, for transmission to governments, consisting of specific questions on which instructions from governments would be sought."

10. Telegram No. 702 of March 22† from Canada House gives the text of the draft agreed minute concerning this discussion. Most of the minute consists of an appreciation of conditions in the countries. It goes on to say that there should be further consultation in the Deputies on several questions of future policy, e.g., policy towards admission to the United Nations, and policy regarding diplomatic representation. The discussion of these points will take place in April. To date, therefore, we are not called upon to approve a draft agreed minute containing positive policy recommendations.

Possible Objections to the Procedure Followed by the Deputies

11. There has not been a clear distinction between the task of exchanging views and the task of formulating issues for decision by Governments.

12. There has not been a clear distinction, at least in the case of Yugoslavia, between agreeing on an appreciation of the present position and recommending future policy to be followed by the NATO Governments.

13. If it is thought desirable, in certain fields of foreign policy, to try to obtain an agreed policy among NATO Members, the recommended policy (i.e. the issue) should be clearly formulated and segregated for decision by Governments or, in some cases, for decision by the Council on behalf of the Governments. In the case of the Yugoslav discussions, the final result seems to be that we are one-quarter committed to an economic policy which has not been placed before the Canadian Cabinet and which, in fact, Canada has not been following. If it is desired to obtain an agreed NATO foreign policy on some point, all Governments should know clearly that this is the object of the exercise and should not imperceptibly slide from an exchange of views into a kind of vague agreement on future policy.

14. The main criticism of the procedure followed is that the "agreed minute" is not the best instrument for formulating an issue for decision by Governments.

Suggestions for Future Procedure in the Deputies

15. If there should be agreement with the criticisms listed under the previous heading, the following procedure might be considered as more satisfactory:

16. The discussion itself should not be restricted or limited. There is everything to be said in favour of frank discussion in the Deputies of political questions which may affect the Treaty. If any Deputy is in a position, in such a discussion, to recommend a policy on behalf of his Government, he should certainly do so.

17. The agreed minute should do two things:

(1) Set forth the agreed appreciation of the present position;

(2) Set forth what any named or unnamed Deputy or Government thinks the policy should be on any point.

18. The agreed minute should not be officially submitted to Governments in advance of its approval by the Deputies. It should be approved by the Deputies as an accurate record of the discussion and as nothing more and should then, of course, be sent to Governments for their information and consideration.

19. If, during the political discussion, or as a result of it, any Deputy thinks that an issue should be formulated for decision by Governments, or for consideration by the Council, he should formulate it in a resolution, and ample time should then be given to Governments to consider the resolution before it is adopted.

20. The High Commissioner in London might be asked to comment on this memorandum and on the substance of the procedural suggestions listed above. He could also be asked to give advice on the following question: If the Secretary of State for External Affairs would be in agreement with these suggestions, what would be the best method of bringing them before the Deputies?[34]

Following for Heeney, Begins: Your telegram No. 491 of March 22† re possible presentation of Canadian views in the Deputies.

I had withheld a reply to your telegram under reference because it arrived during the recess of the Deputies and because in these last few days the Political Working Group has been preparing suggestions for future procedure in the Deputies in connection with the discussion of political questions.

2. As you indicate in your paragraph 1, the procedure has gradually grown up whereby on the initiative of the tripartite Deputies advance information has been circulated to the other NATO governments through the Deputies' machinery. In addition to the example you mention, Spofford recently circulated the text of the memorandum dealing with the changes in the Prohibited and Limited Industries agreement (Germany) a day or two before its publication. (We had, however, over a fortnight ago received a copy of the same document through the good offices of the Commonwealth Relations Office.) While advance information has occasionally been provided in this way, it has not in any sense amounted to practical consultation.

3. As I am aware, however, from experience in Moscow, the machinery for consultation on questions under discussion on a tripartite or quadripartite basis is not always satisfactory for the reasons which you mention in your paragraph 2. I also have in mind the postscript No. 2 at the end of the departmental memorandum of March 2, dealing with the Minister's comment on the three powers' decision on Berlin in which, despite the existence of the NATO machinery, the advance consultation was inadequate. It may be that the suggestion that the Deputies' machinery might provide a means of consultation in questions of this kind will prove to be a practical and useful one.

I think the dangers of the present procedure are real ones — as indicated above — and that the suggested procedure is sound and should remove those dangers. L.B.P[earson].

4. In order to explore the question further, on a purely official level and to elicit the views of the other NATO officials here, our representative yesterday submitted to the Political Working Group charged with making suggestions about procedure for discussion of political questions, an informal outline setting forth the purposes of the discussion of political subjects in the following terms, Begins:

Under their terms of reference the Council Deputies are authorized to "exchange views on political matters of common interest within the scope of the treaty". The Deputies' discussion of political questions should serve the following main purposes:

(a) To provide a useful means of exchanging information and points of view on current political questions coming within the scope of matters of concern to the members of the NATO;

(b) Arising out of this exchange of information, to provide a summary of points on which there are common views and points on which views differ;

(c) To provide a useful channel for inter-governmental consultation on political questions of common concern. Such questions might either be proposed by agreement of the Deputies themselves, or might be taken up at the request of one or more of the N.A.T. governments. An example of the former type of consultation is the Deputies' recent discussions of conditions in Yugoslavia and the satellite states. An example of the second type is the recent request from the United States Government for an expression of views by the other N.A.T. governments with respect to United States assistance to Yugoslavia.

(d) To provide a means of consultation between the three major western powers, the United Kingdom, United States, and France, on the one hand, and the other NATO members on the other, on questions under discussion on a tripartite or quadripartite basis which are of concern to NATO as a whole. Thus these exchanges of information might gradually develop into consultation of a practical kind. Such a procedure does not preclude the use of other means for consultation and co-operation between any or all of the NATO members. Ends.

5. The Working Group readily accepted sections (a), (b) and (c) in the first part of the Canadian working paper, although none of the officials was able to express an opinion on paragraph (d), which, as you will see, contains the substance of your suggestion which we have put forward not as a government view, but as a suggestion on which we would welcome views.

6. In connection with procedure, on which the United Kingdom and Norwegian representatives have also submitted drafts, the consensus of view was that the procedure for discussion of political topics should be as flexible and simple as possible, and there was also agreement that as a general rule the discussions, contrary to the Norwegian suggestion, should seek to ensure the participation of all the Deputies on matters of common concern, although it was recognized that on occasions a presentation by a single deputy might be a useful method of tackling the subject.

7. The Working Group will continue its discussions to-day in the hope of producing an agreed paper for the Deputies. It has been our impression that while the United States and French representatives have been quite anxious to encourage these political discussions, which I believe most of the member countries have found to be of value, the United Kingdom representative is somewhat less sanguine about their usefulness, and the Foreign Office would, on the whole, prefer to stick to the regular channels of consultation rather than to lean too heavily on the Deputies' machinery. My own view is that the discussion of political matters is a legitimate and useful part of the general functions of NATO, and that we should welcome and encourage an extension of the previous discussions in this field from an exchange of information to a more definitive means of consultation. This, however, is bound to be a gradual and empirical process.

Your telegram No. 592 of April 11† re procedure governing political discussions in the Deputies.

2. I have studied with interest Departmental memorandum on April 5 on this subject, and have also discussed the background more fully with Mr. [C.S.A.] Ritchie.

3. I fully share the view expressed in the memorandum that a clear distinction should be made between summary appreciations of the present position in a particular country or region on the one hand, and on the other, the formulation of proposals or recommendations requiring decision by governments or specification on their behalf by the Council (or Council Deputies). This procedure has been followed in connection with recent discussions of political matters, e.g., conditions in Balkan satellites and East Germany, which have been confined to preparing what are essentially appreciations of current conditions and developments.

4. In the discussion of conditions in the Balkan satellites the procedure followed here was as follows:

(1) Preliminary Deputies discussion on March 12;

(2) Preparation by Working Group of draft agreed minute (document D-D(51)80 of March 22);† and

(3) Further discussion in Deputies on April 11 (on basis of document D-D(51)80). This draft agreed minute, which is now before you, is divided into three parts:

(1) The general consensus of opinion expressed by Council Deputies on current military, political and economic conditions in the four countries;

(2) A statement of views expressed by the Italian Deputy on behalf of the Italian Government; and

(3) A list of points on which it was suggested that further consultation might take place in the Council Deputies, e.g., diplomatic representation, breaches of peace treaties, etc. This further consultation took place in the Deputies on April 11, following which the Working Group was requested to revise the draft agreed minute covering the views expressed on the questions contained in section 3 of document D-D(51)80.

5. Similarly, conditions in East Germany were discussed in the Deputies on March 19, and as a result of this discussion a draft agreed minute (document D-D(51)90 of April 5)† was prepared. This document summarizes the views expressed on current conditions in East Germany, and in its section 4 simply lists, without making any recommendations, a number of subjects on which information was incomplete and additional questions which might be discussed in the Deputies at a subsequent meeting. In neither of these cases does the draft agreed minute contain any specific proposals or recommendations.

6. I assume you agree that the case of the earlier consultation on Berlin security which took place in the Deputies, in which a specific resolution was placed before governments for consideration would fall well within the framework of the procedure outlined in paragraph 19 of the Department's memorandum.

7. The remaining question on which the memorandum is largely based arises out of the Deputies' earlier discussion of Yugoslavia. I agree that on its face the general statement contained in the draft agreed minute that "it was most desirable that the Western Powers should continue to give economic assistance to the Government of Yugoslavia to the best of their ability" contains an expression of opinion that for several governments, including the Canadian Government, goes beyond the present position. In future, I think that, as in the case of the more recent discussions, there should be a clear distinction between the appreciation of current conditions and expressions of opinion by one or several Deputies or Governments, and specific policy recommendations. But at the same time, as is pointed out in paragraph 6 of the memorandum, it has been agreed by the Deputies, and stressed on several occasions, that the agreed minutes do not in any sense constitute a commitment on governments.

8. At the meeting of the Deputies on April 11 I again raised this general question, and the Chairman agreed that it would be desirable to place on record once again the agreement which had been reached at previous meetings, namely, that the agreed minutes which were drawn up as a result of the Deputies' discussions merely represented a consensus of the views expressed, but did not involve any individual country in commitments. In this light my own interpretation of the specific point raised in the memorandum in connection with Yugoslavia is that the general statement referred to in paragraph 7 above does not in any sense commit the Canadian Government to taking specific action to give economic assistance to Yugoslavia.

9. As you will have seen from our previous messages, the question of the procedure to be followed in connection with the discussion of political topics in the Deputies has been receiving active study by the political working group, and you will already have received the Working Group's preliminary report on this subject (document D-D(51)92 of April 9).† Paragraph 2 of this paper follows closely the paper which we put forward as indicated in my telegram No. 825 of April [6]. In the Working Group there was a general feeling that the specific reference (sub-paragraph (d) of my No. 825) to the United Kingdom, United States and France was inadvisable. The point which you had in mind in your telegram No. 491 of March 22† concerning consultation on matters under discussion on a tripartite or quadripartite basis is, however, provided for in paragraph 1(c) of the Working Group's paper of April 9. The Working Group also makes a clear distinction between reports of informal exchanges of view on the one hand and intergovernmental consultation which may give rise to recommendations to governments. Your early comments on the Working Group's paper which was prepared before receipt of your memorandum and which has not yet been considered by the Deputies would be most helpful.

10. One thought which has occurred to me is that we might abandon the use of the phrase "agreed minute", since it is slightly misleading. The document produced by the Working Group on the basis of the Deputies' discussions might simply be described as a "summary" or "summary report" of Deputies' discussions.

11. There are two main points on which I would suggest modifications in the views set forth in the Department's memorandum. First, with regard to the view expressed in paragraph 18 to the effect that the "agreed minute" (or what might in future be called a "summary report"), should not be officially submitted to Governments in advance of its approval by the Deputies, I assume however that such agreed minutes should be communicated to you since as a result of the Working Group's drafting efforts, points may arise additional to those already covered in the Deputies' preliminary discussion on which further background information or expressions of view on behalf of individual governments will be required. I therefore think that a reference to governments of the summary at the discretion of the Deputies will operate to place the individual Deputies in a better position to discuss such additional points with the necessary background. I do not feel that such a submission to governments of the agreed minute or summary implies any commitment.

12. Second, there is a question when policy matters are raised whether it is appropriate to proceed at all times by means of resolution. As a result of discussion of political questions in the Deputies it may be necessary to place proposals before governments from time to time, although the subject matter might not warrant these being framed in the form of a formal resolution. Possibly two types of proposals for further action might develop, (1) Recommendations on questions of lesser importance, and (2) Resolutions on questions of major importance.

13. The report of the political Working Group (D-D(51)92 of April 9) is to be considered at tomorrow's Deputies' meeting, but I do not expect that any final action will be taken. Your early comments, therefore, on this paper would be welcomed.

My telegram No. 916 of April 17 re political discussions in the Deputies.

With reference to NATO Document D-D(51)92, it had been our impression that the working paper was still in draft, and would be considered at a further meeting of the Working Group before going to the Deputies. It was, however, placed on the agenda for yesterday. Part 3 of the document was in large part the handiwork of the Italian chairman of the Working Group on the basis of a French text, and certain of the ambiguities at any rate arose from the difficulties of translation.

2. After discussion with Ritchie, and bearing in mind the observations set forth in the departmental memorandum, I took the opportunity of indicating that in our view the opportunities for exchanging views and consultation afforded by the forum of the Council Deputies were useful, and that we should like to see these discussions continue on a regular basis. While welcoming the opportunity for comparing the thinking in our respective Foreign Offices on current political questions, I pointed out that it was important that such discussions should proceed, as far as possible, on an informal basis, and that the results of these discussions should not be interpreted in any sense as a commitment on governments. In this light I suggested that part 3 of the working paper required clarification in order to make clear the distinction between exchanges and consultation on the one hand, and proposals to governments which might occasionally arise out of such exchanges of views and which should be separated from the reports of these discussions and placed before governments for consideration in the form of resolutions from the Council Deputies.

3. I also indicated that the phrase hitherto used of "agreed minute" might be slightly misleading, and suggested that the paper produced by the Working Group on the basis of the Deputies' discussion might more accurately be described as a "summary report".

4. In order to clarify these points further, I submitted the following re-draft of part 3 for the consideration of the Deputies and for reference to the Political Working Group, Begins:

The Working Group suggests that the following procedure be pursued in the exchanges of views and consultation on political questions in the Council Deputies:

(a) Selection by Deputies of subjects for discussion;

(b) Where necessary, preparation by Political Working Group on basis of Deputies' selection of a brief working paper setting forth particular points on which Deputies' discussion might focus. Such a working paper should help to provide a framework for discussion;

(c) While preparation of this preliminary working paper should normally be entrusted to the Working Group, in appropriate cases, however, the Council Deputies might direct one or several delegations, or one of the special assistants to the chairman, to undertake this task;

(d) After a convenient lapse of time to enable Deputies to receive instructions, discussion of the subject by the Council Deputies;

(e) Preparation of a summary report of the Deputies' discussion. This task should normally fall to the Working Group, which should work on the basis of the draft minutes prepared by the secretariat or by one of the "special assistants". In the preparation of this summary report the Working Group should confine itself to summarizing the exchanges of information showing points on which common views exist, and those on which views differ;

(f) Further discussion where necessary, and approval by the Deputies of the summary report. It is understood that the summary report when approved by Deputies does not imply any commitments for governments.

If, as a result of these exchanges of views and consultation, the Deputies should desire to formulate questions for decisions by governments, they should proceed by resolution of the Council Deputies for submission to governments. Ends.

5. In the brief discussion which followed, the Danish, Italian and Portuguese Deputies at once said that they could concur in our re-draft of part 3. The United Kingdom Acting Deputy said that he, too, was in general agreement, and had had it in mind to suggest that the Deputies' discussion should not be over-formalized and raised the question whether it might not be sufficient as an alternative to producing an "agreed minute" or "summary report" to simply include a record of the Deputies' discussion in the regular minutes.

6. The Netherlands Deputy stressed the importance of exchanging information and maintaining an adequate record of the views exchanged, and said that he thought that the last sentence in part (e) of our re-draft was perhaps the central point.

7. Spofford again emphasized that it had been stated and re-stated that the discussions of the Deputies of political matters did not in any sense imply commitments for governments, and indicated that in addition to straight-forward exchanges of information (which could be exchanged by memorandum) the actual participation and exchange of information by the Deputies round the table served a useful purpose. In his view the discussion should embrace not only the interchange of factual information but should also serve to bring out the viewpoints and attitudes of the governments represented on the questions under discussion.

8. This view was shared by the Netherlands Deputy who pointed out that governments had not only to read reports but to act, and that it would be of continuing interest to have an expression of the views of individual governments on specific problems coming before them.

9. At the conclusion of this brief discussion, and before reference of our proposed revision of part 3 to the Working Group which meets again today, I expressed agreement with the view that those Deputies who may be in a position to express the points of view of their respective governments on particular questions should do so, and pointed out that the last paragraph of our proposed revision might provide for a separate formulation of questions arising out of our discussions which might require consideration by governments.

10. The preliminary reaction to our proposed revision was quite satisfactory, and I think that it goes a considerable way towards eliminating the difficulties referred to in your telegram No. 636 of April 16.†

Your telegrams 916 of April 17 and 939 of April 19 re procedure for political discussions in the Deputies.
Following from Acting Under-Secretary, Begins: We are pleased to see that there is no difference of opinion between Canada House and this Department on the problems discussed in our memorandum of April 5.

2. The observations in paras. 3 and 7 of your telegram No. 916, coupled with the revision of the procedural paper quoted in para. 4 of your telegram No. 939, meet all our points.

3. With reference to para. 11 of your telegram No. 916, the fact that your draft of the procedural paper does not (not) require Governments to consider the draft "agreed minute" prior to its approval by the Deputies does not (not) mean that an individual Deputy should not send such drafts to his Government. He probably should in most cases, but that will be a matter between him and his Government and will not be a formal part of the record so far as the Deputies as a group are concerned.

4. I agree that "summary report" is preferable to "agreed minute".

5. With reference to paragraph 12 of your telegram No. 916 I agree that there may be cases in which a formal resolution may not be the best method of placing a proposal before governments. At times it may be sufficient to say in the Summary Record of a Deputies meeting that governments are invited to consider a suggestion. Alternatively, some other means, such as a "recommendation" may be considered more appropriate than a formal resolution. If the Working Group or the Deputies think that the last paragraph of your revised draft is too categorical, we would not object to some modification, so long as it is clear that any proposals intended to lead to governmental decisions are identified as such and are handled in a different manner from the views and suggestions contained in the Summary Report.

2. With regard to last paragraph of the document I took the opportunity of explaining, on the lines of paragraph 5 of your telegram No. 1681, that the minutes of our meeting to-day might include a brief reference to the fact that the suggestion that the Deputies proceed by way of resolution in placing matters before governments for consideration should not be taken to exclude the use of less formal means of bringing any proposals which might be made to the attention of governments. It was generally agreed, without making any modification in the language of the Working Group paper, that the final paragraph should be understood in this light.

NATO REORGANIZATION

DRAFT TERMS OF REFERENCE OF THE COUNCIL AND COUNCIL DEPUTIES

At its meeting on October 25, 1950, Cabinet agreed to the proposal of the Minister of National Defence that at the forthcoming meeting of the North Atlantic Defence Committee in Washington he should, among other things, seek to simplify the structure of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. A memorandum, drafted in the Department of External Affairs, was subsequently circulated among the Council Deputies in London. The objectives of the Canadian proposals for streamlining and simplifying the top structure of NATO met with a warm response from most Governments, and at the meeting of the North Atlantic Council in Brussels on December 19, a resolution was passed supporting the idea in principle and asking the Deputies to formulate specific recommendations or take appropriate action as speedily as possible. This development was noted with approval by Cabinet when discussing the report of the Minister of National Defence on December 21, 1950.

Since that time, the Deputies have been discussing a series of draft recommendations which have recently narrowed down to recommendations for revising the terms of reference of the Council and Council Deputies only; the reorganization of the military structure of NATO and of the agencies concerned with production, finance, economic, and information activities are being held in abeyance for the time being; to wait until all details of the related and subordinate organizations under the Treaty have been worked out would delay acceptance of the central proposals for the Council and Council Deputies and once the top structure has been agreed, the terms of reference for the related agencies can more readily be adopted.

During the past few days, the Deputies have reached almost complete agreement on a draft text contained in Document D-D(51)86 (Revise),† attached. Final agreement among the Deputies is expected to be reached within the next day or two. (The Deputies have already decided that they prefer the U.S. draft text of paragraph 4, given in the Document). By Monday, April 16, the Deputies hope to be in a position to approve of the Document on behalf of their Governments.[35] This will obviate the necessity for waiting for the next meeting of the Council and would give the seal of approval forthwith to plans which have already been fully and carefully discussed over a period of several months, in consultation with the Ministers principally concerned.

To quote from the memorandum explaining the Canadian proposals to the other Deputies,

"The Canadian approach to the problem is based on two assumptions:

(a) That there is a general recognition by member governments that the increased responsibilities of the NATO now makes necessary some degree of reorganization, and that it is timely to examine the problem as a whole;

(b) That any changes in the organization that may be necessary or advisable should be made without alteration of the Treaty, that is by appropriate revision of the "by-laws" of the NATO rather than by amendment to its "constitution". (In the Canadian view, this can be accomplished by revising previous decisions of the Council and the Defence Committee).

"Under the present structure, with three separate Committees of Ministers, a problem of coordination arises and this problem is difficult to resolve simply through the Council Deputies. Moreover, quick action is often impeded because if a meeting of a Ministerial Committee is pending Governments may tend to defer approval of proposals under consideration in the Council Deputies. With the accelerated transformation from the period of planning to the period of action, it is desirable to limit the number of Treaty bodies which meet periodically. The changed circumstances dictate that all the subsidiary bodies of the organization should be on a continuing basis, with only the North Atlantic Council meeting periodically to review progress and work of the subsidiary bodies and to make decisions on higher and general policy."

The draft terms of reference have been submitted by the Deputies for approval by governments. If approved, the terms of reference will mean the acceptance of the central features of the Canadian proposals. After referring to the basic NATO documents establishing the original terms of reference for the Council and Council Deputies, the document proceeds to outline consolidated terms of reference for the Council, as a Council representing Governments, and for the Deputies acting continuously on behalf of the Council when the Council is not in session. Under the proposed terms of reference, neither the Council nor their Deputies shall have authority to take decisions which shall bind Governments except on the express authority of Governments; their primary function is, as before, to make recommendations to Governments. But the anomaly of having three separate Ministerial committees comprising the top structure of NATO would have been eliminated by their incorporation into one Council, and a sound constitutional basis for co-operation between civil and military sides of the organization would have been established.

The operative paragraphs in the attached document are paragraph 4 dealing with the Council and paragraphs 10 and 11 dealing with the Deputies.

[35] Voir/See FRUS, 1951, Volume III, pp. 142*n*.2, 150*n*.3, 156-59.

While the Government might have preferred to have seen proposals covering the reorganization of NATO as a whole, including the military, economic, financial, and information agencies under the Treaty, I think that with the acceptance of the central features of the Canadian proposals for the Council and Council Deputies, a major improvement will have been effected which will help to speed up and co-ordinate effective action for building up our common strength under the Treaty. I therefore recommend that Mr. Wilgress should be authorized by the Government to agree to the terms of reference for the Council and Council Deputies in accordance with Document D-D(51)86 (Revise).[36]

FINANCING OF NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY

1. The North Atlantic Treaty Organization has involved the creation of several civilian and military agencies. As a member, Canada has been requested to participate financially in the formation and upkeep of these agencies. Apart from the Council, for which no staff is required and hence no expenses involved, the agencies or arms of NATO are the following:

NATO Civilian Bodies

(a) Council Deputies. This group maintains a small staff and Secretariat.

(b) Defence Production Board. There will be some staff expenses in connection with this agency for which a separate Secretariat is contemplated.

(c) Financial and Economic Board. This agency is in the process of formation. It is too early to forecast the size and cost of the Secretariat which will service it.

(d) Standing Group. The three countries — the United States, United Kingdom and France — which make up this group, carry its full expenses.

NATO Military Bodies

[36] Approuvé par le Cabinet, le 13 avril 1951./Approved by Cabinet, April 13, 1951.

(e) Eisenhower's Supreme Headquarters (SHAPE) and its Subordinate Regional Commands. There will be substantial running and capital costs involved in the organization of these Commands. Preliminary plans contemplate three Subordinate Commands — (i) Central, (ii) North, and (iii) South European, as well as Eisenhower's Supreme Headquarters (see Appendix "A" for diagram of SHAPE Command structure).†

(f) SACLANT (Headquarters Supreme Atlantic Command). This Command is in the process of formation. Budgetary requirements should be considerably lower than SHAPE.

(g) Other Supreme Commands. The only other Supreme Command under consideration at the moment is the Mediterranean Command, which has not yet been formed. Budgetary requirements for this Command are still uncertain but they will probably be much the same as for SACLANT.

(h) Infrastructure. Capital and running costs of the civilian and military bodies will be small in relation to the more important item of "infrastructure" which (under the current military conception) covers "the static items of expenditure which are required to provide the material backing for operational plans necessary to enable the Higher Command to function and the various forces to operate with efficiency". In this sense infrastructure includes such installations as communication facilities, railways, military airfields, barracks, etc. (See Appendix "B" for wider definition).†

FINANCIAL PROBLEMS

2. The creation of this extensive and complex structure has raised difficult problems of financing. In the early stages, essential funds were provided on the rough principle of "let the costs fall where they lie". However, as preparations have proceeded and costs grown, questions of a basis for sharing financial responsibility have arisen. These have involved protracted negotiations in which the Canadian representative has participated within the framework of general guidance provided by the Defence Panel from Ottawa. However, these negotiations have now reached a stage where important financial commitments may be involved. Therefore, it is necessary to obtain Cabinet approval of appropriate future policies.

GENERAL PRINCIPLES

3. It has been decided that because of differences in the nature of expenditures and their overall magnitude, there should be separate budgets for the civilian bodies of NATO and for military expenditures. It has also been recognized that different principles may be involved in financing current administrative expenditures (commonly called "running costs") of these organizations and the capital expenditures (involved in the creation of lasting assets). In general, discussion of each of these questions has proceeded separately, though their basic inter-dependence is generally recognized.

4. The following is a brief outline of:

(a) the estimated magnitude of each of these types of expenditure;

(b) the attitude taken by the Canadian representative and others in discussions to date; and

(c) recommendations for future policies.

RUNNING COSTS

NATO Civilian Bodies

5. At this stage it is difficult to provide accurate estimates of probable annual running costs. However, rough preliminary estimates indicate that expenditures will run at the annual rate of $2,500,000 (including an estimate of $1 million for the Defence Production Board).

6. It has been generally agreed that these expenditures are a common responsibility and should be shared by all NATO members. A number of formulae for sharing of costs have been suggested, but discussion has finally narrowed down to consideration of scales based on:

(a) a direct comparison of relative national incomes. On this basis the United States would pay almost 70%; the United Kingdom about 12.4%; Canada 3.6%;

(b) a national income comparison with a ceiling on the United States contribution. A ceiling of 45% on the United States would entail a Canadian contribution of almost 7%;

(c) a formula under which the United States and other members of the Standing Group are "grouped" so as to pay the same contribution (22 1/2%). Other member states would share on a graduated scale. In this scale Canada would pay 8%.

7. Although the Canadian representative favoured the straight national income approach as the closest approximation to the relative "capacity to pay" of the various NATO members, it was necessary to bow to insistence of the United States (supported by the United Kingdom and France) that the adoption of the "grouping" formula for sharing administrative expenditures would be particularly advantageous for the maintenance of good relations with the United States Congress. Although acceptance of the "grouping" formula will not make much difference in cost to Canada in respect of civilian costs, this may well establish a precedent for the much more burdensome military phases of NATO activities.

8. It is recommended that Canada be authorized to share in the civilian costs of NATO on the basis of the "grouping" formula (referred to in paragraph 6(c) above).

9. In order to finance these activities pending the annual receipt of members' contributions, it has been suggested that a Working Capital ("revolving") Fund should be established. Member states would make advances to this Fund on the basis of the agreed scale. The size of the Fund has not yet been determined, but it is agreed that it should be established at a level appropriate to the anticipated annual rate of civilian expenditures. A starting figure of between $1 million and £400,000 has been mentioned (to which Canada's contribution on the basis of an 8% share would be between $80,000 and $100,000). The advances made by member states would be carried to their credit.

10. It is recommended that Canada be authorized to make advances to a Working Capital Fund of reasonable size; these advances to be in the same proportion as the regular annual contributions.

SHAPE

11. The running costs of SHAPE (excluding the costs of military personnel which would continue to be financed by national defence budgets) for the first annual financial period are estimated to be $3 million. These amounts will presumably increase considerably as the military installations and forces under General Eisenhower's command grow.

12. It has been generally agreed that all NATO members should contribute to the running costs of SHAPE. The detailed discussions of a cost-sharing formula have closely paralleled those for NATO civilian bodies. The Canadian representative has favoured a formula based on a comparison of national incomes (with a ceiling on the United States) as the most equitable principle for sharing these amounts. However, the United States, with some outside support, has continued to press strongly for a "grouping" formula.

13. To date no decisions have been reached on the scale to be applied.

14. It is recommended that the Canadian representative continue to favour the adoption of a scale based on a comparison of national incomes (with a ceiling of between 40% and 50% on the United States). However, if necessary to secure general agreement, he should be authorized to agree to a scale based on a grouping formula provided that the Canadian contribution does not exceed 8%.

15. He should also be authorized to indicate that Canada would be willing to participate in provision of interim advances (based on this scale) if funds are required to finance the programme pending the receipt of regular contributions.

Other Supreme Commands

16. As indicated in paragraphs 1(f) and 1(g) above, it is not yet possible to forecast the probable annual running costs of these Commands.

17. It is recommended that the same principles that are adopted for SHAPE should be applied to the financing of the Atlantic Sea Command and other Supreme Commands (e.g. Mediterranean Command).

Subordinate Commands

18. Very rough and preliminary estimates indicate an annual rate of expenditure of some $3 million for the running expenses of the Subordinate Command Headquarters.

19. As in the case of the Supreme Commands, it has been contended that all NATO members should contribute to the running costs of these Subordinate Commands as an integral part of the common defence structure. There have, however, been suggestions that in sharing these costs special weight should be given to the greater strategic interest of the countries in the geographic area in which the Subordinate Command is located.

20. Any attempt to assess members on the basis of geographic location and strategic interest would undoubtedly require intricate and complicated financial computations. Furthermore, it is more than likely that the amounts member states would save by reduced contributions to some Commands would, on balance, be more than offset by increases in others.

21. It is therefore recommended that all countries should contribute to the running costs of all Subordinate Commands on the basis of the agreed cost-sharing formula (referred to in paragraph 14 above), and that, if necessary, interim advances be provided to finance these activities pending agreement on an payment of regular annual contributions.

CAPITAL COSTS

Magnitude of the Problem

(a) SHAPE

22. It is estimated that the capital requirements for the first financial period will be:

	Millions of francs	Approximate Canadian Equivalent
New constructions, furniture	745	$2,235,000
Equipment, etc.	121	363,000
Communications	573.5	1,720,000
Underground accommodation	573.5	1,720,000
Total approximately	2,000	$6,038,000

23. These are now being financed by advances of 350 million francs each from the United States and France. Other governments have also been requested to make interim advances.

(b) Other Commands

24. No estimates are as yet available for the Atlantic Sea Command, other Supreme Commands or the Subordinate Commands owing to the preliminary state of organization.

25. Expenditures to date have been negligible and have been financed nationally.

(c) Infrastructure

26. In 1950, under the Brussels Treaty, the sum of £33 million was allocated for infrastructure projects which were to be completed in 1951 (and in some cases 1952). These projects (known as the first slice of the infrastructure programme) were recognized by the Standing Group as part of approved NATO plans.

27. On March 20th, 1951, the Principal Staff Officers Committee submitted a further list of projects as a "second slice" of the infrastructure programme. These projects were submitted "as a matter of urgency ... in order to ensure that operational planning keeps pace with the progressive development of forces".

28. The estimated funds required for these projects are summarized as follows:

Projects	Total Funds for Expenditures in 1951 and 1952	Approximate dollar Equivalent
Headquarters	£1,446,500
Air Forces	50,902,450
Communications	54,282,630
Administration	6,078,200
Total second slice	£112,709,780	Approx. $330 million

29. Of these amounts, it is reported that £67,784,300 (approximately $200 million) is required as a matter of urgency for projects which must be completed or started in 1951. It is also reported that £44,925,480 (approximately $130 million) is required for projects to be completed or worked on in 1952.

30. In order that work on the most urgent projects might be started without delay, the Chiefs of Staff undertook "individually to approach national governments with a view to the immediate provision of funds so that work may be begun; such provision of funds being subject to adjustment when the allocation of costs has been determined". They also recommended "strongly" that "since negotiations for the eventual sharing of costs may take some time, the Standing Group should ask the appropriate NATO agency also to press the governments concerned to provide the necessary money for preliminary work immediately without prejudice to eventual financial arrangement; and if this approach is not fruitful, to seek some means whereby work on urgent projects may start without delay".

31. As a result, work has been proceeding on the projects under varying national financial arrangements.

PROPOSED POLICIES FOR SHARING OF CAPITAL COSTS (OTHER THAN INFRASTRUCTURE)

32. The various Commands form an integral part of the overall NATO defence structure, and it is generally agreed that there is a common responsibility for provision of the capital installations essential to their proper functioning.

33. However, by contrast with current ("running") expenditures where no lasting assets are created, the provision of certain capital installations, particularly buildings, may create assets of considerable current and future value to the economy in which they are located. It would therefore seem desirable to take this factor fully into account in arranging for financing of these installations.

34. In general, these installations can be grouped under the following categories:

(a) buildings and other installations which may have current or future value to the economy of the country or area in which they are located. Within this category, a further distinction might be made for installations specially built for the purpose and those transferred from other uses.

(b) installations like SHAPE Underground, which are primarily (or even exclusively) of military value and have no important alternative economic use.

35. There will, of course, be many cases in which a combination of both elements is present.

36. It would seem desirable to arrange for national financing of all installations in category (a). For example, the French Government might erect the building for SHAPE Headquarters and other NATO members might discharge their common responsibility by sharing an annual rental chargeable on the regular SHAPE budget. This rental might be computed on the basis of an agreed annual rate of depreciation or some other amortization principle which takes into account the expected life and value of the building.

37. Under this approach the capital cost would be converted to a current running cost, with the following important advantages:

(a) An automatic deterrent to construction of over-ambitious, costly and unwarranted installations would be provided.

(b) Since ultimate title would be vested in the national government concerned (rather than NATO), complex wind-up negotiations should not be necessary to establish the residual value of the buildings in the event of the termination of NATO activities.

38. Alternatively, if national financing imposes too heavy burdens on certain member states, the building might be financed by capital advances, from all or some NATO members. These advances could, in turn, be liquidated by annual rentals. This would maintain the safeguard referred to in (a) above, but negotiations for determination of compensation at wind-up would still be required.

39. For installations in category (b) with no lasting economic value, the above approaches would hardly be practicable.

40. Apart from the fact that costs of these special military installations might run high, imposing heavy burdens on individual states, it would be extremely difficult to arrive at an adequate, simple and workable rental formula which would be applicable to installations such as underground, telecommunications facilities, etc.

41. In these cases all member states might be expected to share in cost of providing this type of installation. This might involve direct sharing of costs or provision of capital advances to be amortized over a period of years. In either case member states might share on the basis of a cost-sharing formula.

42. It is therefore recommended that the Canadian representative should seek the widest possible application of the rental principle. However, in cases where the rental principle is not applicable, he should be authorized to agree to common financing (either directly or through capital advances); member states to share on the basis of agreed cost-sharing formula.

INFRASTRUCTURE

43. Although the distinction between capital costs of the various Command headquarters and other infrastructure installations is not readily evident, the amounts involved in infrastructure are so great as to seriously affect the extent and concept of the whole defence effort of each NATO member. Furthermore, once constructed, many of the installations, such as airfields, military roads, etc. become basic to the economy of the country or the area in which they are located. For these two main reasons, it is considered that the whole question of financing of infrastructure should be dealt with separately and in proper relationship to the other defence expenditures of each country.

44. Discussions are now proceeding in London attempting to establish the real distinction between "capital cost" and "infrastructure". It has been reported that as a matter of convenience, or because of their relative urgency, some of the items required for the initial installation of various headquarters are being treated as "capital cost", although it is possible that these, ultimately, might be regarded as part of infrastructure.

45. It has been suggested that for the purpose of the first budget these "capital cost" elements might be treated as current "running" costs but that if any arrangement is worked out later for dealing with infrastructure, the capital costs might be extracted (possibly on a retroactive basis) and treated as infrastructure.

46. The Panel on the Economic Aspects of Defence Questions will consider this matter and submit recommendations.

III. FINANCING OF NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY ORGANIZATION

22. The Minister of Finance said that, in the light of discussions in the Panel on Economic Aspects of Defence Questions, his department had prepared detailed recommendations as to the scale of Canadian contributions to the maintenance of North Atlantic Treaty civilian and military organizations. If approved, the recommendations could serve as a basis for instructions to Canadian representatives on NATO bodies which were negotiating the question of contributions.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated.

(Department of Finance memorandum, April 16, 1951 — Cabinet Document D281).

23. The Secretary of State for External Affairs referred to the recommendations to the effect that, with respect to the running expenses of SHAPE, other Supreme Commands and Subordinate Commands, Canada should continue to favour a scale of contributions based on a comparison of national incomes with a ceiling of 40 - 50% for the United States but that, if necessary, Canada should agree to a scale based on the "grouping formula" under which its contribution would not exceed 8%. He suggested that, if the grouping formula had to be accepted in order to secure agreement, such acceptance should be on the understanding that the Canadian Government would reserve the right to re-open the matter if the expenses in question rose substantially beyond present estimates.

24. The Prime Minister thought that the same revised formula should apply to capital costs of SHAPE, other Supreme Commands and Subordinate Commands (not including "infrastructure").

25. Mr. Pearson suggested that, as the High Commissioner in London had pointed out objections to the rental principle as a means of financing installations of value to the areas in which they were located, the recommendation on this question should be so amended that Canada would seek application of the rental principle only where feasible rather than the widest possible application of this principle.

26. Mr. St-Laurent, referring to the financing of "infrastructure", saw no objection to Canada agreeing in principle to common financing of installations of common interest on a basis to be decided upon after further negotiations. In any plan decided upon for common financing, however, Canada could not commit itself beyond a straight national income basis (not including any ceiling on U.S. contributions). It would be desirable for Canadian representatives on NATO bodies dealing with this question to refer to Canadian expenditures on "infrastructure-type" items in Canada, such as the NATO aircrew training plan.

27. Mr. Deutsch said that there would be budget committees to control NATO expenses on both the civilian and military sides and that the Council Deputies would in turn control both the civilian and military budgets. It would be desirable for Canada to press for a consolidated budget so that one annual contribution by member Governments would cover all NATO expenses.

28. Mr. Pearson thought it important that Canada take a very active part in the work of the budget committees in the interests of economy, and that it have really competent senior representation for this purpose.

29. Mr. Abbott thought that it would probably be more satisfactory if the Department of National Defence could provide a senior and experienced official familiar with the problems of Service finance and accounting.

30. Mr. St-Laurent considered that the Canadian position in the budget committees should not be so much to try to limit expenses for Canada in particular, as to ensure that the resources of NATO, which had limits, were used to the greatest possible advantage.

He suggested that NATO military costs should be charged to the budget of the Department of National Defence and civilian costs to the Department of External Affairs.

31. The Committee, after further discussion, agreed:

(1) to the recommendations of the Panel on Economic Aspects of Defence Questions (Cab. Doc. D281) regarding the position to be taken by Canadian representatives on bodies discussing the financing of NATO civilian and military expenses, on the understanding that:

(a) as regards running expenses of SHAPE, other Supreme Commands and Subordinate Commands, if the "grouping formula", rather than the straight national income formula, had to be accepted in order to obtain agreement, the government would reserve the right to re-open the matter if the expenses in question rose substantially beyond the scale presently estimated;

(b) as regards capital costs of SHAPE, other Supreme Commands and Subordinate Commands (other than "infrastructure"), Canada would seek application of the rental principle only where feasible; and, in cases where this was not feasible, if the "grouping formula" rather than the straight national income basis had to be accepted, the government would reserve the right to re-open the matter if the expenses in question rose substantially beyond the scale presently estimated;

(2) that, as regards "infrastructure", appropriate Canadian representatives should indicate agreement in principle to common financing of installations of common interest on a basis to be decided on after further study; indicate that, in any plan for common financing, Canada could not commit itself beyond the straight national income basis (not including a ceiling on U.S. contributions); and, on suitable occasions, make reference to Canada's expenditures on "infrastructure-type" items in Canada, such as the NATO aircrew training plan;

(3) that appropriate Canadian representatives should press for a consolidated NATO budget;

(4) that Canada should have competent senior representation on the NATO budget committees; the Departments of Finance and National Defence to examine the question of providing suitable representation; and

(5) that NATO military costs should be charged to the budget of the Department of National Defence and civilian costs to the Department of External Affairs.

FINANCING OF AIRFIELD INFRASTRUCTURE

Definition of "Infrastructure"

1. The deployment of military effort under the North Atlantic Treaty requires the provision of infrastructure (see Appendix A† for wider definition of "infrastructure") which comprises airfields, communication facilities, barracks, and all the other static installations "necessary to enable the Higher Commands to function and the various forces to operate with efficiency". Suitable national facilities are available only to a limited extent to meet these needs and consideration has been given to various methods of financing the provision of the necessary further infrastructure.

2. NATO military plans have not yet reached the stage where it is possible to make an accurate estimate of the total infrastructure required. However, it has been estimated that at least 120 combat and supporting airfields will be required to accommodate the 5,800 aircraft already nationally committed to SHAPE. (If the full Standing Group target of 9,212 frontline aircraft is reached, at least 177 airfields (this figure, which is based on 75 aircraft per field, would rise to 277 airfields if only 50 aircraft are based on each field) would be required.) Of the 120, perhaps 20 would be supporting type airfields.

3. Preliminary RCAF estimates suggest the cost of a combat airfield in Central Europe, including accommodation, radar and point-to-point communication, would be in the neighbourhood of $11.5 million (to Canadian standards) and the cost of a supporting airfield, i.e., advance landing ground, about $4.0 million. Taken together, these estimates suggest that an overall infrastructure burden of the order of $1.25 billion will ultimately be required to meet present national commitments for airfields alone (this figure rising to about $1.8 billion to meet the full Standing Group target of 177 airfields). These figures do not make provision for the air headquarters (64 would be required for the full target force), nor for the headquarters, communications or other facilities required for the ground forces.

4. To keep pace with the development of operational plans, provision of infrastructure to date has proceeded by "slices" (see Appendix B† for summary of the projects included in the first two infrastructure "slices"). The first "slice" involved provision of $100 million for priority projects to be completed mainly in 1951. The funds for this "slice" have been provided by Western Union countries. Although these countries have indicated that ultimately they expect these costs to be shared by other signatories, actual construction has not been impeded by any lack of funds. However, for the second "slice", covering $340 million of projects to be completed partly in 1951, but principally thereafter, the countries in which the installations are to be located (hereinafter called host countries) have indicated that they would find it difficult if not impossible to provide the necessary financing without outside help. In this "slice", airfields are considered of particular urgency.

5. General Eisenhower has stated that it is imperative that of the airfields proposed in the second "slice", fourteen for occupancy by forces already committed to Central Europe by the end of 1951 and an additional two advance landing grounds must be completed this year. Moreover, ten existing airfields must be extended in 1951 in order to accommodate F84 aircraft for use by United States and French forces. The cost of these sixteen new airfields and ten extensions makes up the amount of $56 million (£18.7 million) shown in Appendix C† as the urgent airfields item.

6. After considerable discussion in the Deputies, host governments have agreed to look after interim financing to the extent that it is needed over the next few weeks. Unless a suitable formula for common financing has been devised and put into execution by that time, further interim financing may be required.

Plans Proposed to Date

7. A number of methods have been suggested for financing infrastructure. However, in the Council Deputies and in a Special Committee set up by the Deputies to examine the problem discussion has mainly centred around proposals made by the United States and the United Kingdom.

(a) United States Proposal

8. The United States proposal, essentially one that requires payment by the user, is that costs should be shared as follows:

(i) The land and local utilities should be contributed free by the country in which the airfield is located.

(ii) The remaining construction costs and the costs of operational facilities meeting a common military standard to be defined by SHAPE should be covered by the countries which are contributing units to the Air Forces Central Europe and in proportion to the number of units so contributed.

(iii) The costs of troop accommodation and any operational or other facilities in excess of the minimum standard defined by SHAPE should be borne in respect of each airfield by the country to whose particular force the particular field is assigned for operational purposes.

The United States plan also envisages the host country paying much of the local labour costs involved. Exactly how this would be arranged has not been made clear.

(b) Original United Kingdom Proposal

9. Under the United Kingdom plan to cover all infrastructure the host countries would be expected to appropriate the necessary funds and proceed with construction subject to whatever method is adopted to share defence burdens. However, to the extent that host countries could not raise the necessary funds, these would be contributed by all NATO signatories on the basis of:

(i) The degree of common use of the installations.

(ii) The peacetime or residual value of the installations to the host country.

(iii) The capacity to pay of each member state using as a basis the criterion of adjusted national income.

10. In preliminary discussion of these proposals it became clear that the United States was unwilling to depart from the "user" principle. Among arguments used in support of their position they stated that United States service votes are available only for expenditures on United States forces (and could not, therefore be used under a "capacity to pay" arrangement). The United States has had some support from Italy and Portugal, and to a certain extent, from the Scandinavian countries. Opposing this view have been certain European countries who have expressed strong support for the United Kingdom or some other plan based on a "capacity to pay" formula. (For other proposals submitted during discussion see Appendix D.)†

11. In an attempt to secure agreement the United Kingdom, to deal only with the sixteen airfields and ten extensions, has now proposed a compromise plan, which in large measure, accepts the "user" principle.

(c) United Kingdom Compromise

12. The requirement for the sixteen new airfields mentioned in paragraph 5 (fourteen new airfields and two advance landing grounds) arose solely out of the additional contributions of aircraft offered subsequent to the outbreak of the Korean War by the United Kingdom, France, Belgium, the Netherlands and the United States. The fourteen new fields have in fact already been allotted to the above countries by the Western Region Planning Staff in rough proportion to these additional aircraft contributions based on the figure of 50 aircraft per airfield. The two advance landing grounds are expected to be used in common by the air forces of all countries operating under the C. in C. Allied Air Force Central Europe (AAFCE).

13. The compromise United Kingdom proposal is as follows:

(i) The total cost of constructing the fourteen airfields allocated to national forces including the cost of land should be distributed among the countries to which they have been allocated in proportion to the additional aircraft contributions which would produce the requirement.

(ii) The cost of the two advance landing grounds (including the cost of land) should be distributed in proportion to the adjusted national income (capacity to pay) of the seven countries contributing air forces to AAFCE.

(iii) The cost of the ten airfield extensions should be divided among those countries contributing F84 squadrons to fly from these airfields (the United States and France).

Assessment of Canada's Interests

14. At present Canada has agreed to provide to the integrated force 11 squadrons consisting of 203 aircraft commencing late in 1952 and to be completed by August 1953. To operate these 11 squadrons and provide the backing necessary for them to operate as an air division would require not less than four airfields for the squadrons and one for logistic purposes. This represents 3.4% of the front-line aircraft agreed to for the Air Forces, Central Europe. We would thus require 3.4% of the 120 airfields already noted. (See paragraph 3.)

15. The "user" proposal of the United States would require Canada to pay NIL towards the airfields under present discussion but ultimately the equivalent of the full cost, less land and local utilities, of 3.4% of the total number (120) to a minimum standard defined by SHAPE, plus any excess to meet our own standards. The "user" proposal of the United Kingdom would require Canada to pay nothing towards the 14 airfields and ten extensions under present discussion (since we will not be using them) and to share the cost of the two common-use fields (advance landing grounds) on the basis of capacity to pay. If adopted for future construction it would mean that Canada would pay the full cost of the number of fields she will ultimately require for her own use and to share the cost of any further common-use airfields on the basis of capacity to pay.

16. The straight capacity to pay proposal applied throughout would obligate Canada to share the cost of the 16 airfields under current discussion (see summary of costs paragraphs 19 and 20) as well as of all the rest of the fields making up the total of 120 or 170.

17. Both the United States and the United Kingdom compromise proposals if extended to cover all European airfields would seem to have certain advantages for us over the pure capacity to pay formula:

(a) It would not involve us in the financing of airfields in regions where we had no air units.

(b) For those regions where we might have only token forces (e.g. possibly the northern region) it would require a smaller financial contribution from us than would the capacity to pay formula applied only to the countries with forces in the particular region.

(c) It would give us on the whole a better knowledge of our own ultimate financial commitments.

(d) It would possibly give us greater administrative simplicity and better control over our own expenditures.

(e) Acceptance of the user proposal would be consistent with the principles followed in negotiations concerning United States installations in Canada.

(f) Application of the "user" formula to Army infrastructure on the basis of present planned contribution would probably be even more favourable to Canada.

18. There would appear to be two main disadvantages of the "user" formula:

(a) The greater the relative individual contribution to the integrated force, the higher the relative financial commitment for airfields.

(b) To some extent the user principle implies a weakening in the concept of common interest and contribution.

19. Summary of Costs to Canada of 16 Airfields and 10 Extensions under Current Discussion

(a) United States Plan

(i) Fourteen new airfields	— Nil
(ii) Ten extensions	— Nil
(iii) Two common-use fields	— Nil

(b) United Kingdom (Compromise) Plan

(i) Fourteen new airfields	— Nil
(ii) Ten extensions	— Nil
(iii) Two common-use fields	— $150,000

(c) Straight Capacity to Pay Plan

(i) Fourteen new airfields)
(ii) Ten extensions)	$2,310,000
(iii) Two common-use fields)

20. Estimate of Ultimate Cost Implications for Canada

Assuming (This assumption is purely arbitrary; no estimate has been received from SHAPE.)

(1) SHAPE minimum standard for a combat airfield	— $9.0 million
(2) SHAPE minimum standard for a common-use supporting airfield	— $4.0 million
(3) Canadian standard for a combat airfield	— 11.5 million

(a) United States Proposal
(i) 3.4% of 100 combat airfields at $9 m.	= $30.6 m.
(ii) 3.4% of 20 supporting airfields at $4 m.	= $ 2.72 m.
(iii) 4 airfields for exclusive Canadian use at $2.5 m. ($11.5 m. minus $9.0 m.)	= $10.0 m.
	$43.32 m.
(b) United Kingdom (Compromise) Proposal
(i) 3.4% of 100 combat airfields at $9 m.	= $30.6 m.
(ii) 3.9% of 20 supporting airfields at $4 m.	= $ 3.12 m.
(iii) 4 airfields for exclusive Canadian use at $2.5 m. ($11.5 m. minus $9.0 m.)	= $10.0 m.
	$43.72 m.
(c) Straight Capacity to Pay Plan
(i) 3.72% of 100 combat airfields at $9 m.	= $33.48 m.
(ii) 3.72% of 20 supporting airfields at $4 m.	= $ 2.98 m.
(iii) 4 airfields for exclusive Canadian use at $2.5 m. ($11.5 m. minus $9.0 m.)	= $10.0 m.
	$46.46 m.

Conclusions and Recommendations

21. It would appear that the advantages of the user principle outweigh the disadvantages and that Canada should therefore support it.

22. It would also appear more reasonable to favour the United Kingdom compromise than the United States plan because

(a) The former goes at least part of the way to meet European objections to the United States proposal without sacrificing the major advantages.

(b) By applying the capacity to pay formula to common-use airfields (i.e. advance landing grounds and rearward displacement fields) it preserves, even if only psychologically, the concept of common interest.

23. This would require, therefore, a current expenditure of about $150,000 representing our share (on the basis of capacity to pay) of the two common-use airfields divided among the seven countries contributing aircraft to the Central Region. If extended to future construction it would involve

(a) an undertaking that Canada would meet the full cost of airfields for exclusive Canadian use;

(b) acceptance of the capacity to pay formula applied to any further common-use airfields in regions where we are contributing air forces.

24. The inclusion of the cost of land under the United Kingdom compromise proposal appears unwarranted. While Canada might agree that the residual value of the airfields could be ignored, it seems unreasonable for the host countries which derive the most direct security benefits from the presence of the integrated force to make an actual charge for land which will ultimately revert to them, together with the installations.

Our telegram No. 985 of June 12† — Financing of Priority Second Slice Airfield Infrastructure.

1. Cabinet Defence Committee met this morning to consider Cabinet Document No. D-287 being a memorandum to the Committee from the main Panel. This document is going forward to you in triplicate by today's air bag.

2. The attitude of the Committee was strongly favourable to the "user" principle generally. This principle was considered to be the more practical approach to the problem and in the view of the Committee would be politically more acceptable in Canada.

3. The Committee felt that the sort of gesture to the principle of common use which is implied by the United Kingdom compromise proposal was a desirable one; hence a preference was expressed for this over the straight user proposals put forward by the United States.

4. The Committee concluded that under ordinary circumstances and up to basic minimum standards a charge by host countries for the cost of land was unwarranted and it is felt that you should oppose this charge in the Deputies and elsewhere. However, the Committee recognized that there might be exceptional instances of airfields being constructed in areas of high economic value and in these cases, after close examination, we might be willing to retreat somewhat from the principle.

5. In reaching the above decisions it was made clear that you are not rigidly bound by them but that they are intended purely to give you general guidance and a point from which you may negotiate flexibly. Should it appear later on to be desirable for Canada to take a position further towards the United States plan or in moderate degree towards the capacity to pay principle, we expect on the basis of this morning's decisions to be able to give you suitable and prompt guidance.

SECOND SLICE INFRASTRUCTURE

The NATO Council Deputies have been engaged for a very considerable time in endeavouring to agree upon a formula to recommend for the sharing of infrastructure costs. It has not been possible to find a satisfactory formula and the need for proceeding with various construction and installations is urgent.

In default of any formula or principles, negotiations were undertaken during the recent NATO Council meetings at Ottawa with a view to sharing the cost of the second slice, representing airfields and telecommunications amounting to 79 million pounds, plus the cost of land. The Council Deputies, at Ottawa, agreed to recommend the following distribution of costs for the second slice on the understanding proposed by the Canadian Deputy that this sharing was without prejudice to any future divisions of cost of infrastructure.

United States	£ 38,000,000
France	£ 17,000,000
United Kingdom	£ 14,000,000
Canada	£ 3,500,000
Netherlands	£ 2,300,000
Belgium and Luxembourg	£ 4,200,000
	£79,000,000

It is recommended that Canada should contribute £3,500,000 towards the cost of the second slice of infrastructure, amounting to 79 million pounds, plus land.[37]

Rapport pour le Cabinet

Report to Cabinet

CABINET DOCUMENT NO. 83-51 [Ottawa], March 19, 1951

DRAFT AGREEMENT ON STATUS OF NATO FORCES

As a result of Cabinet's decision of March 1, 1951, an Ad Hoc Committee representing the Departments of Justice, National Defence, External Affairs, Citizenship and Immigration, National Revenue and Finance and the Foreign Exchange Control Board, has met to consider a draft Agreement between the parties to the North Atlantic Treaty regarding the status of an armed force from one NATO power when that force is present within the territory of another NATO power. A summary of the Committee's recommendations appears in para. 13 of this report.

2. This draft Agreement, a copy of which is attached to this report as Annex A,† has been submitted to governments by the North Atlantic Council Deputies with a request that governments inform the Council Deputies by March 31, 1951, whether governments can, in general, accept the Agreement or wish to submit amendments to it. Following receipt of suggested changes, the draft will be revised in London and will probably be presented to governments for signature in May or June of this year.

3. The draft Agreement was drawn up to apply both in peace and in war, although its terms contemplate revision in the event of a major conflict.

4. The Committee is of the opinion that the draft Agreement deals satisfactorily with the following topics:

(1) Requirements for entry to and departure from a receiving state;

(2) Validity of vehicle driving permits of members of a force in the receiving state;

(3) Wearing of military uniforms;

(4) Carriage of arms;

(5) Provision by the receiving state of goods and services;

(6) Applicability of foreign exchange control regulations.

5. The Ad Hoc Committee is of the opinion that the following topics that are dealt with in the draft Agreement require careful consideration and in some cases amendment as set out hereunder:

(1) The jurisdiction of service courts in the receiving state (paragraph 6 of this report);

(2) The settlement of claims for damages arising out of the activities in the receiving state of forces of sending states (paragraph 7 of this report);

(3) Free entry privileges for goods and commodities (paragraph 8 of this report);

(4) Exemption from income and inheritance tax (paragraph 9 of this report);

(5) Final articles on signature and ratification of the Agreement (paragraph 10 of this report).

6. Jurisdiction of Service Courts

(a) Under Article VII of the draft Agreement, members of a force from a NAT country in Canada will be subject to Canadian criminal law and courts with certain exceptions. The only objectionable exception appears to be that the foreign courts-martial will virtually have exclusive jurisdiction over any member of their own force in respect of acts "done in the performance of official duty".

(b) (i) The main consideration against this exception is: it is a major departure from the principle that Canadian civil courts have jurisdiction over all offences in Canada. The only previous departure agreed to by the Canadian Government was in the case of United States service courts during the Second World War which had exclusive jurisdiction over United States forces in Canada.

(ii) The main considerations in favour of the exception are: The exception is in line with the generally understood principle of international law relating to visiting forces, held not only by the United States but also by most of the continental European countries. It is based on recognition of the principle that a visiting force should have full power to maintain internal discipline. The original draft proposed to the NATO Deputies by the United States went very much farther. Negotiations in London resulted in reduction to the present exception. Canada House states of Annex A: "Any amendments suggested which are likely to upset the whole balance of concessions may defeat their own purpose". It should be kept in mind that we are concerned not only with allied forces in Canada, but also with the needs of Canadians in the integrated force in Europe.

(c) Recommendation

The Committee recommends that Article VII be accepted by Canada in view of the reciprocal advantages which Canadian forces will obtain abroad, but that the North Atlantic Council Deputies be told that the Government of Canada desires to suggest amendments to the Article as set forth below:

(i) Article VII, paragraph 3(a)(ii) should be amended to read:

"(ii) any act or omission done or omitted pursuant to an order issued by a military superior of that state and carried out according to the tenor thereof".

The effect of this amendment would be to give the primary right to exercise jurisdiction to the courts of the receiving state over any member of a force or civilian component who carried out his superior's order in an unlawful manner which results in injury or damage. Certain consequential amendments to other articles would be suggested at the same time.

(ii) The penalties imposed for some crimes in European countries are higher than those normally imposed in Canada. In order to protect Canadian servicemen against injustice, an amendment should be proposed in the following terms:

"In any case where a court of the receiving state exercises jurisdiction over a member of a force or a civilian component of a sending state, the court shall when passing sentence, take into account the penalty which would normally be imposed under the law of the sending state for a similar offence".

7. Settlement of Claims for Damage Arising out of the Activities of a Force from a Sending State

(a) The draft Agreement provides in Article VIII in effect that:

(i) The Contracting Parties to the Agreement waive all claims against each other in respect of damage to property owned by them and used by their service ministries, and in respect of injury to or death of service personnel;

(ii) Claims against a sending state in respect of acts done by members of a force or civilian component in the performance of their official duties will be dealt with by the receiving state in the same manner as that employed by the receiving state in respect to claims arising from the activities of its own armed forces; but no judgment will be enforceable against the individual member of the force concerned. The amount of the settlement or judgment will in the normal case be borne as to 75% by the sending state and as to 25% by the receiving state;

(iii) As regards tortious acts or omission not relating to the performance of official duties, the authorities of the sending state will normally stand behind the members of their own force or civilian component and arrange settlement of the claim on an ex gratia basis through the authorities of the receiving state, but the normal jurisdiction of the courts of the receiving state is not displaced;

(iv) Contractual and other claims not specifically dealt with above will be dealt with in the customary manner according to the laws of the receiving state.

(b) The provisions of the draft Agreement appear to provide a reasonable method of dealing with claims. On two points, however, the Committee is of the opinion that legislation in Canada will be necessary before the obligations under the Agreement can be fulfilled.

(i) In any dispute as to whether an act was done in the performance of official duty the draft Agreement provides that an arbitrator shall be appointed by the receiving state who shall determine the question and his determination shall be final and conclusive.

(ii) Where the Agreement provides that the receiving state shall settle or adjudicate claims against a sending state in respect of tortious acts done in the performance of official duties, it is provided that no proceedings for the enforcement of any judgment given against a member of a force or a civilian component shall be entertained in the courts of the receiving state. In effect, this means that a claimant in the receiving state is limited to a single means of relief: he must secure his indemnity from the sending state and not from the individual tortfeasor. Under existing Canadian law the injured party always has recourse against the individual where the claim against the Crown is unsuccessful.

(c) Recommendation

The Committee recommends that Article VIII of the draft Agreement dealing with claims for damages arising out of the presence of foreign forces in the receiving state be accepted on behalf of the Canadian Government.

8. Customs and Excise Privileges

(a) The draft Agreement provides in Articles XI, XII, and XIII for certain types of duty-free entry. The general rule laid down is that members of a force and of a civilian component as well as their dependents shall remain bound by the customs and excise laws of the receiving state. In respect of personal importation by members of a force or a civilian component, provision is made for free entry of (i) private motor vehicles imported temporarily for personal use, and (ii) personal effects and furniture imported at the time of first arrival. On the other hand, the "authorities of a force" are entitled to the free importation of the equipment of the force and of "reasonable quantities of provisions, supplies and other goods for the exclusive use of that force". In addition, where permitted, Articles so imported may be used by the members of a civilian component and by dependents of members of a force and of a civilian component.

(b) The Committee foresees two problems arising out of the arrangement:

(i) Where a "force" consists of a small number of foreign service personnel on detachment in Canada or on course at Canadian schools of instruction, it might produce administrative confusion and possibly abuse of privilege unless the scattered individuals were organized as a unit for the purposes of free-entry privileges. The Committee believes that an attempt should be made to specify more clearly in the draft Agreement the designation of the "authorities of a force" so that a single organization or individual will be responsible for certifying that the importer is entitled to free-entry privileges under and according to the Agreement.

(ii) Any scheme of free-entry privileges is likely to result in some of the duty-free commodities finding their way to the black markets of the receiving state. In certain continental European countries during and since the Second World War, this problem arose particularly in the case of cigarettes. A similar situation might well arise out of the draft Agreement under consideration if it were generally adopted by continental European countries. A partial answer to the problem might lie in the general adoption of a scheme whereby sending states would impose normal domestic duties and taxes on commodities shipped to their forces in receiving states, there to be granted entry free of the customs duties of the receiving state. This would tend to reduce the price differential between service-imported and local commodities which renders the black-market sale of the former so attractive, and broadens the distinction existing between civilian and military populations. The Committee believes however, that there are certain difficulties not met by such a scheme. Substantial differences might still exist in the price of the commodities to the members of different forces. Furthermore, the effect of an increase in price due to the imposition of normal excise taxes might be to lower the morale of the members of the forces concerned. It is essential for the morale of the Canadian forces that, if such an arrangement is made, it apply to the forces of all NAT countries concerned.

(c) The draft Agreement also provides that members of a force or civilian component may at the time of first arrival in the receiving state import free of duty, for the term of their service, personal effects and furniture. The Committee, while not disposed to find any objection to this arrangement, agreed that the free-entry privilege might be more properly granted at the time of arrival of the dependents of the members of the force or civilian component.

(d) Recommendation

The Committee recommends that Articles XI, XII and XIII of the draft Agreement be accepted on behalf of the Government of Canada, but that the Canadian Deputy in London be authorized to request the North Atlantic Council Deputies:

(1) to provide for an exact definition of the term "authorities of a force" in Article XI;

(2) to consider a scheme to alleviate the demoralizing effects of black-market sale of duty-free commodities in receiving states by the imposition of normal domestic duties and taxes by sending states on shipments to forces in receiving states; and

(3) to amend Article XI by allowing personal effects and furniture to be imported free into receiving states upon the occasion of the first arrival of dependents as well as on the occasion of the first arrival of members of a force or of a civilian component.

9. Exemptions from Taxation

(a) Article X of the draft agreement provides both a specific and a general exemption from taxation in the receiving State for a member of a force or civilian component, who is in the receiving State solely as a consequence of his membership in the force. The specific exemption is for the salary and emoluments paid to him as a member by the sending State. The general exemption provides that the member shall not be considered to be resident or domiciled in the receiving State for tax purposes. This exemption applies to the taxation of income, gifts and successions. An exception to the general exemption is that a member is not free from tax "with respect to any profitable enterprise (other than his employment as a member) in which he may engage in the receiving State." Article X also exempts a member from taxation by the receiving State of any tangible movable property the presence of which in the receiving State is due solely to his temporary presence there.

The Committee agreed that these provisions were acceptable but that there did not appear to be any sufficient reason for excluding dependents from the benefits of the Article.

(b) Recommendation

The Committee recommends that Article X be accepted on behalf of the Canadian Government but that the Canadian Deputy be authorized to request the North Atlantic Council Deputies to consider extending the exemptions of Article X to the dependents of members of a force or of a civilian component.

10. Final Articles Providing for Signature and Ratification of the Draft Agreement

(a) The draft Agreement provides that the agreement shall be both signed and ratified by the contracting parties. No mention is made of reservations to the agreement. The Committee is of the opinion that delay and confusion might arise if signatory states were to make reservations to the application of the agreement at the time they ratified.

(b) Recommendation

The Committee recommends that Articles XIV to XIX inclusive, should be accepted on behalf of the Canadian Government, but that the Canadian Deputy in London be authorized to request the North Atlantic Council deputies to amend the agreement by including an Article in the following form:

"The contracting parties agree that any reservations to this agreement shall be made not later than the date of signature".

11. Legislation to Implement Agreement

(a) The Committee is of the opinion that the draft agreement would require legislation in order to authorize the execution of its terms in Canada as necessary. The legislation might conceivably take one of two forms:

(i) a general act authorizing the execution of the provisions of the agreement under regulations to be made by the Governor-in-Council;

(ii) a detailed act setting forth specifically the provisions of law necessary for fulfilment of the agreement in Canada.

In view of the existence in the draft agreement of provisions having a profound effect upon the administration of criminal law in Canada, the Committee is of the opinion that the second course is more appropriate.

(b) On the question of the power of Parliament to pass the legislation mentioned above, the Deputy Minister of Justice has provided the following opinion:

"I am further of opinion, subject to the comments made hereafter, that it is within the competence of Parliament to enact legislation to give effect to the terms of the proposed Agreement in Canada. Such legislation would be either

(a) a law dealing with 'defence' and falling, therefore, under s. 91(7) of the British North America Act, or

(b) a law dealing with Canada's relations with other countries and, therefore, a law not coming within the classes assigned to the provincial legislatures.

"Certain provisions in the proposed Agreement — Articles IV, VII, VIII, IX, X and XI — affect matters in relation to which the provincial legislatures ordinarily have legislative jurisdiction. It must, therefore, be recognized that the decision of the Privy Council in The Labour Convention case, (1937) A.C. 326, raises a doubt as to whether Parliament can carry out the obligations these Articles would impose on Canada. My view is, however, that the reasoning in that case has no application at least in a case such as this where the subject matter of the Treaty is defence."

(c) On the question of co-operation with provincial authorities the Deputy Minister of Justice said:

> "I should also mention that, insofar as the proposed Agreement provides for administrative co-operation in Canada — e.g., Article VII — the Government of Canada has, of course, no administrative control over provincial or municipal authorities. It should, therefore, be borne in mind that, if the proposed Agreement is to be construed as contemplating co-operation by provincial or municipal authorities, this will probably have to be achieved, as a practical matter, by arrangement with the provincial governments."

The Committee is of the opinion that any consultation with the provincial authorities should take place after the Agreement is signed.

GENERAL REMARKS AND RECOMMENDATIONS

12. The draft Agreement is the product of the work of representatives of twelve countries with differing legal systems. It is necessarily a compromise document, and no one country can hope to mould the agreement completely according to its own desires. The conclusion of such an agreement is essential for the protection of the Canadian members of the NATO integrated force in Europe. Suggestions for changes in the agreement must, in order to be considered in London, be submitted before March 31.

13. The Committee Recommends:

(1) that the NATO Deputies be informed that the Canadian Government is favourable to the draft agreement as a whole;

(2) that the Canadian Deputy be instructed to try to obtain the amendments suggested in this report;

(3) that the revised draft Agreement be resubmitted to Cabinet prior to signature.

Respectfully submitted,

AGREEMENT REGARDING STATUS OF VISITING NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY FORCES

34. The Minister of National Defence, referring to discussion at the meeting on March 1st, 1951, said that an ad hoc interdepartmental committee had now made a report on the draft submitted by the North Atlantic Council Deputies on an agreement between North Atlantic Treaty governments regarding the status of armed forces and associated civilians of one NATO country in the territory of another. The Deputies had requested an indication by March 31st as to whether, in general, the text was acceptable, together with any necessary comments.

The committee had suggested that the draft was generally satisfactory. It was considered, however, that certain Articles required careful consideration by Cabinet and certain amendments were proposed. The Articles in question were those relating to the jurisdiction of visiting service courts in host states; the settlement of claims for damages by visiting forces; customs and excise privileges; taxation privileges; and signature and ratification.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated.

(Ad hoc Committee report, March 19, 1951 — Cab. Doc. 83-51)

35. Mr. Claxton pointed out that, as the agreement would not come into effect for several months, it was not expected that enabling legislation would have to be introduced during the current session of Parliament.

Cabinet Defence Committee, which had considered the matter on March 20th, was of the opinion that current arrangements relating to the status of United States forces in Canada, including the proposed agreement regarding U.S. forces in Newfoundland, should be retained when the NATO agreement went into effect.

36. The Prime Minister thought that, in view of the importance of Canadian courts-martial in Europe having adequate rights of jurisdiction, it would be desirable to accept Article VII of the agreement, subject to the amendments proposed by the ad hoc committee.

As regards Article XI, since, during the war, Canadian forces in Europe had received cigarettes without payment of Canadian excise taxes, it appeared preferable not to adopt the suggestion of the ad hoc committee that, in order to alleviate the black market problem, states impose their domestic duties and taxes on commodities shipped to their forces in host countries. So that there might be no risk of criticism from the provinces, they should be consulted prior to signature of the agreement regarding the provision under which service vehicles would be exempt from any tax payable in respect of the use of vehicles on the roads. This could be done with an indication that the federal government, nevertheless, reserved its position on matters of defence.

37. The Cabinet, after further discussion, noted the report of the Minister of National Defence regarding the recommendations of the ad hoc interdepartmental committee which had studied the draft agreement concerning the status of visiting armed forces and associated civilians of North Atlantic Treaty countries and agreed that:

(a) the present text of the draft agreement was acceptable, subject to the amendments proposed by the ad hoc committee, except that relating to the imposition by states of domestic duties and taxes on shipments to their forces in host countries; the North Atlantic Council Deputies to be informed accordingly;

(b) prior to signature of the agreement, the provinces should be consulted regarding the provision, in the agreement, exempting service vehicles from taxes payable in respect of the use of vehicles on the roads; and,

(c) as proposed by Cabinet Defence Committee, signature of the agreement should be without prejudice to current arrangements relating to the status of United States forces in Canada, including the proposed agreement regarding such forces in Newfoundland.

LEGAL

Status of NATO Armed Forces

32. Mr. Burbridge. The Working Group of the Council Deputies in London has commenced redrafting the Agreement on the status of NATO Forces as a result of comments on the original draft by various governments. These comments indicate that no government is disposed to suggest radical changes in the outline of the Agreement, but because of the more or less novel ideas in the Agreement it is expected that the relatively minor amendments proposed by governments will require careful consideration. No indication has yet been received of when the redrafting by the Working Group will be completed. (CONFIDENTIAL)

LEGAL

(cf. Heads of Division Meeting, No. 16, of April 23, 1951).

29. Mr. Burbridge. The Working Group in London last week concluded its redrafting of the proposed agreement on the status of the NATO Armed Forces. It is understood that the Group's final report was to be sent to the Council Deputies last week with the suggestion that the Deputies defer consideration of the Report for two or three weeks to allow Governments time to forward instructions. The general outline of the Agreement remains the same but a number of minor changes were made. These were:

(a) application of agreement to all political sub-divisions of contracting parties;

(b) a clearer definition of "responsibility" of a state in connection with third party claims;

(c) specific extension of claims provisions to claims arising out of the unauthorized use of service vehicles;

(d) the elimination of contractual claims from the scope of the agreement; and

(e) the insertion of a colonial clause in the agreement.

30. The Canadian amendments (cf. Heads of Division Meeting of April 9, 1951, para. 16)† were only accepted in part. The principal amendment relating to the jurisdiction of service courts was not accepted but certain examples of limitation were recorded in the minutes of the Drafting Committee which, it is hoped, will render the application of the jurisdictional provisions acceptable to Canada. The Canadian suggestion for the extension of taxation exemptions to dependents was rejected but the proposal to allow free importation of personal effects and furniture at the time of first entry of dependents proved generally acceptable. The Canadian suggestion for more explicit machinery to deal with free entry privileges for goods and commodities met with partial success but the proposal for limiting reservations to the agreement was rejected. The principal Canadian difficulty in approaching this agreement is to reconcile it with the existing bilateral arrangements with the United States. A new clause in the agreement provides that any two contracting parties may agree that certain units or formations shall not be regarded as constituting or included in a "force" for the purpose of the present agreement. Memorandum from Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to Secretary of State for External Affairs

CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa], May 19, 1951

NATO FORCES AGREEMENT — APPLICATION TO UNITED STATES FORCES IN CANADA

1. You will recall that when Cabinet considered recommendations on the draft agreement on the status of NATO Forces, it was decided that signature of the agreement should be without prejudice to current arrangements relating to the Status of United States Forces in Canada. The Ad Hoc Interdepartmental Committee which reported to Cabinet on the agreement did not include in their report any discussion on the possibility that United States Forces would be treated differently from any other NATO Forces in Canada. In view of this fact, the following comments might be appropriate.

2. The Cabinet decision could be given effect in one of two ways:

(a) by concluding a simple bi-lateral agreement with the United States which would except the United States Forces in Canada from the application of the agreement; or

(b) by making reservation to the same effect when Canada signs the NATO Agreement.

In either case it would be desirable to consult with the U.S. Government in advance. The most likely result of course would be that the United States Government would stipulate that the NATO Agreement should not apply to Canadian Forces in the United States.

3. In view of this probable reaction it might be desirable before approaching the United States Government to consider some of the arguments for and against such a partial application of the NATO Forces Agreement.

4. In the first place, as suggested above, one serious result would be that Canada would probably forego the opportunity to have a treaty basis for the privileges and rights which may be necessary for Canadian Forces in the United States.

5. Another point of importance is that potential United States rights and privileges under the NATO Agreement would not be greater as a whole than those which the United States Forces now exercise in Canada under the Leased Bases Agreement on the Island of Newfoundland.[38] In fact with respect to income tax, postal facilities, and duty free imports, the NATO Forces Agreement is less generous than the Leased Bases Agreement. On the question of jurisdiction, it is true the NATO Forces Agreement grants to United States service courts a primary right to exercise jurisdiction in respect of certain acts which are offences under both the laws of Canada and United States Military Law. While a similar right under the Leased Bases Agreement (as modified by the PJBD recommendation of March, 1950) has been suspended for a period of five years, it should be noted that this right could be revived after that period on 6 month's notice or at any time on notice in the event of war or an emergency. It should also be kept in mind that the Canadian Government is under an obligation to give satisfactory assurances that United States officials in Newfoundland will have a degree of jurisdiction comparable to that which they now in fact exercise. This means in fact that the United States is to have a primary right to exercise jurisdiction over United States Forces in Canada in respect of any offences under the laws of Canada which, under the NATO Agreement would similarly give rise to a primary right of jurisdiction in the appropriate United States military authorities.

6. Finally from the point of view of the administration of Canadian laws it would be most desirable that members of all foreign visiting forces should be subject to a single Visiting Forces Act which would make no distinction between one NATO country and another. It has been assumed that if the NATO Agreement were to come into force a general act dealing with all aspects of the agreement would have to be passed. If the existing position of the United States Forces in Canada were to be preserved, there would be inevitable doubt and conflict in the administration of that general act and existing statutory and executive powers.

7. It is believed these comments are justified because the Ad Hoc Committee did not place any similar considerations before Cabinet at the time Cabinet first considered the NATO Agreement. It may be that you would wish to consider whether Cabinet should look at the matter afresh with these points in mind. If so a convenient opportunity will be presented some time in the week ending May 26, as the Ad Hoc Committee will then be reporting to the Cabinet on the Agreement as redrafted in London by the Council Deputies' Working Group.

8. On the other hand if you believe that Cabinet will not wish to reopen the matter I should be grateful if you would authorize me to initiate consultations with the United States Government in order to secure an agreed basis for the method by which United States Forces will be excepted from application of the NATO Forces Agreement in Canada.

9. In view of the character of the NATO Forces Agreement I think it might be desirable to inform the United States Government that Canada would prefer the conclusion of a bi-lateral agreement rather than the making of a reservation at the time of signature of the Agreement. I should appreciate your guidance on this point as well.

10. A similar memorandum is being sent to the Minister of National Defence by the Judge Advocate General. You may wish to discuss this matter with Mr. Claxton.

NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY ORGANIZATION; AGREEMENT ON STATUS OF VISITING N.A.T.O. FORCES

1. The Secretary of State for External Affairs, referring to discussion at the meeting of March 21st, 1951, said that the draft agreement on the status of N.A.T.O. forces had been revised by the Council Deputies and resubmitted to member governments for consideration and approval. Governments were requested to inform the Council Deputies by May 23rd, 1951, whether the revised agreement was acceptable for signature on or about June 1st, 1951, or whether it was intended to make reservations as to its application. If it became apparent that there would be serious intergovernmental disagreement in the form of intended reservations, the agreement would be renegotiated by the Working Group of the Council Deputies. The United States had indicated that it would be most desirable to have the agreement concluded as soon as possible so that it would apply to U.S. forces in the European Integrated Force.

An explanatory note was circulated.

(Memorandum, May 19, 1951, Ad Hoc Interdepartmental Committee on draft agreement on status of NATO forces, Cab. Doc. 148-51)†

2. Mr. Pearson pointed out that, although the revised agreement did not entirely meet Canadian views on this matter, it constituted a workable arrangement which would be most advantageous in so far as Canadian members of the European Integrated Force were concerned. There was some doubt, however, as to whether Canada should agree to the application of the agreement to U.S. forces in Canada. In any event, it seemed clear that the agreement could not automatically be extended in so far as United States bases in Newfoundland were concerned in view of the special contractual agreement with the United States in this matter.

3. The Cabinet, after further discussion:

(a) approved in general principle the revised draft agreement on the status of NATO forces, subject to concurrence by the Minister of National Defence and the Minister of Justice;[39] and,

(b) deferred decision as to whether the agreement should be made applicable to United States forces in Canada.

NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY ORGANIZATION; AGREEMENT ON STATUS OF VISITING N.A.T.O. FORCES

1. The Secretary of State for External Affairs recalled that, when the draft agreement on the status of visiting North Atlantic Treaty forces had been considered at the meeting of May 21st, 1951, decision had been deferred as to whether the agreement should be made applicable to U.S. forces in Canada. There was much to be said in favour of this extension as it would mean that arrangements affecting visiting forces would be common to all NATO countries, rather than bilateral as at present, and therefore more acceptable to the Canadian public. As regards the jurisdiction of service courts, there were not great differences between the proposed NATO agreement and current arrangements with the United States.

2. The Minister of National Defence agreed that differences were not serious and suggested that enquiries be made as to whether U.S. authorities wished the NATO agreement or the present arrangements to apply to their forces in Canada.

3. Mr. Pearson thought it would be desirable to enquire whether U.S. authorities would be agreeable to the N.A.T.O. agreement being made applicable to all U.S. forces in Canada, including those coming under the 1941 Newfoundland leased bases agreement and the new agreement regarding Goose Bay. Arrangements that were satisfactory for U.S. troops in Europe should be adequate for U.S. forces in Canada and there would be advantages in uniformity of practice. Moreover, under the N.A.T.O. agreement the United States would improve its position except in the province of Newfoundland.

4. The Cabinet, after further discussion, noted the comments of the Secretary of State for External Affairs regarding the draft agreement on the status of visiting North Atlantic Treaty forces and agreed that:

(a) an attempt be made to induce the U.S. authorities to accept the application of the draft N.A.T.O. agreement to their forces in any part of Canada at any time during the life of the agreement; it being understood that parallel provisions of the 1941 Newfoundland leased bases agreement and the 20-year Goose Bay lease agreement would again become operative if the N.A.T.O. agreement ceased to be in effect before they expired;

(b) in the meantime, the Council Deputies could be informed that Canada did not intend to make any reservations to the application of the present draft of the N.A.T.O. agreement if the U.S. government accepted it as applicable to U.S. forces anywhere in Canada.

RE NATO FORCES AGREEMENT

You will recall that Cabinet on May 24 agreed that:

"(a) an attempt be made to induce the U.S. authorities to accept the application of the draft N.A.T.O. agreement to their forces in any part of Canada at any time during the life of the agreement; it being understood that parallel provisions of the 1941 Newfoundland leased bases agreement and the 20-year Goose Bay lease agreement would again become operative if the N.A.T.O. agreement ceased to be in effect before they expired;

"(b) in the meantime, the Council Deputies could be informed that Canada did not intend to make any reservations to the application of the present draft of the N.A.T.O. agreement if the U.S. government accepted it as applicable to U.S. forces anywhere in Canada."

2. Mr. Wilgress has spoken to the Deputies in the sense of (b). The Agreement is to be signed and made public in London on Tuesday, June 19.

3. Our Embassy in Washington approached the State Department pursuant to (a).[41] No definite reply has yet been received from the State Department but, from the tenor of the remarks made so far by the State Department, we expect that the following will happen soon:

The State Department will say that the U.S. Government is willing to accept the Canadian proposal on condition that the PX's in Newfoundland be allowed to retain all their privileges under the Leased Bases Agreement (as recently modified). There may be one or two other unimportant conditions relating to existing customs privileges.

4. If that condition is stipulated, its significance is as follows:

Under Leased Bases Agreement (as modified) -

PX's may import free of duty and buy locally free of taxes for sale to members of the forces and civilian component and dependents.

Under NATO Forces Agreement -

PX's (which are not expressly mentioned) may import free of duty for sale to members of forces.

5. As Cabinet would like to have the NATO Forces Agreement apply to all U.S. forces in Canada, it would be justifiable for Cabinet to agree to the expected U.S. condition. There would be no technical difficulty in the way of accepting the condition on PX's — all that is required is to say that the existing privileges for PX's and clubs under the Leased Bases Agreement, as modified, will not be suspended.

6. If Cabinet is willing to decide now (before the U.S. answer has been received) in the sense of para. 5, it would be in order for Cabinet today to decide that Mr. Wilgress shall sign the NATO Agreement on June 19 without a reservation. The negotiations with the U.S. need not be completed before June 19.

7. If Cabinet is not in favour of authorizing Mr. Wilgress to sign without a reservation, I suggest that you make a choice today between the following courses:

(a) We will not sign on June 19 and will explain that we will sign as soon as current Canada-U.S. discussions are concluded,

or

(b) We will sign on June 19 but expressly reserve the right to attach, on ratification, a reservation regarding U.S. forces in Canada.

8. As between 7(a) and 7(b), I recommend 7(b). However, my first recommendation is that Cabinet authorize Mr. Wilgress to sign without a reservation (Cabinet having first agreed to the idea of para. 5 above).[42]

CONFIDENTIAL. MOST IMMEDIATE.

From Heeney, Your WA-2548† and my EX-1279,† June 18, NATO Forces Agreement.

This will confirm Wershof's telephone message to Matthews this morning. In view of the State Department's strong plea (which Wrong conveyed to me by telephone this morning) that the word "reservation" should not be mentioned in London tomorrow, we have telegraphed Wilgress instructing him not (not) to make any statement reserving the right to make a later reservation.

2. I understand that you will speak to the State Department today (and give them a confirming Minute or memorandum) to the following effect. The Canadian Government hopes that the discussions with the United States regarding the applicability of the NATO Agreement to the Leased Bases may soon be concluded, and that the United States may decide to accept the proposal made in our letter D-2134 of May 31.[43] In the light of the views so far expressed by the State Department, we have decided to sign the Agreement in London without a reservation and without making any supplementary statement about the possibility of a reservation. However, we take it that it is clearly understood by the State Department that we do in fact reserve the right to make a reservation later on if our current discussions with the United States should not produce a satisfactory arrangement.

3. Please report fully on your conversation with the State Department today. I trust that you have reminded them that it is not too late for the United States Government to reach a decision today to accept our proposal. Such a decision would simplify matters all around.

4. In my immediately following telegram† I am giving the text of the statement on this point which the Prime Minister will probably make tomorrow if he should be asked in the House about the relation between the NATO Forces Agreement and the Leased Bases Agreement.

NATO FORCES AGREEMENT

Following is text of the State Department memorandum of July 6th, Begins: Memorandum

In its memorandum of June 5th, 1951,† the Canadian Government suggested that the provisions of the NATO status of forces agreement be made applicable to all United States forces in Canada, including those at the leased bases and at Goose Bay.

In common with the Government of Canada, the United States Government would wish the forces agreement to apply throughout Canada and on the bases. As the Canadian Government is undoubtedly aware, however, the United States Government attaches great importance to maintenance of the present arrangements concerning the operation for the use of the United States armed forces of post exchanges and other similar services which are now in effect on the leased bases. The Canadian Government will likewise recall that full agreement between the two governments regarding the operations of such services was reached only a few months ago as the result of detailed discussions in the Permanent Joint Board on Defense.

The Leased Bases Agreement of March 27th, 1941, as modified by the recommendations of the Permanent Joint Board on Defense referred to above, is also satisfactory to this government with respect to the arrangements concerning tax and customs exemptions and exemptions from inspections. The United States Government would not therefore, wish to alter these arrangements.

Subject to the concurrence of the Canadian Government in the foregoing, the United States Government would be prepared to agree that provisions of the leased bases agreement which are inconsistent with the provisions of the NATO forces agreement shall be in abeyance until the NATO forces agreement is terminated through expiration or denunciation. This government understands, as does the Government of Canada, that provisions of the leased bases agreement outside the scope of the NATO forces agreement are unaffected.

The United States Government concurs with the view of the Canadian Government that uniform treatment of United States forces throughout Canada would be in the interests of both countries and would make for simplification of administration. Ends.

NATO FORCES AGREEMENT

Our memorandum of June 5 to the State Department on this subject is identical with the draft memorandum contained in your despatch D-2134 of May 31.

2. With reference to the United States memorandum contained in my WA-2748 of July 6 you will have noted the difference in the language between the penultimate paragraph of the United States note and the penultimate paragraph of our note of June 5. The United States Government agrees to suspend those provisions of the Leased Bases Agreement which are inconsistent with the provisions of the NATO Forces Agreement. Our proposal was that the parallel provisions of the Leased Bases Agreement should be suspended when the NATO Forces Agreement comes into effect. In effect, therefore, the United States memorandum suggests that the provisions of the Leased Bases Agreement (for example, relating to jurisdiction) shall be suspended only where such provisions are determined to be inconsistent with the provisions of the NATO Forces Agreement. The United States memorandum apparently suggests that where additional privileges are granted under bilateral arrangements, these privileges should remain in effect even after the acceptance of the multilateral, provided they are not inconsistent with the latter.

3. The United States memorandum, we understand, represents a compromise between the USAF and the U.S.N., the former supporting a widest application of the NATO agreement and the latter desiring no change in their status quo at the leased bases (with the exception of the recent changes approved by the PJBD.)

TELEGRAM EX-1508 Ottawa, July 27, 1951

CONFIDENTIAL

Your WA-2924, July 24, Application of NATO Forces Agreement to Leased Bases.

1. We are astonished by the interpretation, given in paragraph 2 of your telegram, of the State Department's memorandum of July 6, and desire in this telegram to explain how matters look to us on the official level.

2. We originally proposed to the State Department on June 5, on instructions from Cabinet, that the NATO Forces Agreement should apply at the Leased Bases and that, in effect, parallel provisions in the Leased Bases Agreement should be put into cold storage so long as the NATO Forces Agreement remained in force between the two countries. Other provisions of the Leased Bases Agreement (i.e., those dealing with subjects not covered in the NATO Agreement) would be unaffected. The principal subjects on which there are parallel provisions in the two agreements are jurisdiction, security and taxation. There are, of course, some subjects dealt with in the Leased Bases Agreement which are not dealt with at all in the NATO Agreement, and vice versa.

3. When Canada signed the NATO Agreement on June 19, you had been given to understand by the State Department that it was likely that the Canadian proposal would be accepted except with regard to PX's and possibly other customs privileges. In other words, we were warned by the State Department that they would probably not (repeat not) agree to put into storage the PX provisions and some other customs provisions of the Leased Bases Agreement.

4. When we read your WA-2747† and 2748 of July 6, we did not attach any particular significance to the phrase "which are inconsistent" in the penultimate paragraph of the State Department's memorandum. In view of the history of the negotiation, we thought that what the United States were saying was (a) that they would not agree to put into storage the PX provisions and the taxation provisions generally of the Leased Bases Agreement, but (b) that they were willing in other respects to accept the Canadian proposal. Therefore, according to our interpretation of WA-2748, at least the jurisdiction clauses of the Leased Bases Agreement would be put in storage in favour of the parallel clauses of the NATO Agreement.

5. However, the interpretation given in paragraph 2 of WA-2924 seems to us at the moment to make the United States memorandum of July 6 almost meaningless. I should think it would be hopeless to expect officials working in the field of jurisdiction in Newfoundland to base themselves on some sentences or clauses of the Leased Bases Agreement at the same time as they try to work under the NATO Agreement. The real effect therefore of the latest United States attitude seems to be that they are not (repeat not) willing to put any provision of the Leased Bases Agreement into storage but are willing merely to accept the NATO Agreement in fields in which the Leased Bases Agreement is silent. If that is the intent of the United States, we would much prefer that it be stated clearly in their memorandum. It will be very difficult indeed to explain matters to Cabinet here on the basis of the July 6 memorandum.

6. When you are discussing this matter with the State Department, you might use the occasion to clear up two relatively small points in the memorandum of July 6. We assume that the phrase "Post Exchanges and other similar services" in that memorandum is intended to mean "Post Exchanges, Ship's Service Stores, Commissary Stores and Service Clubs", which are the institutions listed in the Leased

Bases Agreement. The second point is that the third paragraph of the July 6 memorandum referred to "exemptions from (Customs) inspections" in a way which implied that such exemptions are a right under the Leased Bases Agreement. In fact, this particular exemption is not mentioned in the Leased Bases Agreement, and our Customs people have never acknowledged that there is any right to exemptions from inspections.

7. We do not wish, at this moment, to discuss what actually happens in Newfoundland in the matter of "inspections". The only point we wish to make clear to the State Department is that the matter of exemption from such inspections is not mentioned in the Leased Bases Agreement and is not (repeat not) regarded by us as a right under the Leased Bases Agreement. (We are sending by bag a copy of a letter† from Customs and Excise which explains the point more fully).

8. We shall not take any further action pending a detailed reply to this telegram. Whether or not the U.S. Government decides to adhere to the attitude reflected in WA-2924, we think it would be helpful if the State Department's memorandum of July 6 could be replaced by a revised version which would set forth without ambiguity what the United States is or is not willing to do.

9. I need hardly add that, if we had known prior to June 19 what we now know of the United States attitude, it is almost certain that the Canadian signature to the NATO Agreement would have been accompanied by a formal declaration of our right later on to annex a reservation to our signature. I am sure that the State Department in June had no desire to mislead but the net result is to say the least very unsatisfactory. Message Ends.

APPLICATION OF NATO FORCES AGREEMENT TO NEWFOUNDLAND LEASED BASES

1. My immediately following teletype contains the text of the Department of State note, dated November 5, 1951, signifying the agreement of the United States to our proposal that the NATO Forces Agreement should be applicable to all United States forces in Canada, including those at the leased bases and at Goose Bay, subject to the continuance of arrangements under the Leased Bases Agreement for the operation of post exchanges, etc., and the provisions of the Leased Bases Agreement concerning tax and customs exemptions modified in accordance with the recommendations of the P.J.B.D. I hope that at an early date we will be in a position to reply to the State Department note.

2. We have informed the State Department that it is likely that we would wish to make the substance of the agreement public once full agreement had been reached. I think you will agree that it would be unnecessary to make public the actual texts of the exchange of notes and the memorandum of June 5th. Please indicate your wishes on this point.

3. The State Department memorandum of July 6th, the text of which was contained in my WA-2748 of the same date, will not be withdrawn. It should simply be marked for file with a notation to the effect that it was superseded by the State Department note of November 5th.

APPLICATION OF NATO FORCES AGREEMENT TO NEWFOUNDLAND LEASED BASES

Following is the text of the Department of State note, dated November 5th, 1951, referred to in my teletype under reference, Begins: I have the honor to refer to the Canadian Embassy's memorandum of June 5, 1951,† in which the Canadian Government suggested that the provisions of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization Status of Forces Agreement should be made applicable to all United States forces in Canada including those at the leased bases and at Goose Bay, and that as a consequence the provisions of the Leased Bases Agreement of March 27, 1941 which deal with matters covered in the NATO Status of Forces Agreement would be in suspense so long as the NATO Status of Forces Agreement remained in force between Canada and the United States.

In common with the Government of Canada, the United States Government would wish the NATO Status of Forces Agreement to apply to all United States forces throughout Canada, including those at the leased bases, when, pursuant to Article 18, the NATO Status of Forces Agreement has come into effect in respect of both Canada and the United States. As the Canadian Government is aware, however, the United States Government attaches great importance to the maintenance of certain arrangements at the leased bases under the Leased Bases Agreement of 1941, as it may be modified as a result of the recommendations of March 30, 1950 by the Permanent Joint Board on Defense. These arrangements concern the operation of institutions under government control known as post exchanges, ships service stores, commissary stores and service clubs for the use of the United States forces, civilian employees who are United States nationals employed by the United States Government in connection with the bases or members of their families resident with them and not engaged in any business or occupation in Canada. The provisions of the Leased Bases Agreement concerning tax and customs exemptions, modified in accordance with the recommendations of the Permanent Joint Board on Defense, would also be satisfactory to this government. The United States Government would not, therefore, wish to alter these arrangements.

Subject to the concurrence of the Canadian Government in the foregoing, the United States Government would be prepared to agree that the NATO Status of Forces Agreement should be made applicable to all United States forces in Canada, including those at the leased bases and at Goose Bay, it being understood that those provisions of the Leased Bases Agreement which deal with the matters covered in the NATO Status of Forces Agreement would be held in abeyance until the NATO Status of Forces Agreement is terminated through expiration or denunciation. Projet d'une note de l'ambassade aux États-Unis pour le département d'État aux États-Unis

Draft Memorandum from Embassy in United States to State Department of United States

CONFIDENTIAL [n.d.]

The Canadian Government has considered the State Department's note of November 5 regarding the Canadian proposal that the NATO Status of Forces Agreement be made applicable to all United States forces in Canada, including those at the leased bases and at Goose Bay.

2. It is noted with satisfaction that the United States Government agrees in principle with this suggestion. It is noted further that the United States wishes to retain the present arrangements (under the Leased Bases Agreement of 1941 as amended by the Permanent Joint Board on Defence Recommendation of March, 1950) relating to post exchanges, etc., and to tax and customs matters generally.

3. While regretting that the United States Government considers it necessary to preserve, during the currency of the NATO Agreement, so many of the parallel provisions of the Leased Bases Agreement, the Canadian Government is prepared to reach an understanding on this basis.

4. The Canadian Government accordingly concurs in the proposals set forth in the 2nd and 3rd paragraphs of the State Department's note of November 5, 1951.[44]

DESPATCH S-1662 Ottawa, April 20, 1951

POSSIBILITY OF THE ADMISSION OF GREECE AND TURKEY TO NATO

We were greatly interested in receiving your telegram WA-1406 of April 11 on the possibility of the admission of Greece and Turkey in NATO. While we have not yet been in a position to discuss this matter with the Minister, you might be interested in our views at the departmental level.

2. We are rather hesitant to comment on the views expressed to you by the State Department about the method of improving the security of the Eastern Mediterranean because we feel that, apart from the possibility of the inclusion of Greece and Turkey in NATO, the area is one in which Canadian interests are remote except in a very general sense and we would not wish to give the impression that we are suggesting to the great powers methods whereby the security of the area under consideration could be increased by further commitments on their part while, at the same time, Canada would be unwilling to accept further commitments itself.

3. With these reservations in mind, you may wish to use the following views in your informal discussions with the State Department.

4. Four alternative methods for dealing with the security problem in the Eastern Mediterranean have been under discussion in recent months:

[44] Cette note a été remise au département d'État le 12 décembre 1951. Un échange officiel de notes s'est terminé au printemps 1952. Voir Canada, Recueil des traités, 1952, N°. 14.
This note was delivered to the State Department on December 12, 1951. A formal exchange of notes was concluded in the spring of 1952. See Canada, Treaty Series, 1952, No. 14.

(a) The inclusion of Greece and Turkey in NATO. This problem has already been discussed and the reasons which were advanced in September for refusing to accede to the Turkish request for admission are, in our mind, still valid today.[45] There is no doubt that such an association would be welcomed by both countries for reasons of prestige and because it would give them greater security in case of war as well as acting as a deterrent against the possibility of a Soviet attack. You have clearly indicated yourself the pros and cons in paragraph 4 of your telegram under reference. The cons are more convincing than the pros as far as we are concerned. We should continue to bear in mind that we have always given some priority to the economic and social aspects of the North Atlantic Treaty. We have little doubt that were Greece and Turkey to be accepted as NATO members those aspects of the Treaty would receive even less consideration than they do today. The North Atlantic Treaty would tend more and more to become an instrument of defence only and would no longer be the framework of an eventual "North Atlantic Community". On the whole we wonder whether such a move might not be a mistake unless all NATO partners are already prepared for the gradual extension of NATO to include all states desiring to prevent Soviet expansion.

(b) The conclusion of an Eastern Mediterranean pact to include Turkey, Greece and the Arab states, or Turkey, Greece, Yugoslavia and Israel. Neither suggestion commands much support. Turkey considers that a military alliance with the Arab states in their present condition of weakness would cause a deterioration in its own position. The Arab states are preoccupied with the effort to establish some degree of unity among themselves before considering any military association with their immediate neighbours. Yugoslavia and Israel, for different reasons, are not prepared to enter into local alliances with other "small" powers. Greece is the only country which, so far, has actively attempted to explore the possibility of an Eastern Mediterranean union.

(c) United States guarantee of military aid to Turkey in case of Soviet attack. This would probably have the advantage of helping strategic defence planning and no single measure which has yet been suggested would be likely to have more immediate practical advantages.

(d) An extension of the direct responsibility already assumed in the Middle East by the United States, the United Kingdom and France through individual agreements or on a tripartite basis. (This would be likely to follow rather than to precede a United States commitment to come to the aid of Turkey if the latter is attacked). The United Kingdom and France already have a mutual assistance agreement with Turkey, and the United States has spent a great deal of money and energy in building up the efficiency of Turkish armed forces and in improving communications in Turkey. The United Kingdom and the United States also gave Greece military aid for several years. In a tripartite declaration of May 25, 1950, the United States, the United Kingdom and France undertook to intervene in case of threats to alter by force existing boundaries in the area between the Eastern Mediterranean and the Persian Gulf. In May, 1950, the United States and the United Kingdom jointly declared their interest in the continued political independence and territorial integrity of Iran and they have recently confirmed their attitude in separate statements by official spokesmen.

5. In such a confused picture we are inclined to feel that ad hoc arrangements for the defence of the Middle East could be based more effectively on the foundations which have already been laid than on an altogether new arrangement such as an extension of NATO responsibilities in the area. Such arrangements could be considered in the following order:

(a) That the decision already arrived at by NATO to associate the Turkish and Greek Governments with the military planning of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization be, in fact, implemented. The insistence, particularly of the Turks, on being associated with NATO might spring mainly from the fact that those arrangements, according to paragraph 3 of your telegram under reference have not been given a fair trial. It is natural for the Turks to underestimate the value of such an association if no effort had been made to make it work.

(b) That the United States consider the possibility of making a fairly strongly worded declaration of its interests in the continued political independence and territorial integrity of Turkey, which would leave no room for speculation on the part of Moscow.

(c) That the governments of the United States and United Kingdom should continue the efforts they are now making to compose the differences which have become apparent in the views of their military leaders in the Eastern Mediterranean area, so as to present as quickly as possible a common front in their dealings with governments of the countries concerned. It would be particularly useful if they could reach a decision as to which of the great powers is to assume military leadership and the primary responsibility for military defence of the area. So long as governments of the Middle East are not sure that the United States and the United Kingdom, the two great powers most directly concerned, see eye to eye on this question, the impression of rivalry and uncertainty is bound to delay preparations for effective resistance to a possible Soviet attack. It would be reasonable to expect that at some stage, preferably when the United States and the United Kingdom have found a basis for composing their differences, France should be brought into the discussions with a view to participation in defensive planning.

(d) That the three great powers which have direct interests in the Middle East should discuss among themselves the possibility of a tripartite declaration on the defence of a more extended area than that to which the declaration of May 25, 1950 applied.

6. We do not wish to convey the impression that, were it so decided after careful consideration in Washington, we would be unwilling to consider the applications of Greece and Turkey for acceptance in NATO. We would then probably take the line that if the United Kingdom, the United States and France, and other NATO powers, are in agreement in favouring the admission of Turkey and Greece, Canada would not oppose it. We do hope, however, that serious consideration will be given to possible alternative courses of action such as those listed above, since we consider that the admission of Turkey to NATO is not to the best of our interests in present circumstances.

7. For your information, I may say that neither the Turkish nor the Greek Ambassadors here has raised the problem of the admission of their respective countries with us.

TELEGRAM WA-1821 Washington, May 1, 1951

Reference your despatch S-1662 of April 20th and your teletypes EX-926 of April 27† and 934 and 944 of April 30th.† Possibility of the admission of Greece and Turkey in NATO.

1. At our weekly meeting with Raynor at the State Department, the Departmental views set out in your despatch under reference were given to him on an informal and confidential basis. We emphasized the point that while we were aware that inter-departmental thinking in Washington was now crystallizing in favour of the inclusion of Greece and Turkey in NATO, it was hoped by those who had been considering the matter in Ottawa that full consideration would be given to the possible alternative courses of action, bearing in mind the weight of the arguments which could be brought to bear against extending NATO membership. Stress was also placed on the point made in your 944 that these confidential Canadian views should not be attributed to Canada in any conversations with Greek or Turkish authorities.

2. Raynor said that this indication of our departmental thinking would be most helpful to the State Department. Commenting on the four alternative methods for dealing with the security problem in the Eastern Mediterranean, outlined in paragraph 4 of your despatch 1662, he observed that alternative (b) (i.e., the conclusion of a Mediterranean Pact without the participation of the United States) had not been seriously considered, since such a suggestion would not command any support in Turkey or Greece at the present time. The main alternatives, in one form or another, to the extension of NATO membership, which had been considered were:

(a) The conclusion of a Mediterranean Pact; and

(b) United States guarantee or assurance of military aid to Greece and Turkey by declaration of the United States Government.

3. As to the various forms which a Mediterranean Pact might take, there was agreement among United States officials that the membership would at least have to include the United States, the United Kingdom and France, as well as Greece and Turkey. Consideration had also been given to the inclusion of Italy. Egypt and Spain were mentioned as marginal cases.

4. As to the possibility of giving Greece and Turkey a greater assurance of security through a new declaration, Raynor said that the considerations outlined in your sub-paragraphs (c) and (d) had been fully borne in mind. In particular it was recognized that a more specific commitment by the United States Government to come to the aid of Greece and Turkey, if the latter are attacked, would have to be an essential feature of any new guarantee by declaration, with or without the participation of other governments.

5. Raynor was also interested in the view expressed in your despatch that "ad hoc arrangements for the defence of the Middle East could be based more effectively on the foundations which have already been laid than on an altogether new arrangement such as an extension of NATO responsibilities in the area". He observed that the points made in paragraph 5 of your despatch have also been taken into account in the examination of the problem in Washington.

6. He concluded his comments by saying that he would see that our thinking would be brought immediately to the attention of the interdepartmental group working on the problem. The question had not yet been considered at a Ministerial level, but it was hoped to submit a memorandum to the Secretary of State shortly. He mentioned that the Office for European Affairs had stressed throughout the discussion the opposition which would probably be encountered among existing NATO members to the suggestion that Greece and Turkey should be admitted, and observed that the Scandinavian members particularly were known to be opposed.

7. He said that the State Department would let us know before decisions were taken on this matter in Washington, and at least before the question was brought up in NATO.

INCLUSION OF GREECE AND TURKEY IN NATO

1. It may be useful to comment briefly at this preliminary stage on the United States proposal to include Greece and Turkey as full members of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization while this matter is receiving active consideration in Ottawa.[46]

2. The United States memorandum bases its case for strengthening security arrangements between the western powers and Greece and Turkey on "both political and military considerations" (paragraph 1). My impression of the memorandum is that it primarily reflects the pressure of military thinking rather than a careful balancing of political and economic factors as well as purely military considerations. Further, while it would not be difficult to reach agreement on the proposition that the security arrangements between Greece and Turkey and the western powers should be strengthened, it is a considerable jump from this conclusion to the conclusion in paragraph 7 that this objective can best be attained by the inclusion of Greece and Turkey as full signatories of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, with the consequent changes in the form and structure of the NATO concept which such a step would imply.

3. For example, the memorandum deals only with two possibilities: (a) a Mediterranean treaty including Greece and Turkey; and (b) the inclusion of Greece and Turkey in NATO. It does not deal with either the possibility (listed in sub-paragraph 4(c) of your despatch No. S.1662 of April 20) of a direct United States guarantee of military assistance to Turkey in the case of Soviet attack, or of a new tripartite guarantee (referred to in your sub-paragraph 4(d)) in which the three western great powers would participate. We feel that before reaching the conclusion that full membership is the best solution, these two alternative possibilities should be seriously explored by the United States and major powers concerned. From the Canadian point of view, the inclusion of Greece and Turkey in the treaty would, of course, extend our legal defence commitments to the Eastern Mediterranean and the Middle East. It should, however, be noted that if Greece or Turkey should be attacked at the present time, the obligation of all the NAT countries (including Canada) to render assistance would be powerful. There is also the fact that the present uncertainty concerning the position of Greece and Turkey presents a temptation to Soviet expansionism whereas steps to increase their present security arrangements whether through inclusion in NATO or by a direct United States guarantee would act as a deterrent in an area of great strategic importance. It may also be that a NATO guarantee within the defensive framework of the treaty would be less provocative at this time to the Soviet Union than a unilateral guarantee extended to Turkey by the United States.

4. The political factors listed in paragraph 2 of the United States memorandum are really military factors and the considerations to which you refer in paragraph 4(a) of your despatch under reference, to which we have always attached great importance, are passed over rather hurriedly in paragraph 6 of the United States paper. For many of its members the North Atlantic Treaty has always been considered not only as a defence instrument, although this is clearly recognized as being its primary role at the present time, but also as having important economic and political implications. It seems to us that the point should be emphasized that the inclusion of Greece and Turkey as full members of the treaty would substantially alter the basis of the North Atlantic community which underlies the treaty itself. Admittedly, the United States can point, as is done in the memorandum, to the fact that both countries are already members of such multilateral European organizations as the Council of Europe and the OEEC. It will be remembered that at the time of the inclusion of Greece and Turkey in the Council of Europe, however, there was a good deal of opposition to their candidature based partly on the fact that it would materially stretch the regional conception on which it was based.

5. It is too early to give any indication from London as to the attitudes of the other North Atlantic Treaty partners on this important issue. The French attitude has already been indicated in the reports which you have received from our mission in Paris, particularly the report copied to us in your telegram No. 90 of May 19.† With the exception of the Italian Government, whose view is already well-known, the attitude of the other smaller European powers is likely to range from active opposition to passive acceptance of the United States proposal. From the indication of official thinking both in the Foreign Office and on the service side here, it would appear that the United Kingdom, while fully aware of the strength of the arguments against the inclusion of Greece and Turkey in NATO is, on this issue as on many others, motivated primarily by a lively desire to meet the United States on major questions of policy to bring about the increased participation of the United States in the whole field of defence in the Middle East, and to avoid giving the impression of "dragging their feet". It seems unlikely that there will be any sustained opposition to the American proposals by the United Kingdom. One other factor to be borne in mind in the discussions to come is that no government wishes to be put in the position vis-à-vis the Greek and Turkish Governments, of admitting to an attitude of opposition.

6. It goes without saying that the Greek and Turkish Governments are eager for an early and favourable resolution of the problem. One indication of this eagerness is given in the daily news bulletin issued by the Greek Information Service in London on May 23 which stated that the Greek Government has been officially informed from Washington that the United States Government has decided, in agreement with the governments of Great Britain and France, to invite Greece and Turkey to participate in the Atlantic Pact. The consent of the other member-states of the Atlantic Pact will be sought. The Manchester Guardian, in reporting this premature announcement adds that "official quarters here make it clear that not only has the British Government taken no final decision in the matter but that it is not to be expected in the immediate future: That the question raises a number of complicated issues which will require a thorough investigation before a decision can be taken".

7. The London Times yesterday carried a leader on the pros and cons of the problem, without coming to a definite conclusion. The editorial recalls the commitments already implicit in the Truman Doctrine, and the fact that both countries are in fact receiving American help on a generous scale, and concludes that there is no fear that their inclusion in the treaty would mean a further diversion of arms from other countries. It goes on to deal with the importance attached by Greece and Turkey to a firm guarantee of their security, without which they fear that in the event of a Russian (or Bulgarian) attack the western powers might try to isolate the war in their countries as they have done in Korea. The hesitation which has hitherto marked the attitude of NATO countries on the question of their inclusion implies no distrust and no disregard of their importance to western security. Even if Greece and Turkey were not included in the North Atlantic Treaty it would still be necessary to find some other way of guaranteeing their independence and of associating them fully in the organization of Mediterranean defence. The Times leader dismisses the argument that the Eastern Mediterranean is not part of the North Atlantic as a quibble. Since the treaty already covers Italy and the Algerian department of France there is no logical reason why it should not be extended to Greece and Turkey. Once it is admitted that Greece and Turkey are essential to western security it is difficult to make any distinction between them and, say, Norway and Denmark.

8. The main difficulties which the Times sees lie in the question of the organization of the North Atlantic Treaty, the nature of the Atlantic community and the danger that the inclusion of Turkey in the pact would give the organization an offensive rather than defensive aspect. On the first point it is thought that the inclusion of Greece and Turkey might cause a serious setback in the complicated planning arrangements for the Mediterranean, which are now under consideration. To the second consideration that the North Atlantic Treaty is more than simply a military alliance, but is based upon the real conception of Atlantic community, the Times attaches more importance. The final argument is that "the North Atlantic Treaty was founded as a deterrent against war, and the signatory countries have constantly to bear in mind the distinction between measures that are clearly seen to be for defence and other measures that might seem to be challenging. The distinction may at times be a subtle one, but that it exists no one could reasonably deny. Naturally, the Turkish views would have to be sought first. The Turkish Government may wish to be included in the treaty, but, for the moment at least, it may prefer to do without bases on Turkish soil. To some extent indeed it is a purely technical question: What is the best way for the western powers to protect and guarantee the integrity of Greece and Turkey without at the same time altering the manifestly defensive character of the North Atlantic Treaty? That Greece and Turkey must be defended there is no shadow of doubt. Any attack on either would lead to war. Yet in all their plans and preparations the western powers must never lose sight of their essential purpose and must never give the Soviet Union the least reason to think that they have any other aim but defence."

9. The Manchester Guardian has come out editorially for the inclusion of Greece and Turkey in the North Atlantic Treaty, using the following arguments:

(1) This step would not divert essential military supplies from the present NAT members to the Eastern Mediterranean; the call on United States assistance is likely to be much the same whether Greece and Turkey are in the pact or merely associated with its planning; their share could more effectively be settled inside rather than outside the pact;

(2) The crucial question posed is "whether the NAT nations should extend their commitments both geographically and politically. For the United Kingdom, the commitment already exists; for the United States it would be new, but with the advantage that the United States would be bound to the Eastern Mediterranean as never before;

(3) The strategic position of Turkey as a base for attacking sensitive spots in the Caucasus is underlined; these facilities could more effectively be used if Turkey were a NAT partner;

(4) Finally, the Guardian concludes that, "in effect, the Atlantic nations are already three-quarters of the way into an alliance with Greece and Turkey. If either were now to be assaulted by a Communist country the Atlantic Treaty members could not stand aside. Through the United Nations they would be drawn to defend the victim of aggression. If they did not go to its help the moral consequences would be disastrous and collective security, which has had some reality since Korea, would be dead. That being the case, they would be better on the most practical grounds to make their arrangements with Greece and Turkey in advance. And on other grounds Greece and Turkey, who are already in the European family at Strasbourg, have a strong claim to admission to the larger Atlantic community".

TELEGRAM 896 Ottawa, May 28, 1951

Repeat Washington EX-1157.
Following from Heeney for Wilgress: Your telegram 1279 of May 25, 1951. Relationship of Greece and Turkey to NATO.

1. Reference your paragraph 4, we will endeavour to let you have our comments on the various questions of substance involved in this issue in time for the discussions later this week. Meanwhile it might be useful for you to know of certain developments which have taken place here.

2. The question of the relationship of Greece and Turkey to NATO was brought up in Cabinet on May 18, and it was felt by Ministers that it would be desirable to take such steps as might be possible to obtain deferment of a decision on the question of admission to NATO as proposed by the United States in order to permit discussion at the next meeting of the Council of alternative schemes for the defence of the Eastern Mediterranean.

3. It is evident that a good deal more information than is at present available will be required before deciding what the Canadian stand is to be. We will want to examine the military appreciation, which our Chiefs of Staff have been asked to prepare, of the advantages and disadvantages of the admission of Greece and Turkey to NATO and possibly the appreciation which, we understand, the Standing Group is preparing as well. A few weeks will elapse before even the Canadian military paper is available. Since the United States Government has itself taken the best part of two months to formulate its views after a thorough examination of both political and military factors, it is only reasonable that other member governments should be allowed an adequate period in which to give similar careful study to the issues at stake. In any event, even if we were to reach a decision in the near future, parliamentary action presumably would be required in many if not all NATO countries and if for no other reason, this fact alone will occasion considerable delay. We are taking steps to confirm our impression that similar parliamentary action would be required here.

4. I do not think, however, that we should attempt to prevent a preliminary discussion of the problem of the relationship of Greece and Turkey to NATO if other countries are agreeable. As long as it is clear that no hasty decisions are to be taken, it would be of considerable value in shaping our own views to have the benefit of the views of some of the other member states, particularly those of the three countries most directly concerned — the United Kingdom, France and the United States.

5. I note from paragraph 5 of your telegram 1250 of May 22† that the Deputies agreed to recommend that individual governments should refrain from indicating their respective positions to the Greek and Turkish Governments. By the time your telegram reached us the Turkish Ambassador had already called on me to remind me of the assurance previously given by the Canadian Government to the effect that if the NATO powers more directly concerned — the United Kingdom, United States and France — were in favour of the admission of his country, Canada would not oppose it. His Government evidently not only expected that that assurance would still hold good but was looking to the Canadian Government to take active steps to give Turkey its support rather than simply to follow the lead taken by the major powers. His line of approach was that Turkey considered that there were four great powers in the North Atlantic Alliance, of which Canada was the fourth, and that as such Canada was expected to make its voice heard. A similar démarche was made by the Greek Ambassador on May 26, after we had received your telegram, though in the latter case Canadian support for the admission of Greece to NATO was sought not on the basis of the assurances given by us last September but on the military advantages of such a course to the security of Western Europe and the Near East. A copy of the Note† dated May 25 left by the Greek Ambassador in support of his Government's request is being sent to you by bag.

6. Having already spoken to the Turkish Ambassador along the lines set forth below, we had no alternative but to adopt a similar position with respect to the Greek démarche. Both Ambassadors were orally informed that they could assure their governments that the Canadian Government still maintained the same friendly policy as outlined last September and that if other NATO members more directly concerned, viz., the United Kingdom, United States and France, submitted a recommendation to the effect that Turkey and Greece should be admitted to NATO, we would not oppose it. On both occasions, however, we did go on to add a few remarks with the object of leaving the impression that this Canadian assurance was not without certain reservations and that in the final analysis Canada would be guided by what was best for the West as a whole. It was pointed out to them that we were all trying to reach the same objective and that the only problem with which we were confronted was how that objective could best be achieved. This could be done in this particular instance either through full admission of Greece and Turkey to NATO or through some other form of alliance, such as a Mediterranean Pact. In no circumstances should a situation be allowed to develop in which the solidarity of NATO would be weakened because in that event the whole fabric of Western defence would similarly be weakened, with serious consequences for Turkey as well as for the rest of us.

7. I am afraid that in giving this statement of the Canadian Government's views to the Turkish and Greek Ambassadors, we have unavoidably gone beyond the intent of the Deputies' recommendation, but I think you will agree that the statement was so phrased as to leave us free to consider, in accordance with the Cabinet conclusion, alternative forms of association of Greece and Turkey with Western defence planning if, after an examination of all the considerations, this proves to be a more desirable solution than admission to NATO.

8. For your own information, there are indications that the State Department may not be irrevocably committed to admission of the two countries to NATO as the only solution to the Eastern Mediterranean defence problem. For example, the United States Embassy here has just told us that in answer to an inquiry from the Italian Ambassador in Washington the State Department had replied that after extensive study they had reached the conclusion that of the different alternatives open to them admission to NATO was considered the best. They had, however, added that this conclusion was in no way final nor was it one which the State Department wished to impose on other NATO members. They looked forward to the fullest exchange of views within NATO with the object of achieving a solution mutually satisfactory to all.

9. This flexible approach on the part of the United States is encouraging. It seems to indicate that there is room for profitable discussion on the basis of the United States memorandum which should lead to an examination of alternatives. For your own information our initial reaction to the memorandum was that it was somewhat unconvincing, particularly from the political point of view, and failed to give cogent reasons why the United States had been prompted to raise this issue now. I will be sending you shortly our comments on questions of substance in this issue in a separate telegram.

RELATIONSHIP OF GREECE AND TURKEY WITH NATO

Following for Heeney, Begins: I am glad to have the account set forth in your telegram of the developments in Ottawa on this question. I fully share the view expressed in your paragraph 3 that a final decision in this matter must rest upon a careful and detailed examination of the military problems involved as well as the political factors which have been in our minds. The question of whether the North Atlantic Treaty should be modified in such a way as to include these two countries can only be answered in the light of a full study of the facts. Among the questions which must be raised are the following.

2. Would the inclusion of Greece and Turkey in the Treaty and the extension of the area defined in Article VI to include Greece and European and Asiatic Turkey be regarded by the USSR as provocative?[47] Can sufficient evidence be found to warrant the conclusion that the contribution which Greece and Turkey could make to the common defence would justify the increased commitments involved in their accession to the treaty? Would their inclusion ensure their active participation in the event of Soviet aggression directed against Western Europe or any portion of the North Atlantic Treaty area as now defined in Article VI? The United States memorandum does not deal with the question of what the attitude of the Soviet Union might be in the event of the inclusion of Greece and Turkey in the treaty, yet this is a question of major importance, and the risks involved must be balanced against the increased strength which Greece and Turkey could bring to the coalition. I fully agree, therefore, that a military appreciation by our own Chiefs of Staff is a prerequisite to any further study of the questions involved.

3. You will have noted that the United Kingdom view, as summarized in my telegram No. 1285 of May 25th,† is that as a first step the question should be examined in its military aspect by the Standing Group, and I should think that this is a proposal which we might well support when the United Kingdom view has been expressed in the Deputies.

4. At the Council Deputies meeting yesterday Spofford drew attention to the agreement of the Deputies at the meeting of May 21st to recommend to governments that their position on the question should not be disclosed to the Turkish or Greek Governments. He stated that at the time he had agreed to this suggestion, which had originally been made by the Netherlands Deputy, he had not known that in fact the United States Government had made known its own views to the Greek and Turkish governments. He therefore suggested that each government might, if it wished, make known its own position, but not the position of other governments in discussions with the Turkish and Greek Governments. Hoyer Millar echoed this view and pointed out that a great deal of pressure had been put on the Foreign Office, particularly by the Turkish Ambassador in London, and that it might be necessary to give some indication of United Kingdom views when these had been formulated. The Netherlands Deputy was clearly unhappy about these suggestions and pointed out that if each of the NATO governments were to make its position known to Greece and Turkey individually, the two claimant governments would seek to play off one member against another.

Article VI defines the geographic areas of responsibility of the parties to the treaty.

5. You will see, therefore, that in practice it will not be possible to carry out the suggestion made at the meeting of May 21st.

6. I look forward to receiving your comments on the questions of substance involved. Ends.

TELEGRAM 920 Ottawa, May 30, 1951

TOP SECRET. MOST IMMEDIATE.

Following for Wilgress from Heeney, Begins: My telegram No. 896 of May 28, 1951 and your telegram No. 1316 of May 29, re relationship of Greece and Turkey with NATO.

1. You will have noted already that we have serious misgivings regarding the wisdom of extending membership to Greece and Turkey. In our estimation the United States memorandum fails to present a convincing political case in this respect. On the other hand, some of the military arguments advanced in the memorandum are undoubtedly valid. It remains to be proven, however, that those military arguments could not be taken care of by some alternative solution, such as a Mediterranean Pact. Our own Chiefs of Staff will be looking into this matter. With regard to paragraph 3 of your telegram, No. 1316, I think that you might well support the United Kingdom proposal that the question should be examined in its military aspect by the Standing Group.

3. Regardless of any military appreciation of the situation, the problem of the admission of Greece and Turkey to NATO is clearly one in which Canada should not be expected to play a prominent role. We should bear in mind the fact that all the alternatives to admission to NATO, such as those set forth in my despatch No. S-1662 of April 20, for a Mediterranean Pact are of such a nature that no direct Canadian commitment is involved. It would be improper for the Canadian Government to take a leading part in urging a course of action which would involve others in extending commitments although it is quite proper for Canada to comment on any measure which would substantially alter the character of NATO. It seems to me that it would be preferable, therefore, to let those countries more directly concerned carry the main burden of a discussion in the Council Deputies. There are already clear indications that such a process is already under way.

4. I was very much interested in your telegram No. 1316 and think consideration should be given to the question raised in paragraph 2 about the provocative aspect NATO would assume were it extended to Greece and Turkey. These other questions should certainly be discussed as fully as possible. It may be that the military planners in Washington have already come to the conclusion that a Soviet attack on Greece and/or Turkey would immediately lead to a world war. If that is one of the premises on which they base their case for the admission of Greece and Turkey, it becomes even more important that the provocative aspect of the admission towards the USSR be studied.

5. There are other questions which remain unanswered, some having already been posed by NATO Deputies, some others which will emerge during later discussions. It seems that the atmosphere would be clarified if the powers more directly concerned were willing to submit information on such items as:

(i) The reasons for the failure of the existing arrangements whereby Greece and Turkey were to be associated with NATO defence planning in the Eastern Mediterranean;

(ii) The command arrangements in the Eastern Mediterranean on which so little progress seems to have been made;

(iii) The problem of further admission to NATO once the door has been opened to Greece and Turkey. It is evident from your telegram No. 1214 of May 17† that the United Kingdom are concerned about the effect of a departure from the Atlantic aspect of NATO on the relationship of Australia, New Zealand and South Africa with Treaty arrangements in the Mediterranean area. The problem of the acceptance of Western Germany will presumably become more acute if and when Greece and Turkey are admitted.

6. It seems quite clear that irrespective of any legislative requirement for amendment of the Treaty, the Government, on political grounds alone, would wish to seek Parliamentary approval if the admission of Greece and Turkey were officially recommended by the North Atlantic Council, since their admission would constitute a major commitment in the defence of an area in which Canada has not hitherto been involved. Greatest care should therefore be exercised in reaching a decision on an issue which would require action by our own Parliament.

7. The timing of these discussions, as well as of any conclusion which might be reached, is important and should be related to the possibility of a North Atlantic Council meeting in the not too distant future. It seems to us that the Deputies should not attempt to come to a hasty conclusion on such an important issue for the mere sake of trying to meet a given deadline. It might be that the most satisfactory procedure for the Deputies would be to submit a progress report to the Council for consideration, giving the different alternatives envisaged without making any definite recommendation. Ends.

RELATIONSHIP OF GREECE AND TURKEY TO NATO

Spofford introduced this subject at to-day's meeting by clarifying a number of points in the United States position. As a result of their preliminary study of the question the United States authorities thought that the inclusion of Greece and Turkey in the North Atlantic Treaty would require the amendment of Article 6, possibly in the form of an addition of the phrase "any part of Turkey" after the reference to the Algerian departments of France. The position was not so clear as to whether an amendment would be required to Article 5,[48] but Spofford confirmed, in reply to a question by Hoyer Millar, that the intention in the United States aide mémoire was to include both "Turkey in Europe" and "Turkey in Asia".

2. The Netherlands Deputy had raised earlier the question of whether modification of the preamble would be required. The preliminary United States view was that there was no need to re-draft the existing preamble, nor was it felt that the concept of the North Atlantic community would be in any way impaired by the inclusion of Turkey and Greece in the treaty. Both countries qualified on the grounds of "common heritage" providing a broad enough implication was given to this criterion. Spofford reminded the Deputies of the provisions of Article 10[49] of the treaty and expressed the view that Turkey was in a position both to further the principles of the treaty and to contribute to the security of the North Atlantic area. He also referred to the fact that Turkey and Greece were members of both the Article X authorizes NATO members to invite, by unanimous consent, any European state to accede to the treaty.

O.E.E.C. and the Council of Europe, and that Turkey had, in fact, been a charter member of the former organization.

3. Hoyer Millar began his comments with a reference to the reply made in answer to a question in the House of Commons yesterday by the Foreign Secretary on the position of Turkey, the text of which is contained in my immediately following telegram.† He had hoped to give the Deputies earlier notice of the statement of United Kingdom policy contained in Mr. Morrison's reply, but this had not been possible. After reading portions of the reply, Hoyer Millar indicated briefly that the United Kingdom fully supported the desire of Turkey and Greece to improve their security position, and agreed that a closer association of Turkey and Greece with the western defence system must be established by some means. The real question was how this could best be done. The United States proposal with respect to the full inclusion of Turkey and Greece in the North Atlantic Treaty was one of a number of possible solutions. On the United States proposal, the United Kingdom could be likened to the man from Missouri, who said he had to be shown. The difficulties involved in the problems were very real and it would be only on the basis of a thorough and detailed appreciation of both the military and political implications that the United Kingdom Government would be in a position to take a final decision. Hoyer Millar suggested that in order that a common view on this problem might emerge, and as a first step, the Standing Group should be invited at once to look into the military implications of the United States proposal.

4. Alphand made a statement on rather similar lines, agreeing that it was necessary to associate Greece and Turkey with the defence of the west, but insisting that a political decision could only be taken after the Standing Group had completed a careful appreciation of the military facts involved. Alphand suggested that in order to formulate precise questions to be asked of the Standing Group, a small drafting committee might be set up at once. In reply to a query from Spofford asking whether his position was similar to that of Hoyer Millar, Alphand indicated that his government could not take up any definite position before having full information.

5. The Portuguese Acting Deputy made a brief statement to the effect that his government continued not to favour the inclusion of Greece and Turkey in NATO. This implied no lack of esteem for the two countries, and no under-estimation of the important military contribution which they could make. In the view of the Portuguese Government, however, a preferable solution could be reached by working out regional defence arrangements in the Mediterranean in which the principal interested powers would participate. His government felt that the inclusion of Greece and Turkey in the North Atlantic Treaty would radically alter the present Atlantic character of the pact; would modify its present wholly defensive character, and might be regarded as provocative action by the U.S.S.R.; would create a situation in which local conflicts involving a small area might rapidly become large-scale conflicts; and would considerably increase the risk of war.

6. The Belgian Deputy spoke along rather the same lines as Alphand.

7. The Norwegian deputy stated that his government would not wish to see a decision taken on the question until it had been thoroughly studied and carefully considered. He was therefore in agreement with the United Kingdom proposal. In the opinion of his government, the United States memorandum had ignored the important question of the probable reaction of the Russians to the proposed extension of the treaty. He added his personal view that there was considerable similarity between the position of Turkey and that of Norway in view of the fact that both countries had common land frontiers with Russia. He recalled that the entry of Norway into the NAT had been the subject of a strong protest from the Russians which the Norwegian Government had been able to counter by the assurance that no foreign troops would be stationed in Norway during peace-time. He thought that in assessing the probable reaction of Russia it would be desirable to know whether or not outside troops were likely to be based in Turkey. Military advice might be sought on this point.

8. I stated that consideration of the implications of the United States proposal was continuing in Ottawa and that I was sure you would not wish to see a decision taken before the matter had been carefully studied. Accordingly I indicated my agreement with Hoyer Millar's proposal. I thought, however, that consideration of the political and other non-military aspects of the question might continue in the Deputies concurrently with the examination by the Standing Group. I suggested that the eventual decision might have to be taken by the Council itself at its next meeting. In any event, the Deputies should see that the discussion was sufficiently far advanced for the matter to be considered by the Council if that proved necessary.

9. The Netherlands Deputy expressed views rather similar to mine.

10. The Italian Deputy repeated the support of his government for full membership of both Turkey and Greece. He indicated that he would, however, be prepared to have the Standing Group present an appreciation of the military implications of the proposal if that would not delay a decision too long.

11. The Luxembourg Deputy dissented from the Italian view and expressed his agreement with the statement made by most of the other deputies.

12. At the conclusion of the meeting it was decided that:

(a) The Standing Group should be asked to report on the military implications of the United States proposal;

(b) The Political Working Group (with military participants) should meet tomorrow morning to draft the questions to be put to the Standing Group, after approval by the Deputies, in order to ensure that the latter's response would be sufficiently detailed;

(c) The Political Working Group should also define the non-military aspects of the question (including the juridical as well as political points) and prepare an agenda for further discussion of these aspects by the Deputies;

(d) The Council Deputies should resume discussion of the subject on Tuesday, June 5th.

COUNCIL DEPUTIES, JUNE 19TH

General discussion took place yesterday on the first four of the suggested headings for discussion of the political aspects (Document D-D(51)145 of June 2nd).†

2. On Item I, I made the point in paragraph 4 of your telegram No. 981 of June 9th,† and general agreement was expressed with the view that the desirability of linking Greece and Turkey with the defence of the West had already been settled by the Council. The United Kingdom Deputy also referred to the United Kingdom Government's commitments to Turkey arising out of the Anglo-Turkish Treaty.

3. On the question of the possible reaction to be expected from the USSR or its satellites a number of interesting comments were made. Hoyer Millar said that the Foreign Office view was that should Greece and Turkey be included in NATO there was every reason to expect a fairly violent Soviet propaganda campaign. The real question was whether such a step would be seriously regarded by the USSR as a direct threat, and whether it would provoke a military counter-action. On this point it was impossible to be categorical or definite, but on the basis of available evidence the Foreign Office view was that if the Kremlin calculated that an attack on Turkey would mean a world war, and on the assumption that the Soviet Union is not ready for a world war now, undue weight should not be given to the possibility of Soviet military counter-action. The Foreign Office did not feel that the adherence of Greece and Turkey to NATO would materially affect Soviet plans, nor did they feel that the fear of giving provocation to the USSR should be a decisive factor in coming to a decision on the general question.

4. The United States Deputy, pointing out that he had no specific instructions, expressed the view implicit in the United States memorandum that the adherence of Greece and Turkey would not invoke either a local or a general Soviet reaction. Such a step would merely be an extension of the present defence arrangements into a wider field, but the emphasis would continue to be on the defensive character of the NATO Alliance. The view of the State Department Russian experts was that the Soviet Union would take military measures only when there is more to gain than to lose by so doing. It was felt that the Russians had already accepted the association of Greece and Turkey with the West for military planning purposes, and already counted those two countries as coming within the framework of the western grouping. Propaganda measures could, however, be anticipated.

5. The Netherlands, Norwegian and Danish Deputies took an opposite view. The Netherlands Deputy said that the inclusion of Greece and Turkey in NATO would be considered by the Soviet Union as an encircling movement, and might conceivably provoke military counter-measures. In any event, such a step would lead towards an intensification of the existing East-West tension, and by so doing would increase the existing dangers in the situation. Up to now the North Atlantic Treaty Alliance had been composed of a group of like-minded powers, and great care had been taken not to convey the impression that the alliance was aimed directly at the Soviet Union. The accession of Greece and Turkey to the treaty, however, would point straight in the direction of the Soviet Union.

6. The Danish Deputy echoed this apprehension. His government felt that it was impossible to foretell Soviet reactions, and that this in itself was an additional reason for caution.

7. The Norwegian Deputy, who was also without instructions, said that his own view was similar to that expressed by Van Starkenborgh. He was sure that the Norwegian Government would wish to know the view of the Great Powers, who were much better placed to evaluate Soviet reactions. He felt, however, that the opinion which had been expressed by Hoyer Millar left out the important factor that the Soviet Union was known to be extremely sensitive to happenings on its immediate borders. This, in his view, was a central reason for going slowly in dealing with the problem of Greece and Turkey.

8. The most interesting contribution came from Alphand. He did not dissent from the general view expressed by Hoyer Millar, but sought to narrow down the framework of the discussion. According to French estimates there were 23 Soviet divisions now facing Turkey, and important elements of the Soviet fleet available for duty in Turkish waters. Alphand then raised the following specific question:

(i) In the event that Turkey (and Greece) are associated with western defence in a form as yet undetermined, what attitude will the Turkish Government adopt to the location of NATO bases on Turkish territory?

(ii) Recalling the pressure brought to bear on Norway by the Soviet Union prior to the Norwegian signature of the treaty, and the fact that Norway's signature of the treaty was based upon the understanding that foreign forces would not be located on Norwegian territory in peace-time, would the Turkish Government adopt an attitude similar to that of Norway as a condition of signing the treaty?

(iii) According to French information, a number of aerodromes in Turkey were being expanded to accommodate B36 aircraft. So far there had been no Soviet protests, since this programme was the direct responsibility of the Turkish Government. If, however, as a result of the inclusion of Turkey in NATO there should be a Soviet ultimatum, what would the reaction of the Western NATO Powers be? Even if Soviet military counter-measures need not be anticipated, might not the effect be to retard the present defence programme in Turkey which was now proceeding satisfactorily?

9. In connection with these specific questions, and particularly the question of the attitude of the Turkish Government towards the establishment of NATO bases on Turkish territory, Alphand reported that he had recently had a personal conversation with the Turkish Ambassador in London, in which the latter had hinted strongly that should his country be admitted to NATO his government had not considered that this would mean that Turkey automatically agrees to the establishment of NATO bases on Turkish territory.

10. The Luxembourg Deputy reported a conversation with the Turkish Ambassador on similar lines. Hoyer Millar made the point that if these conversations faithfully represented the Turkish Government's attitude, the Standing Group's calculations with respect to Turkey's military importance to NATO would be substantially affected. It was agreed that it would be useful for the deputies to seek the views of their governments on the specific questions which Alphand had raised.

11. The Italian Deputy took the opportunity of making a general statement, the tenor of which was that since August 1950 the Italian Government had been convinced that the inclusion of Turkey (and Greece) in NATO was essential. In the view of the Italian Government the arguments in favour of such a course were stronger now than a year ago. Such a course was warranted not only by Italy's friendly relations with Greece and Turkey, but the whole strategic position in the Mediterranean, where the need for establishing effective defence arrangements was urgent. The Italian Deputy referred to the increasing criticism of the West in the Turkish press, and the danger that inaction on our part would stimulate neutralist tendencies in Turkey. In this connection he said that at the beginning of this year the Italian Government had learned that the Soviet Government was interested in keeping Turkey neutral in the event of war. By stimulating neutralism, we were in fact serving Soviet objectives. The Italian Government was fully aware of the technical difficulties, but felt that on the grounds he had indicated, and above all because of the critical situation in the Mediterranean, the inclusion of Greece and Turkey in NATO was a matter of urgency. His government did not think that it was realistic to assume that such action would be regarded by the USSR as provocative. He argued that the character of the North Atlantic Alliance would not be altered by the inclusion of these two new members, and that any aggression against Greece and Turkey could not, in fact, be localized.

12. Under Item III, on the various methods of linking Greece and Turkey with the defence of the West, the discussion was less coherent, partly because it was recognized that headings 4, 5 and 6 were essentially sub-headings of Item III, and the discussion therefore tended to overlap into these other points. It was broadly agreed that the discussion of alternatives might follow the framework of the alternative methods of associating Greece and Turkey summarized in paragraph 2 of document D-D(51)142 of June 5th† (the list of detailed questions for the Standing Group).

13. There was a brief discussion, in which Hoyer Millar and Alphand participated, on the shortcomings of the existing Anglo-Turkish and Franco-Turkish treaties, the outcome of which was that these treaties were inadequate insofar as they committed the United Kingdom and France to go to Turkey's aid in the event of a Soviet attack, but did not imply any reciprocal obligation. Greece was not covered at all by bilateral guarantees.

14. Hoyer Millar also took the opportunity of saying that what Turkey really wanted was a United States guarantee, and that their inclusion in NATO was only one way of achieving this result. Spofford commented that what Turkey really wanted was to be included in NATO as the best means of obtaining such a guarantee.

15. The Portuguese Deputy threw some further light on the Turkish attitude by referring to his recent conversation with the Turkish Ambassador (who has obviously been pretty busy in the past week) in which he quoted the ambassador as saying that the Soviet Union would be likely to respect the defensive character of the NATO Alliance, but that those countries not included in the alliance were in a much more vulnerable position.

16. While it had been intended only to deal with the first four points, the Netherlands and Norwegian Deputies both commented on item V, i.e., the effect of the inclusion of Greece and Turkey on the concept of the North Atlantic Community. The Netherlands Deputy stressed the regional and cultural basis of the present association, and the fact that it was more than a merely military alliance. From an organizational point of view the problem was difficult enough with twelve members, but would become infinitely more complicated with the addition of two more members, particularly if the countries concerned were not essentially western in outlook. Finally, he referred to the existing difficulties with the Standing Group, and raised the question whether the inclusion of Greece and Turkey would not increase the security problems and difficulties.

17. The Norwegian Deputy spoke in the same sense, and referred to the ultimate goals of the North Atlantic Treaty which had been interpreted in some quarters as leading towards a more integrated Atlantic union. His government was not impressed with Greece and Turkey's "western" associations. While no doubt the government and intellectuals had a western orientation, the fact was that 80 percent of the Turkish population were peasants, living in Asia Minor. The modification in the basis of the treaty association which their inclusion would involve might make it more difficult to obtain the support from our respective public opinions for the idea of an Atlantic Community.

18. The Portuguese Deputy took a similar line, stressing that Turkey and Greece were not in the "same circle" as the present NATO powers.

19. The discussion on Greece and Turkey continues today.

20. Action required:

(1) Your comments on the specific points listed in D-D(51)145 at as early a date as possible;

(2) Any comments which you wish to make on the specific questions raised by Alphand, as outlined in paragraph 8 above.

RELATIONSHIP OF GREECE AND TURKEY TO NATO

Council Deputies, 20th June, relationship of Greece and Turkey to NATO.

The discussion was continued yesterday on non-military aspects. Hoyer Millar expressed sympathy with the views which had been put forward at the previous meeting by the Netherlands and Norwegian Deputies under points 5 and 6, dealing with the effect of the inclusion of Greece and Turkey on the concept of the North Atlantic community and the existing NATO structure. The inclusion of Greece and Turkey would, to a certain extent vitiate the original idea on which the treaty had been founded. The Foreign Office view was, however, that if the defence aspect of the treaty is to be regarded as primary, and if in the interests of NATO defence the admission of Greece and Turkey is required, the effect on the North Atlantic community concept should not be a determining factor. With reference to the earlier comment of the Netherlands Deputy that there would be greater organizational difficulties, Hoyer Millar was inclined to agree, but pointed out that Greece and Turkey were not unused to working with other western countries. Further, the Foreign Office considered that Greek and Turkish military security was up to standard, and little additional security risk from a military point of view would arise from their inclusion.

2. I indicated that the Canadian position was broadly similar to that of the United Kingdom. We considered that a thorough examination of military considerations was necessary before final decisions could be taken, and we were therefore awaiting the Standing Group reply to our questionnaire. I expressed the view, however, that an extension of the treaty to include Greece and Turkey would radically alter the original conception on which the treaty was based, and would subordinate this original conception to military requirements. We had placed considerable emphasis on the significance and long-term objectives of Article 2, which went beyond the purely military aspects of the treaty, and which would be to some extent complicated by the inclusion of the two new members proposed. Our conclusion, however, was that the military arguments had first to be carefully studied.

3. The Netherlands Deputy clung tenaciously to his earlier points that their inclusion would bring in an alien element to our association. Greece was fundamentally interested in Balkan questions, while Turkey's primary interests were in the Near East. Further, his fear was that with the enlargement of the NATO countries from twelve to fourteen, the danger was that many important decisions would of necessity be taken within a smaller group. This would decidedly be a retrograde step.

4. The Italian Deputy did not deny that the original NATO concept would be affected, but insisted that the inclusion of the two countries would greatly strengthen the military side of the association.

5. Spofford, in commenting on the Netherlands points, took the view that the present geographical area covered by the North Atlantic Treaty was itself far from compact, and that there was already a wide geographical distribution within the framework of the treaty. His view was that Turkey had both a European and a Middle East aspect. But he pointed out that in the United States there were many people who held the view that primary attention should be devoted to the Pacific area, yet this did not prevent the United States from playing an active part in the defence of Western Europe. On the question of the workability of the new arrangements, he agreed that our task would not be made easier by widening the circle, but pointed out that many other international bodies, e.g., the OEEC, had a considerably larger membership than that of NATO, and still managed to do effective work. In expressing these views, Spofford made it clear that he had not had specific instructions on these points from the State Department.

6. The discussion then turned to the juridical and parliamentary difficulties in the way of the various forms of association, but since the other methods of association have not yet been fully discussed, main emphasis was placed on the difficulties which would arise in including Greece and Turkey in NATO.

7. Hoyer Millar expressed the view that the various possible methods of association should be fully discussed and said that the view of the legal adviser of the Foreign Office was that while amendments to Articles V and VI would be required, this could be done by means of a supplementary protocol rather than by actual treaty amendment. This point was not discussed in detail, although the Belgian and Netherlands Deputies said they could see very little difference in the effect of the two methods.

8. It was apparent from the general discussion that most governments would be required to consult parliaments if any modification of the treaty were required. The French Acting Deputy made it clear that the French Government was specifically bound to bring before the Chamber of Deputies any proposal to extend the present treaty membership. The United States position was that no amendment would be required to the preamble, or to Article V, but that as indicated in para 1 of my telegram 1338 of May 31st Article VI would need amending on the lines indicated in my earlier message. The accession of Greece and Turkey to the treaty would require ratification by the Senate. There was a brief discussion of other parts of the treaty which might require modification, the Netherlands Deputy taking the view that the preamble would probably need to be altered, and also Article X. The specific points, however, were not covered in detail.

9. In the general discussion concerning Article 6 Hoyer Millar indicated that the United Kingdom Government would have to reserve the position of Cyprus, which at the moment is not included in the area covered by the treaty.

10. On Item 8 — financial and economic implications of the various methods — both Hoyer Millar and Spofford thought that the inclusion of Greece and Turkey would not substantially affect the present financial and economic arrangements.

The Turks were already receiving MDAP aid. The problems of infrastructure in their area, Hoyer Millar suggested, would be primarily a matter for the Greeks and Turks themselves, while the problem of their contribution to SHAPE and the subordinate commands would also have to be dealt with.

11. On Item 9, concerning other possible applications for membership, the Netherlands Deputy raised the question in general terms by pointing out that if the admission of Turkey was to be based on purely military considerations, such considerations might also operate in the case of other countries. The Portuguese Deputy was quick to seize the opportunity of pointing out that should parliaments come to discuss the admission of Greece and Turkey, the question of Spain would likely arise at the same time. Hoyer Millar made the interesting contribution, based on Foreign Office estimates, that while pressure for Spain's admission from "certain quarters" might be expected, the United Kingdom was already used to such pressure, and no new situation would be created. Yugoslavia was another possible country whose admission might be raised, but he thought it unlikely that the Yugoslavs would wish to provoke Russia by seeking admission. Increased demands might be expected from the Western German Government, but the Foreign Office felt that this involved long-term problems which need not be taken up at present. Finally, claims might be made by certain Middle Eastern countries such as Iraq, Jordan and the Lebanon. The Foreign Office thought, however, that these claims were not particularly strong, and could be "ridden off". Summarizing, Hoyer Millar said that the Foreign Office feeling was that the fact that other demands might be raised was not in itself a sufficiently strong argument to deter us from going ahead on Greece and Turkey if other considerations pointed in that direction.

12. The French Acting Deputy agreed that the inclusion of Greece and Turkey might involve increased pressure for admission to NATO by other Middle Eastern countries.

13. It may be expected that in our forthcoming discussions there will be fuller study of the points covered in this preliminary review, with particular emphasis on the alternative methods of associating Greece and Turkey. Following this discussion the intention is to request the Political Working Group to prepare a general summary of the position.

TELEGRAM 1089 Ottawa, June 27, 1951

Following for Wilgress from Heeney: Your telegrams No. 1510 of June 20 and No. 1526 of June 21 re relationship of Greece and Turkey to NATO.

The exchange of views reported in your telegrams under reference has been extremely helpful and interesting. I realize that you might have wished to have more definite instructions in order to make a better contribution to these discussions but there were and still are certain definite limits imposed on our participation, the most important ones being the assurances already given to the Greek and Turkish Governments, the Cabinet's conclusion that we should endeavour to avoid a hasty decision in order to permit a thorough examination of alternatives to admission to NATO and, thirdly, the fact that any alternative to full admission to NATO would involve direct commitments for others but not for Canada.

2. In some respects, the Deputies' discussions have clarified the issue but nothing could be done to redress a balance which has been upset by the United States when they publicly committed themselves to supporting Greece and Turkey for full admission. The discussion must be most irritating to the United States and appear inordinately long to the Greeks and Turks while it is particularly distasteful to those countries like France and Scandinavia which cannot see their way clear to accepting a United States recommendation which has already been made public.

3. Since the Minister is in London, you will have some opportunity I am sure of discussing this matter with him. He will tell you that at the official level we share many of the misgivings expressed in the Deputies and conveyed to you in earlier telegrams. At this stage in the negotiation, and subject to the Minister's concurrence, you might wish to make the following points when the discussions are resumed:

(a) You might draw attention to the fact that virtually no consideration appears to have been given to any method other than full admission to NATO. As long as this is the only method under discussion, the meetings might well not only continue to be inconclusive but they could also be harmful unless a way is found to reconcile the different points of view. It may be, for example, that if consideration were given to the possibility of a Mediterranean pact, it would become apparent for a variety of reasons that such a pact would be unsatisfactory to most of the countries concerned. Full admission to NATO would then become much easier to accept for those countries which cannot see their way clear at this stage openly to accepting the United States recommendation.

(b) The point raised by Alphand with respect to the attitude of the Government of Turkey to the location of NATO bases on its territory raises an important issue and no considered progress can be made until it has been solved. It is hoped that the Standing Group's military appreciation will deal with this and related problems.

(c) You point out in paragraph 10 of your telegram No. 1526 that the United Kingdom and United States contend that the inclusion of Greece and Turkey would not substantially affect present NATO financial and economic arrangements. It seems to us that the financial implications of such a move cannot be accurately assessed until the proposed military programme for those two countries is worked out in some detail. We presume that the problem of infrastructure will apply in proportion to the use which NATO forces will wish to make of Greek and Turkish territories.

(d) You might let the Deputies know that it is now certain that parliamentary approval would be required in Canada if it should be decided that Greece and Turkey should be accepted as full members of NATO. Parliamentary approval would probably take the form of the submission of a resolution to both Houses of Parliament. It would be impossible to obtain such approval before the late autumn when Parliament next assembles. (The session is to begin October 9).

4. You may already be aware that the Standing Group has asked the Military Representatives Committee to obtain their countries' comments on D-D(51)142.† This questionnaire was therefore submitted to our Chiefs of Staff for their comments. A copy† of their reply is being sent to you for your own information together with this Department's comments. Ends.

RELATIONSHIP OF GREECE AND TURKEY TO NATO

A further general discussion took place on various possible methods by which Greece and Turkey might be linked with western defence.

Extension of Existing Bilateral Arrangement

2. The French acting deputy pointed out that with reference to the Anglo-French Turkish agreement, the principal difficulty was that the obligation was not reciprocal. Thus these existing bilateral agreements were inadequate to accomplish the central task of linking Greece and Turkey in adequate defence arrangements with the western powers.

3. The United States deputy explained that the view of his government was that a United States guarantee to Greece and Turkey through bilateral arrangements would run counter to the basic United States policy which has been developing in recent years, in which the emphasis is placed on regional collective security arrangements. The United States administration would be most reluctant to modify this existing policy in the direction of bilateral arrangements, which would be out of line with the broad lines of the United States approach to security questions. In addition Spofford thought that both the Greek and Turkish Governments would prefer a collective, rather than a bilateral guarantee. The United States authorities did not think the solution of the present problem could be found either in the extension of existing bilateral arrangements on the lines of the Anglo-French Turkish Treaty, or by an additional supplementary bilateral guarantee by the United States.

In addition to the administration's preference for collective security arrangements, as opposed to bilateral arrangements, in the defence field, the attitude of Congress also had to be borne in mind, and on this point Spofford thought the extension of security arrangements through a bilateral guarantee would be far more difficult to obtain than a regional arrangement.

4. Hoyer Millar made the observation that from the practical point of view the difference between extending bilateral arrangements and including Greece and Turkey in NATO was perhaps more apparent than real. In the event of a Soviet attack on Turkey the provisions of the Anglo-Turkish Treaty would come into play, and a Soviet attack on the United Kingdom could be anticipated, i.e., in effect it was difficult to imagine the possibility of an isolated attack on Greece and Turkey.

5. This gave rise to some general discussion of the nature of the obligation under Article V, and there was general agreement with the French acting deputy that even if Turkey were a full member of the North Atlantic Treaty, her belligerency in the event of an attack in the North Atlantic area need not necessarily be taken for granted. If Turkey were a full member of the treaty, and if it were considered that in the common interest Turkish neutrality was more advantageous at the outset than belligerency, this presumably could form the subject of prior consultation by Turkey and the other parties to the Treaty. Hoyer Millar added that while there was every disadvantage in having a neutralized Turkey, there might possibly be certain military advantages in a neutral Turkey (in somewhat the sense in which she was a "neutral" in the last war).

Regional Arrangements in the Eastern Mediterranean

6. Hoyer Millar said that the Foreign Office was in general agreement with the arguments set forth in paragraph 4 of the United States memorandum of May 21st against a Mediterranean pact. The possibility of a Mediterranean pact had not been given detailed or extensive study in the Foreign Office, principally because the defence problem with which we were faced had to be viewed in its short-term aspects, whereas the Mediterranean pact was a longer-term proposition. It should not be forgotten, for example, that Israel and Egypt were still technically in a state of war. In any event, conditions in the area did not provide a satisfactory basis for such a regional arrangement. It was clear from his remarks that the Foreign Office is particularly concerned about the dangers involved in placing Egypt in a central role. Spofford said that he had little to add to the views already expressed with regard to a Mediterranean pact in the original United States memorandum.

7. I made the comment that without having come to a firm decision at this stage as to the relative advantages or disadvantages of a Mediterranean or Middle Eastern pact, we should not dismiss the possibility that such a pact might have so real merits. The area of the eastern Mediterranean and Middle East was still in a fluid political state and it was difficult to foresee at this stage what might ultimately emerge. It was possible that some limited form of association for defence purposes might be developed in the area with a provision for subsequent accession by other countries as conditions changed. A regional arrangement of this limited character, which might, for example, embrace initially the great powers as well as Greece and Turkey, would only have to be submitted to the parliaments concerned rather than to the parliaments of all 12 NATO countries.

8. It was clear from the subsequent discussion that the Norwegian, Danish and Netherlands deputies felt that there was some merit in the idea of a more limited regional association in the eastern Mediterranean and Middle East in which the three great powers would participate, and that this might provide a possible alternative method of covering the position of Greece and Turkey.

9. The Italian deputy did not disagree that there might be some advantages in a Mediterranean pact, in which he indicated Italy would participate, but thought this was a long-term proposition which would not solve the immediate problem of NATO defence.

10. In this general discussion it was clear that neither the United Kingdom nor the French deputies were opposed in principle to the idea of a regional pact, but felt that the details of such a regional arrangement might take a long time to work out in practice.

Extension of Present Arrangements for Associating Turkey with NATO Defence Planning

11. The Belgian acting deputy suggested that a fruitful approach to the problem would be to consider whether or not the arrangements worked out by the council at its last meeting might not be extended to provide in some way for associating Greece and Turkey more formally with the North Atlantic Treaty in respect only of its military provision. The details of this suggestion were not considered fully, but the Belgian representative thought an arrangement might be worked out to provide a juridical basis for associating Turkey only with the security provision of the treaty. Spofford raised the question as to whether this would not look like "a second class membership", but it was clear that this possibility would have to be further explored.

12. One further point of interest (arising out of the reports of discussions with the Turkish Ambassador referred to in my telegram No. 1510 of June 20th) was raised by Hoyer Millar, who said that in conversation with the Foreign Office the Turkish Ambassador in London, on June 21st, had clearly given an indication that he was aware of the general tenor of the discussions taking place in the Deputies. For example, with regard to the question of the establishment of NATO bases in Turkish territory which he understood had been raised by one of the deputies, the Turkish Ambassador had made it clear that if Turkey were to join NATO as a full member she would accept all obligations involved, including NATO bases on Turkish territory. Apart from this specific declaration of Turkey's intentions, a number of deputies expressed alarm at the fact that there had been a leak to the Turks on our current discussions, and it was agreed that each deputy should emphasize to his own government the importance of preserving the security of these talks.

13. Finally, the Norwegian and Netherlands deputies indicated that their governments had each received an official communication from the Turkish Government to the effect that speedy and unreserved action to approve the United States proposal would be taken as a token of friendly feelings towards Turkey.

14. The discussion on Greece and Turkey will continue on Tuesday morning.

Council Deputies Meeting July 5, 1951.

RELATIONSHIP OF GREECE AND TURKEY TO NATO

2. The Deputies consideration of this problem was considerably advanced today principally as the result of forthright statements made by the Norwegian and Danish Deputies outlining their governments views on the best method of associating Greece and Turkey with western defence. The Norwegian Deputy speaking on instructions said that his government recognized the just claim of Greece and Turkey to security and would welcome any suitable arrangement (which would clearly have to be developed within the framework of the principle of collective security) for meeting their defence needs. The Norwegian Government felt, however, that the method of full membership in NATO proposed by the United States was not the best possible solution. Indeed Bryn said that his government "could not be a party" to the solution proposed in the United States memorandum of May 21 which would change the whole basis of the North Atlantic Treaty. It was important to preserve the regional character of NATO, a point which Bryn said had been implied in the official United States reply to the request made by the Secretary-General of the United Nations as to the intentions of individual United Nations Governments under the "Uniting for Peace" resolution. Further, his government thought that the maintenance of the existing character of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization was a pre-requisite for the gradual development of that closer Atlantic union towards which many people in the North Atlantic area aspired. Bryn drew a parallel between the world-wide commitments of the Great Powers and the limited commitments of the other members of NATO, most of whom did not accept the Middle East as a direct defence responsibility. It was important not to undermine, by overextending the commitments of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, the public opinion within each NATO country which was a substantial source of the organization's strength. The Norwegian Government was fully cognizant of the importance of Greece and Turkey to the defence of the west but felt that the political disadvantages of full membership were overriding. As a consequence it was necessary to examine possible solutions other than full membership. The Standing Group had come to the conclusion that either full membership of NATO, or the inclusion of Greece and Turkey in a Mediterranean or Middle East pact, would be practicable solutions to the problem. The Norwegian Government hoped that early and careful consideration would be given to this latter possible solution. It would be well worthwhile exploring the extent to which a basis existed for a Mediterranean or Middle Eastern pact or defence arrangement including in its membership the three Great Powers and such other NATO or non-NATO countries as might be willing and able to participate in such a regional arrangement. It would clearly be of great importance to develop adequate measures by which such a regional pact might be linked with NATO for military planning purposes. The general problems of the scope of the pact and its character could, of course, only be worked out by the governments directly interested. Bryn concluded his Statement by urging that the Deputies should give serious consideration to this possible solution. In concluding he expressed the view that the question of the relationship of Greece and Turkey to NATO could only be finally dealt with by the Council itself.

3. The Danish Deputy followed Bryn in making a statement on behalf of his government on similar, though less effective, lines. He made it clear that the views of the Danish Government were not based upon any selfish fears that the inclusion of Greece and Turkey in NATO would mean the diversion of defence forces from Western Europe to the Eastern Mediterranean, pointing out that his government agreed that Greece and Turkey deserved material assistance and support in meeting their defence requirements. The hesitations of the Danish Government were due to the disadvantages which would follow from the extension of the NATO area beyond its natural boundaries. Here the Danish Deputy referred to the views which had recently been expressed by Mr. Pearson concerning the long-term goal of an Atlantic community of friendly nations united by a common culture and common traditions. His government felt that only military considerations of the greatest urgency would justify diverting attention from this goal and altering the present character of the pact. It was felt that the admission of Greece and Turkey to NATO would not necessarily prove a military advantage either to NATO or to Greece and Turkey themselves, and that the inclusion of Turkey would be regarded by the Soviet Union as an act of encirclement and would create increased international tension. The admission of Greece and Turkey would increase the obligations of the present members under Article 5 and there would be no advantages in committing Western European countries to the direct defence of the Middle East. Like Bryn, the Danish Deputy referred to the importance of ensuring the continued support of public opinion in our own countries. While he made it clear that his government had not yet taken final action on the views of the Standing Group, they agreed that the organization of the defence of the Middle East was a matter of urgent importance. At the same time they felt that the problem of the Middle East would not be solved simply by admitting Greece and Turkey to NATO. The Danish Government, therefore, hoped that the possibility of a Mediterranean or Middle East pact embracing the countries able and willing to join in the defence of the area could be given careful consideration.

4. These two statements, the texts of which are to be circulated, both made a considerable impression. Alphand made a most useful intervention to the effect that he had been greatly impressed by the two statements and that his government, while not yet in a position to take a final position, thought that a Mediterranean-Middle East pact was "a possible solution and perhaps preferable" to that proposed in the United States memorandum. His own view was that such a pact would go a long way to fit the facts of the position of Greece and Turkey and the security of the Middle East area. The question remaining, and it was one of real importance, was to find the means by which such a regional pact in the Middle East could be linked to the NATO command structure. This could presumably be done either by extending the present responsibilities of the Standing Group, or by reaching technical agreements between SHAPE and the command structure which might be established in the Middle East area. The final view of the French Government on the proposal put forward by the Norwegian Deputy would depend in large measure on the effectiveness of the arrangements which might be made to link the two regional systems.

5. Spofford agreed that the Norwegian and Danish statements should be given careful study but at the same time took the opportunity of making the point that the United States authorities had already looked at the question of a Mediterranean treaty and had raised the objections listed in paragraph 4 of the American memorandum of May 21.

6. The Belgian Deputy thought that it would be useful to establish the extent to which the Deputies were in broad agreement with the main conclusion of the Standing Group as set forth in S.G. 80/3,† i.e. that two solutions are militarily practicable. While most Deputies were without specific instructions, the general view expressed was that there was no substantial reason to differ from this broad conclusion reached in the Standing Group's paper.

7. As a result of the Norwegian and Netherlands statements, it may be assumed that the Deputies will now proceed to examine more fully the possibility of a Mediterranean or Middle East arrangement, linked in some way yet undefined with NATO.

8. Our discussion of Greece and Turkey was concluded with a reference by Spofford to one or two outstanding points on which he had recently received instructions. On the question of possible Soviet reactions to the conclusion of a security arrangement with Greece and Turkey, Spofford said that the United States view was that the Soviet Union was unlikely to precipitate a general war as an immediate result of a security arrangement associating Greece and Turkey with western defence. The most likely possibilities were the intensification of psychological warfare, coupled with political and economic pressure on the Near East area, and possibly diplomatic action in the United Nations and elsewhere.

9. Spofford also dealt with the three questions originally raised by Alphand (see paragraph 8 of my telegram No. 1510 of June 20). On the question of the attitude of the Turkish Government to the location of NATO bases on Turkish territory, he said that in the view of the United States authorities, Turkey would grant base rights on the same basis as other NATO members in the event of their admission to the organization. It was not, however, possible to forecast the nature or extent of the additional programme which might be required in Turkey. On the second question as to the pressure which might be brought to bear on Turkey by the Soviet Union, while no definitive answer was possible, the United States thinking was that the Soviet Union had for some time been aware of the present Turkish airfield programme and its transformation to a NATO basis would presumably not substantially modify their present attitude. In the event that an attempt at intimidation is made by the Soviet Union, possibly in the form of an ultimatum, the decision would reside, in the first instance, with Turkey which would have to decide what policy should be adopted in the circumstances. Spofford added that it might be necessary for NATO to give due recognition to the Turkish position as an immediate neighbour of the Soviet Union. Finally, on the question of the possible effects on the present defence programme in Turkey, the feeling was that there was no reason to assume that this programme would be retarded in any way.

10. At Alphand's suggestion it was agreed that great care should be taken in communicating with governments the substance of these United States views, particularly with reference to the possibilities of a Soviet protest.

RELATIONSHIP OF GREECE AND TURKEY TO NATO

1. We have been giving preliminary thought to the proposal of the Norwegian Government that the problem of associating Greece and Turkey with western defence should be explored on the basis of their inclusion in a regional security pact in the Mediterranean-Middle East area in which, initially, the three Standing Group powers, and Italy, would also participate.

2. Such a pact need not necessarily be envisaged as an exact replica of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization with its elaborate machinery of political, defence production, and financial and economic agencies which have been established. Its primary, indeed, sole raison d'être would be:

(a) To provide for the development of a workable military plan and the necessary force contributions for the defence of the area (the definition of the area would, of course, be primarily a matter for decision by the participants);

(b) To provide the necessary command structure for the defence of the area in which representatives of the participant states would participate; and

(c) At a subsequent stage to permit the accession of other states in the area, or other states prepared to contribute to the defence of the area, on some basis to be determined.

3. As Mr. Alphand pointed out the important point will be to make adequate arrangements to link such a regional structure with NATO. In our view this could be done through the Standing Group whose members would wear "two hats". In one capacity they would be responsible for the direction of the higher strategy in NATO and in the other, in the Middle East area. We would envisage the Supreme Command in the area coming directly under the Standing Group as a parallel command to SHAPE.

4. It would presumably also be necessary to have a parallel agency to the Military Representatives Committee which would include representatives of the participant countries in the Middle East regional arrangement and which would meet with the Standing Group quite separately from the Military Representatives Committee of NATO. While the question of what type of political organization would also be required is, of course, one for the participant governments, presumably on the pattern of NATO, they would wish to establish some form of ministerial council to exercise political supervision over the regional military planning. As we see it, however, there would be no need for an elaborate defence production setup since this aspect could be dealt with through existing machinery. Possibly some supply board coming under the Supreme Command, Middle East, on the lines suggested during the recent meeting of Commonwealth Defence Ministers by the Southern Rhodesian Minister of Finance would be adequate to meet the regional requirements in this field.

5. Thus what would be required essentially would be a considerably abbreviated pact which would not require any provision on the lines of Article 2 of the North Atlantic Treaty, but which would deal entirely with the reciprocal security obligations of the signatories. The practical effect of such a regional defence arrangement in the Middle East area, in which the three Standing Group powers would participate, would be to widen the area of Article 6 of the North Atlantic Treaty. On military grounds, however, it seems that this wider commitment is inescapable whichever solution is finally adopted. The advantages of the solution of a regional arrangement in the Middle East area would seem to be that it would meet the security requirement and, at the same time, enable NATO to develop along the lines originally contemplated.

I am repeating this telegram to the Minister in Stockholm as No. 12.

RELATIONSHIP OF GREECE AND TURKEY TO NATO

1. You will have noted that London telegram 1656† is by way of a response to the suggestion contained in paragraph 5 of your WA-2667 of June 28, 1951,† for suggestions as to any points which you might profitably talk over privately with the State Department, and that Wilgress is of the opinion that such a discussion might concentrate on the reasons why it should not be feasible to conclude a separate Mediterranean or Middle East pact as an alternative to the inclusion of Greece and Turkey as full members of NATO. Wilgress is evidently of the opinion (which is fully borne out by the account of the Deputies' latest discussion contained in his telegram 1661 of July 5) that the Norwegian, Danish and, to a lesser extent, French Governments are firmly opposed to the admission of Greece and Turkey to NATO as full members and that any further efforts to press forward with the United States proposal are likely to arouse lasting resentment among the existing members and render a unanimous decision on this issue impossible to achieve. For this reason and a number of others of a technical nature outlined in his telegram 1566, Wilgress is convinced that a Mediterranean or Middle East pact has many advantages over the United States proposal, and his telegram 1664 elaborates his personal views as to how such a pact might be brought into being.

2. If you can see no objection, we think that there might be some value as Wilgress suggests in having a private discussion with State Department officials of the possibilities of their re-examining the suggestion for a Mediterranean or Middle East pact. You might use as a starting point for such a discussion your wish to talk over privately with them the possible ways out of the stalemate which seems to have developed in the Deputies as a result of the firm opposition voiced by Norway and Denmark to admission of Greece and Turkey to NATO, a situation which the United States naturally could not have foreseen on May 21 when it analysed the advantages and disadvantages of a Mediterranean Pact and concluded that the latter outweighed the former. In short, a new situation has arisen which suggests a re-examination of this particular alternative which, incidentally, is one of the two feasible courses of action recommended by the Standing Group.

3. If the State Department is disposed to exchange views with you on this problem it might be well to use Wilgress' detailed suggestions with the utmost discretion as we wish to avoid at all costs the impression that anything in the nature of a "Canadian Plan" is being advocated. Although a solution along the lines of a Mediterranean or Middle East pact would suit our own requirements best in this instance, it would obviously be improper for Canada to sponsor actively a proposal which would involve commitments for others but not for us.

RELATIONSHIP OF GREECE AND TURKEY WITH NATO

1. In accordance with your suggestion, we had a further informal talk with Ridgway Knight, Acting Director of the European Regional Office at the State Department, on July 11, on the basis of the points outlined in your EX-1392.

2. We referred to the stalemate which has apparently developed in the Council Deputies as a result of the firm opposition expressed by Norway and Denmark (and, to a less extent, France), to the admission of Greece and Turkey to NATO, and invited informal discussion on the alternative scheme of a Mediterranean or Middle East pact, which had been suggested in the Council Deputies and had been mentioned by the Standing Group as a feasible course of action.

3. In reply, Ridgway Knight said that the reaction of the State Department would be that an exchange of views with us on this problem would, at the moment, be premature. The State Department was well aware of the firm opposition expressed by Norwegian and Danish Deputies. As a consequence, they would regard the first stage in the discussion of this problem in the Council Deputies as having been concluded and that a short period would now have to follow in which the governments concerned would have to reconsider the problem in the light of that discussion. Knight emphasized that he hoped this interval would be very short indeed. Consultations were currently going on in the State Department on what should be the next step and he was, therefore, not in a position to enter into any discussions with us.

4. He said that he would not like us to believe however that there was any indication that the United States Government would shift its position of favouring the outright admission of Greece and Turkey to NATO. They were prepared, of course, to reconsider the alternative course of a limited regional pact in the Mediterranean. He observed, however, that a limited regional pact in the Mediterranean was regarded by the United States authorities, both military and civil, as less desirable on balance than the extension of NATO to Greece and Turkey. He observed that the Standing Group had also regarded a Mediterranean pact as a less desirable alternative solution.

5. He recalled that the attitude of the United States Government proceeded from the assumption that the security and the defence of Western Europe, extending from Scandinavia to the Eastern Mediterranean, should be regarded as an indivisible unit. Any major attack by Soviet forces on any country in this area, including Turkey or Greece, would, in the opinion of the United States, start a general war. An important question which would have to be explored, was whether a separate Mediterranean security treaty would in fact ensure that Greece and Turkey would go to war in the event of a Soviet attack on Western Europe, including Scandinavia. It would seem from the position taken by the Scandinavian countries, Knight suggested, that these countries wish to have the assurance of Turkish and Greek assistance in the event of an attack on Western Europe, without accepting any parallel commitment themselves and would leave it to the United States and a select group of NATO countries to accept additional commitments in the Mediterranean area.

6. He indicated that he might be in a better position to discuss this matter further at the beginning or middle of next week when the United States position had been clarified. In the meantime, the discussion in the Council Deputies on this question, he understood, would be suspended.

7. Knight also offered a further clarification on the question of the attitude of the Turkish Government to the location of NATO bases on Turkish territory. Elaborating on what Spofford was reported to have said at the Council Deputies meeting of July 5, (according to telegram 1661 from London), Knight said that the Air Force bases now being established in Turkey are intended only to meet the requirements of the Turkish Air Force. The United States military authorities, he said, are not entirely satisfied that the present programme of bases is sufficient to meet the needs of Turkish defence. As to the possibility of United States requests for Turkish bases for the needs of the Strategic Air Command, Knight said that the possible requirements for this purpose have not yet been defined. The reference to possible Strategic Air Command requirements in the Standing Group paper referred to contemplated military needs, but this did not mean that the United States Government would necessarily expect the Turkish Government to grant these facilities. Indeed, he reiterated the point made to us previously, (as reported in WA-2667 of June 28†), that if the Turkish Government found it necessary to enter an express reservation (similar to the Norwegian) in adhering to NATO with regard to establishment of bases in peacetime, owing to the propinquity of the USSR to Turkey, the United States Government would respect that position and would not expect Turkey to provide bases, except those which would be necessary for the defence of Turkish territory.

RELATIONSHIP OF GREECE AND TURKEY WITH NATO

As you will be aware, for the reasons outlined in paragraph 1 of your telegram No. 1089 of June 27, our position throughout the discussion of this important issue in the Deputies had been a difficult and embarrassing one. Ample opportunity has been given to the Deputies to set forth their viewpoints on this issue, which is clearly of great concern to all the members of NATO, and with the exception of Iceland I think we are the only country which has not expressed a general view on substance of the possible solutions which have been envisaged.

2. While I recognize the difficulties involved on our side, and particularly the fact that assurances in general terms were given some time ago to the Greek and Turkish Governments, I cannot help but feel that on a matter of such major importance to NATO we must ourselves look at the whole question in the light of the arguments which have been presented for the two main solutions of full membership and a Mediterranean pact, on which at this stage it seems that the Deputies are likely to settle. The argument that we should not urge a solution which would involve direct commitments for others but not for Canada should not, I think, be given too much weight, since after all the solution, for example, of a Mediterranean pact would, in fact, extend Canada's defence commitments, since essential to such a solution will be the working out of the necessary links for mutual defence purposes with the NATO structure.

3. From the discussions so far you will have noted the fact that among our Western European partners the objections to the solution of full membership in NATO are strongly held, and it is most unlikely that there will be any shift in the positions of countries such as Norway and the Netherlands until the matter is discussed in the Council itself. In view of the fact that at the Council meetings we shall be required to take a stand on the alternative solutions, I think there is every reason to formulate our ideas as rapidly as possible, and to give some preliminary indication in the Deputies as to where we stand. So far as our assurances to the Greek and Turkish Governments are concerned, it was pointed out in your telegram No. 897 of May 28 that the statements made to their representatives in Ottawa leave us free to consider alternative forms of association of Greeks and Turks with western defence planning if, after examination of the considerations, this proves to be a more desirable solution than admission to NATO.

Your telegram No. 1782 of July 17, 1951 re Relations of Greece and Turkey to NATO.

Following from the Under-Secretary, Begins: We realize that throughout the discussion of this issue you have been placed in a difficult position as we have not been able to instruct you to make a clearcut and definite statement of Canadian policy. As it has not been possible for us to offer uncompromising opposition to the admission of Greece and Turkey and as we do not wish to put forward a "Canadian plan" for a solution of the problem (for reasons with which you are familiar) we have had to limit ourselves to asking you to endeavour to have all alternative courses fully examined.

2. Now that the United Kingdom has come out in favour of both countries being admitted to NATO, it is obviously going to be extremely difficult for the opponents of admission to make their viewpoint prevail. Our latest information is that the United Kingdom proposal (presumably the same as that outlined in your telegram No. 1681 of July 9, 1951†) has already been agreed to by both the United States and Turkey. It would obviously be unrealistic to disregard the powerful influence which this agreement between the three powers most directly concerned will exercise over the final decision.

3. In considering this problem, we have had to bear in mind certain fundamental questions. For example, would the admission of these two countries extend Canada's commitments? In form no doubt it will do so but in reality we cannot escape the conclusion that Canada and NATO as a whole would be involved almost certainly in the event of an attack on Turkey and probably in the event of an attack on Greece, whether these countries were members of NATO or of a Mediterranean pact or, in all probability, if they had no treaty obligations at all with the Western Powers beyond those which exist at present. In the second place, would the admission of Greece and Turkey to NATO be considered by the Soviet Union more provocative than their adhesion to some form of Mediterranean Pact and thus increase the dangers of war? On the whole we think it unlikely that this distinction would be a determining factor with the USSR. Thirdly, will the admission of these two countries hamper the development of NATO in the direction of a North Atlantic Community? No doubt the inclusion of two countries so far removed geographically and in some respects politically and culturally from the North Atlantic Community may complicate such a development. On the other hand, if powerful forces, political and economic, once really begin to move in the direction of the creation of a North Atlantic Community, this process will hardly be arrested by the mere fact that certain countries which are unable or unwilling to participate in this development are co-signatories of the North Atlantic Treaty. Fourthly, would insistence on some other solution than NATO such as a Mediterranean Pact occasion a dangerous delay in making arrangements for the security of this exposed flank of the North Atlantic area? There seems to be general agreement that it would, in fact, take some time to work out a new pact and we are informed by our Embassy in Washington that this might touch off another great debate in the United States entailing a most undesirable re-examination of U.S. policy in Europe and the Middle East.

4. On the other hand, these very considerations indicate that the decision to admit Greece and Turkey is one of very far-reaching consequence for the whole future of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. Not the least important consequence is that it will constitute a precedent for extending membership further. We may certainly anticipate a request from the German Republic, perhaps even as part of the price of military contributions. Although the U.S. appears to have given to the U.K. assurances that it does not propose to have Franco Spain included in NATO, we may well be subject to "arm twisting" for the inclusion of Spain sooner or later. The question arises as to whether NATO is to become a conglomerate association of anti-communist nations or whether it is to retain its original character and purpose. It may well be that the issue of Greece and Turkey is already in fact decided, but we are inclined to think that care should be taken to avoid any formal recommendation by the Deputies. We think rather that the issue should simply be referred to the next Council meeting so as to enable members who have real doubts about the matter and who are reluctant to see the nature of the North Atlantic Treaty altered by inadvertence to go on record in the governing authority of the Treaty, not only as to their views on the admission of Greece and Turkey but on the larger issues involved. It might, indeed, prove useful to indicate "stop signs" at the Council meeting to avoid a repetition of the tactics used over Greece and Turkey.

5. Meanwhile, we continue for the reasons set out in our telegrams Nos 920 of May 31 and 1089 of June 28 to prefer a solution which does not involve the full membership of Greece and Turkey in NATO. One of the weaknesses of the Mediterranean Pact solution in the form in which it has been put forward by Norway, with the support of the Netherlands and Denmark, is that it has been lacking in sufficient details to warrant its being considered as a true alternative "proposal" At the moment it is simply a Norwegian suggestion for a great power Greek-Turk alignment with no indication of how this new grouping might be linked with NATO, a condition which the Standing Group clearly indicated as indispensable. In this connection the suggestion set forth in your telegram 1664 of July 6 might constitute a useful elaboration of detail lacking in the Norwegian proposal. Subject to the Minister's approval, we would have no objection to your making a statement along the lines of your telegram 1664 as a contribution to the current discussions. You might preface your remarks by referring to the Canadian Government's desire to have the alternative solution of a Mediterranean Pact thoroughly explored and indicating that the suggestions you are making are by way of an elaboration of the Norwegian-Netherlands proposals which appeared to have a good deal of merit in the light of the disadvantages of the proposal to admit the two countries to NATO as members. While we are anxious to go along with our friends the Netherlands, Norwegian and Belgians whose doubts about the admission of Greece and Turkey we share, we must not get ourselves into a false position by allowing them to believe that we could maintain a position of last-ditch resistance to the admission of Greece and Turkey.

6. You will, of course, discuss this subject fully with Mr. Pearson before making any substantial further contribution to the Deputies' discussion. The above represents our own departmental thinking to date. Ends.

COUNCIL DEPUTIES JULY 30. ASSOCIATION OF GREECE AND TURKEY WITH WESTERN DEFENCE

The Deputies agreed that the draft report of the Political Working Group (Document D-D(51)152 of July 27th,† a copy of which was sent to you by air bag) provided an objective summary of the discussion thus far, and the report was adopted without modification.

2. The Norwegian Deputy raised the question of whether parts of the report might be "be cosmicized" to permit their use subsequently, should the occasion arise, for purposes of parliamentary hearing, etc. It was generally agreed that this would be most undesirable, and that the cosmic character of the document should be maintained. Should it be necessary to make public certain conclusions relating to this problem, a more innocuous document could be prepared and cleared at a later date.

3. When the document itself had been approved I then made a brief statement of the Canadian attitude in the light of your telegram No. 1317 of July 24th.† The text of this statement, which had as its principal object to provide for a fuller exploration of the possible link which might be developed between a regional Mediterranean pact and NATO, had been cleared in advance with the Minister. Text is contained in my immediately following telegram.

4. The Norwegian Deputy also made a brief interim statement to the effect that the Norwegian Government would be most unsatisfied if the Council should attempt to decide on the problem of Greece and Turkey without considering it in relation to the problem of the command structure. It was recognized that the command problems were difficult, but it was also felt that any decision on Greece and Turkey without fuller clarification of plans for Mediterranean and Middle East commands would be a step "into the unknown". In the Norwegian Government's view, the two problems should be considered together, and it might well be necessary to put additional questions to the Standing Group. For this reason the Norwegian Government felt that it might be difficult, if not impossible, to have the Greek and Turkish problem ready for Council action by mid-September.

5. The United Kingdom Deputy said that he too had been instructed to press for an early decision on the related question of the command structure, since it was clearly not possible to judge on the political elements of the problem posed by the association of Greece and Turkey with western defence without clarification of the command structure. He reminded the Deputies that the Standing Group had been invited on June 17th to provide a progress report (D-D(51)171).† As was known, the United Kingdom had put forward certain proposals regarding command structure to the Standing Group, and he suggested that the chairman should remind the Standing Group of the importance of resolving the problem of the command structure and keeping the Deputies informed at as early a date as possible.

6. With regard to our general statement, Hoyer Millar said that the general thinking paralleled very closely the ideas which the United Kingdom had been formulating. We made it clear, however, that our proposals were based upon the assumption that it was possible and workable to develop a Mediterranean regional agreement, and to provide for a link through the Standing Group acting in a separate capacity, while the United Kingdom proposals, so far as we understood them, were based upon the principle that Greece and Turkey should be included in NATO.

7. There was general agreement with Hoyer Millar's view that the questions of the command structure and Greece and Turkey were inextricably linked together, and that therefore the Standing Group should be requested to provide information on the following points:

(i) The nature of the command structure in the Mediterranean Middle East area in the event that Greece and Turkey are included in NATO as full members;

(ii) The nature of the command structure in the case of a solution on the lines of a Mediterranean pact;

(iii) The nature of the link which would be required under (ii) between NATO and such a Mediterranean pact including Greece and Turkey.

8. It was agreed that the Standing Group should be furnished with a copy of the Political Working Group's draft report on Greece and Turkey and should be requested to provide replies to the foregoing questions for consideration by the Deputies not later than August 20th.

9. The French Deputy made a brief observation in which he stressed the interest which his government attached to exploring the alternative solutions provided for in the Political Working Group's report in the light of the Montreaux Convention, with a view to determining the precise legal obligations of Turkey vis-à-vis the convention in the event of closer association with the west for defence purposes.

TEXT OF STATEMENT MADE IN COUNCIL DEPUTIES

Following is text of statement made yesterday in Council Deputies, referred to in paragraph 3 of my telegram under reference. Text begins:

The report of the Working Group affords me an opportunity of making clear the position of the Canadian Government. Up to now we have not taken a definite stand on any of the various methods of associating Greece and Turkey with western defence because we have had an open mind with regard to all the possible methods and we wished to see each method thoroughly explored.

We now recognize, as the report makes clear, that there are only two practical methods of achieving the object we all have in view. Of these two alternative methods we have been inclined to favour the Mediterranean pact solution. This does not mean, however, that we would not accept the proposal for full membership of Greece and Turkey in NATO if that became clearly the most generally acceptable solution of the problem.

We recognize the advantages and the disadvantages of the two alternative methods as set forth in the report of the Working Group. The chief disadvantage we see in according Greece and Turkey full membership in NATO is that the inclusion of two countries so far removed geographically from what is usually associated with the concept of the North Atlantic area would complicate unfavourably the development of NATO in the direction of a North Atlantic community. We are anxious that NATO should not come to be regarded purely as a defensive alliance, and that the political, cultural, economic and social objectives of the treaty should be kept in mind as well as the military aspects. The chief disadvantage we see in the Mediterranean pact solution is the time it would take to give effect to this solution, and the public discussion which would ensue during the interval. On the other hand, we have been impressed by the arguments which have been put forward in favour of the Mediterranean pact solution. We feel however, that there is still a serious gap in the consideration we have given to this solution. Before we can consider the Mediterranean pact solution as having been fully explored more attention will have to be given to the link which would exist between the proposed pact and NATO. This gap in our consideration of the problem has been recognized by the Norwegian and other Deputies who have spoken on the subject, and my purpose in intervening in the discussion today is to endeavour to advance our consideration of this particular phase of the whole problem.

We recognize that each of the NATO countries and NATO as a whole would be involved almost certainly in the event of an attack on Turkey, and probably in the event of an attack on Greece, whether these countries were members of NATO or of a Mediterranean pact. This makes it essential that if there is to be a Mediterranean pact there should be a close link between that pact and NATO.

As we see it, a regional security pact in the Mediterranean Middle East area would be one in which the three Standing Group powers and Italy would participate as well as Greece and Turkey. Such a pact need not necessarily be envisaged as an exact replica of NATO with its elaborate machinery of political, defence production, and financial and economic agencies. Its primary, indeed sole, raison d'être would be

(a) To provide for the development of a workable military plan and the necessary force contributions for the defence of the area;

(b) To provide the necessary command structure for the defence of the area; and

(c) At a subsequent stage, to permit the accession of other states in the area or states outside the area prepared to contribute to its defence.

Needless to say, the definition of the area would be primarily a matter for decision by the participating states.

In our view the link between NATO and such a Mediterranean pact could be effected through the Standing Group. The members of the Standing Group in effect would wear "two hats". In one capacity they would be responsible for the direction of the higher strategy of NATO, and in the other capacity they would be responsible for the direction of the higher strategy in the Middle East area. We would envisage the Supreme Command in the Middle East area coming directly under the Standing Group as a parallel command to SHAPE.

It would presumably also be necessary to have a parallel agency to the Military Representatives Committee. This would include representatives of the countries participating in the Middle East regional arrangement, and would meet with the Standing Group quite separately from the Military Representative Committee of NATO. While the question of what type of political organization would also be required is, of course, one for the participating governments, we would assume that on the pattern of NATO they would wish to establish some form of Ministerial Council to exercise political supervision over the regional military planning. As we see it, however, there would be no need for an elaborate financial and economic or defence production set-up, since these aspects could be dealt with through existing machinery. Possibly, however, some supply board coming under the Supreme Commander Middle East would be adequate to meet the regional requirements in the supply field.

In other words, as we see the situation, what would be required essentially would be a considerably abbreviated pact which would not contain any provisions along the lines of Article 2 of the North Atlantic Treaty.[50] The proposed pact would deal entirely with the reciprocal security obligations of the signatory countries. The practical effect of such a regional defence arrangement in the Middle East area, in which the three Standing Group powers would participate, would be to widen the area of Article 6 of the North Atlantic Treaty, but on military grounds it seems that this wider commitment is inescapable whatever solution is finally adopted. The advantages of the solution by means of a regional arrangement in the Middle East area would be that it would meet the security requirements and at the same time enable NATO to develop along the lines originally contemplated. We believe that the practicability of such a solution will become more clear when we receive the details of the command arrangements for the Middle East area now under active consideration by the Standing Group.

Finally, we are of the view that the Deputies should refrain from taking a decision on this question but should advance the consideration of the whole problem sufficiently to enable the Ministers to come to a decision at the next meeting of the North Atlantic Council. Ends.

RELATIONSHIP OF GREECE AND TURKEY TO NATO

Following from Heeney, Begins: The question of the Canadian attitude on this issue was again discussed in Cabinet on August 8. In a brief review of the problem the Minister recalled that in the beginning it had been the Canadian Government's view that it was desirable to associate the two countries more closely with NATO but that it was preferable to achieve this either by some form of United States-United Kingdom-French guarantee or by the creation of some association of Mediterranean powers linked with NATO. The United States had, however, pressed strongly for according full membership, and all NATO countries with the exception of Canada and Norway now appeared to be prepared to fall in with United States wishes. Further controversy and delay would have most undesirable consequences. The Minister conceded that the granting of full membership would probably be exploited by the U.S.S.R. as a provocative move but thought that the possibility of their representing membership as encirclement was considerably reduced now that the United States had made it clear that the establishment of no NATO bases would be involved.

2. There was general agreement in Cabinet that if an aggression were launched against Greece and Turkey it would likely be met by a collective effort as in Korea, and that it was doubtful if Canada would be more involved through having Greece and Turkey in NATO than by the hard facts of the present world situation. It was, therefore, agreed that the Minister should be authorized to support the admission of the two countries to NATO when the matter comes up at the North Atlantic Council meeting.

3. We do not consider that there is any need for you to make a formal statement in the Deputies as you have already indicated that the Canadian Government will not oppose the admission of the two countries if there appears to be general agreement that that is the most desirable solution.

SECRET Ottawa, September 25, 1951

ACCESSION OF GREECE AND TURKEY TO NATO

Acting on the authority granted by Cabinet on August 8, Canada supported a resolution of the North Atlantic Council, unanimously adopted on September 20, recommending to the governments which are Parties to the North Atlantic Treaty:

(1) that pursuant to Article 10 of the Treaty each Government take whatever steps may be necessary to enable it to agree that the Kingdom of Greece and the Republic of Turkey be invited to accede to the North Atlantic Treaty, and thereupon notify its agreement to the United States of America;

(2) that thereafter Greece and Turkey shall become Parties to the Treaty upon the date of the deposit of their respective instruments of accession with the Government of the United States of America;

(3) that as from the date of the deposit with the Government of the United States of America by the Government of the Republic of Turkey of its instrument of accession, an appropriate modification of Article 6 of the Treaty shall enter into force.

2. The Resolution further recommended that these purposes be achieved and the requirements of the Treaty be met by bringing into force a Protocol in accordance with the procedure outlined above and that such a Protocol be signed as soon as possible by the members of the Council Deputies, duly authorized by their respective governments.

3. The North Atlantic Council also took note of a draft Protocol, prepared in the Council Deputies, which the Council Deputies propose to sign when duly authorized to do so by their respective governments.

4. The Resolution of the North Atlantic Council can therefore have no legal effect unless supplemented by the signing of the Protocol, which, when subsequently ratified by the twelve member states, will accomplish two things:

(a) It will authorize the United States Government, the depository under the Treaty of instruments of accession, to send the invitation to the Governments of Greece and Turkey;

(b) It will amend Article 6 of the Treaty upon the date that the Government of Turkey deposits its instrument of accession.

5. With respect to (a), Article III of the draft Protocol provides that the Protocol shall only come into force when each of the Parties to the North Atlantic Treaty has ratified its provisions. The Protocol was made subject to ratification in order to enable governments, if they so desire, to consult their Parliaments between the time of signature and the time of ratification. Since the authority to extend the invitation to the governments of Greece and Turkey is contained in Article I of the Protocol, the United States Government cannot send the invitation to the governments of Greece and Turkey until the Protocol has been signed and later ratified by each of the present Parties to the Treaty, including Canada. As the accession of the two countries is regarded by all Treaty members as urgent, the hope was expressed at the Conference just concluded that signature of the Protocol would take place in about two weeks' time (i.e., during the week ending October 6, 1951). As regards ratification, it seems likely, from the information given in Ottawa, that the other eleven member states will have ratified the Protocol by the end of November at the latest.

6. As regards (b) above, the main object of the proposed amendment to Article 6 of the Treaty is, of course, to bring into the territory in which the Treaty will be operative that part of Turkey which is in Asia. The present wording of Article 6 covers only "armed attack on the territory of any of the Parties in Europe or North America ..."

7. In addition, the United States and United Kingdom consider that, inasmuch as Article 6 must be amended to embrace the whole of Turkey, advantage should be taken at the same time of this opportunity to define more precisely the area and circumstances in which the provisions of the Treaty may be invoked. They therefore propose that two additional amendments be made to Article 6, having nothing to do with Turkish territory, as follows:

(1) to add to the forces protected by the Treaty, "forces, vessels or aircraft of any of the Parties, when in or over ... the Mediterranean Sea. ..." This amendment, proposed by the United Kingdom Government, is incorporated in Article II(ii) of the draft Protocol.

(2) To amend the phrase in the present Article 6 "occupation forces of any Party in Europe" to read "forces, vessels or aircraft of any of the Parties, when in or over ... any ... area in Europe in which occupation forces of any of the Parties were stationed on the date that the Treaty came into effect ..." This amendment, proposed by the United States Government, is to ensure that the forces of the Occupying Powers in Germany will continue to be protected by the North Atlantic Treaty after the forthcoming termination of their "occupation" status. If this amendment to Article 6 were not made now, it would have to be made later when the Occupation Statute is abolished. This amendment has also been incorporated in Article II(ii) of the draft Protocol.

8. The undersigned, therefore, recommends:

(a) that an Order-in-Council in accordance with the attached Submission to Council, be issued authorising Leolyn Dana Wilgress, the Canadian Deputy, to sign a Protocol substantially in the form of the draft Protocol noted by the North Atlantic Council on September 20, in accordance with the final paragraph of the Resolution adopted by the North Atlantic Council on September 20;[51] and

(b) that in accordance with the decision of the Cabinet on September 21, a Resolution be introduced to Parliament, as soon as possible after signature of the Protocol, approving the ratification of the Protocol by the Canadian Government.[52]

Memorandum from Acting Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to Prime Minister

TOP SECRET [Ottawa], December 5, 1951

As requested, I attach copies of the Resolution† approving the acceptance of the Protocol to the North Atlantic Treaty on the accession of Greece and Turkey, the texts of which Mr. Pearson has seen and approved for presentation to both Houses during the closing days of the current Session.

2. You will recall that on October 13 the Cabinet agreed that, because it was unlikely that the Protocol would receive United States senatorial approval before the next session of Congress in 1952, the Canadian Parliament should not be asked to approve the admission of Greece and Turkey to NATO until such time as the admission of the two countries had been approved by the United States, United Kingdom and France. On October 22 Mr. Pearson conveyed the substance of this decision to the House of Commons in the following words:

"This Protocol will be submitted to this Parliament for approval later before ratification by the Government. In this connection it might be desirable to postpone that discussion until we see what happens in regard to ratification in other countries which are even more directly concerned with this matter than we are — the United States, the United Kingdom and France".[53]

3. Subsequently it became apparent that to adhere strictly to this programme might place the Canadian Government in an awkward position. According to our information other NATO members with the exception of the United States will have ratified the Protocol by the end of this year and that the United States Government itself might be in a position to do so early in January, 1952, as the Senate, whose approval is first required, is scheduled to reconvene on or about January 8. As it would appear unlikely that the Canadian Parliament will be in session at that time, if the Protocol were not presented to it for approval until after the United States had taken action, Canada might find itself in the embarrassing position of delaying the invitation to Greece and Turkey. Mr. Pearson therefore considers it desirable to seek parliamentary approval in the closing days of the Session and hopes to be able to sponsor personally a Resolution along the attached lines immediately after his return to Canada, now scheduled for December 11 or 12. Having secured parliamentary approval, he would be in a position to withhold the formal act of ratification until it seemed appropriate.

4. When presenting the Resolution in the House, the Minister (if he is back in Ottawa in time to deal with this matter personally) intends to explain that parliamentary approval is being sought at this time in order to enable the Canadian Government to be in a position to concert its ratifying action with other North Atlantic governments and also to avoid being placed in the position of delaying the two countries' accession, on the desirability of which Canada and all other NATO countries were in agreement. He would conclude his introductory remarks by referring to his statement in the House on October 22 and explaining that the Canadian Government might not be acting immediately on the Resolution.

5. The United States Government has informally asked that we refrain from stating publicly Canada's intention not to ratify until the United States has done so.[54]

SECRET November 1, 1951

REVIEW OF THE OTTAWA MEETING
(THE SEVENTH SESSION) OF THE NORTH ATLANTIC COUNCIL

1. The Seventh Session of the North Atlantic Council meeting in Ottawa met from September 15-20, 1951. It is proposed in this paper to give a review, more or less impressionistic, of the Ottawa meeting and to attempt to link it up to recent and prospective NATO developments.

2. The Ottawa meetings differed substantially from previous Council meetings. In the first place, the Ottawa meeting was the first since the re-organization of the committee structure of NATO along the lines proposed by Canada that the three Ministerial Committees (Defence, Finance and Economic, and the then Council of Foreign Ministers) should be consolidated in one body, the Council. The advantages were apparent in the Ottawa meetings; the presence of Foreign, Defence and Finance Ministers, together with their respective advisers, on most delegations meant that the Council tended to be more in the nature of a meeting of governments than a meeting of delegates of governments. Although discussions on particular items tended to be monopolized by those Ministers who would normally deal with it in their respective governments, the fact that a Minister in most cases had two colleagues at hand for consultation tended to permit of more negotiation during the Council sessions, and also to give a Minister's statement in Council more the character of a matured governmental view. Although there were separate meetings of Defence Ministers, of Foreign Ministers, and of Finance Ministers on particular items, these were in the nature of sub-committees which reported back to Council, and any latent tendency towards re-establishing more or less autonomous bodies of Ministers along functional lines was successfully resisted.

3. In the second place, the Ottawa meeting was perhaps less a rubber-stamping exercise than several previous Council meetings. Although conclusions reached were generally in line with expectations before the meeting, decisions were taken only after due deliberation. Discussions on the whole were frank and there was little in the way of diplomatic doubletalk. On the other hand, the size of the audience of officials on occasion tended to inhibit discussion on certain of the more delicate issues, and "private" meetings of single Ministers with one or two advisers from each delegation were resorted to.

4. The main issues before the Council were: the admission of Greece and Turkey; discussion of the non-military aspects of NATO; and the establishment of procedures to speed up "closing the gap" in defence.

Greece and Turkey

5. As had been widely forecast, the Council did reach a unanimous decision to recommend the admission of Greece and Turkey, but not without prolonged discussion, and behind the Council doors, the decision did not seem such a foregone conclusion. Norway, Denmark and the Netherlands maintained their grave doubts, expressed previously in the Deputies, about the wisdom of offering Greece and Turkey full membership as the best method of associating them with North Atlantic defence. These countries, and others to a lesser degree, felt that, at least in the short-term, the association of Greece and Turkey in full membership might weaken the military security of Northern Europe by spreading thin our resources, and might tend to dilute the feeling of community of interest and background underlying the Treaty.

6. In presenting the Canadian point of view, Mr. Pearson expressed our sympathy and substantial agreement with the Danish and Norwegian positions. Canada has recognized the need for forging a closer link between Greece and Turkey and Western defence planning under NATO, but has been conscious of the possible effects which an extension of membership might have on the future of NATO. Canada therefore favoured a very careful examination of the alternative methods of associating Greece and Turkey with Western defence. Our caution was induced in part by the consideration that by setting a precedent for extending membership on military grounds alone, NATO might tend to become a purely military alliance with the result that its broader purposes might be lost sight of. Thus Canada, as the Minister said, would have preferred some non-NATO solution, but at the same time was not opposed to membership for Greece and Turkey if, after an examination of all the alternatives, this proved to be the most desirable solution.

7. It was, of course, clear that any solution other than full membership would be so politically embarrassing as to be impossible. Moreover, it would not meet the agreed views of the Standing Group based on military requirements. The United States and the United Kingdom, who among present NATO countries would have to carry the heaviest load, had committed themselves publicly in favour of membership; and the Turks and the Greeks had indicated that any other solution would be unacceptable.

8. Whether the Netherlands, Danish, and Norwegian governments really hoped to prevent the admission of Greece and Turkey is doubtful. The Danish representatives, however, held out to the last session. But there was evident dislike for the way the proposal had been handled, particularly by the United States which by announcing publicly at an early stage its support had prejudiced a free decision by other members. It was a good opportunity to hint to the United States that it should not happen again — although Spain was not mentioned, some delegates no doubt had in mind that Franco might be the next candidate. In reply to rather obvious remarks from Mr. Lange and others about press "leaks", Mr. Acheson made a disarming apology, and there the matter rested.

9. There were, however, real misgivings about the terms of admission, and in particular regarding the Standing Group proposal for establishing a Middle East Command which would include Turkey. These proposals were not put formally before the Council for consideration, since it was not proposed to include the Middle East in a NATO command structure. The issue was primarily military, but it could have a considerable bearing on the degree to which the Turks would, in fact, be committed under the Treaty. Those who objected to the Standing Group proposal felt that Turkey was being offered a special type of membership which assured it of all the advantages, but which might not carry with it all the obligations since Turkey would apparently have only a limited military commitment area. For this reason, the Danish Delegation took the position that command arrangements would have to be settled in a way to ensure that Greece and Turkey would have the same rights and the same obligations as other countries. Canada supported this view on the ground that although Turkey could not be expected to accept second class membership, it could not be granted preferred membership.

10. Mr. Stikker, speaking for the Netherlands, was most anxious that discussions regarding the command arrangements with Greece and Turkey (to be conducted by the U.S., the U.K. and France) should not take place without the knowledge of and consultation with other NATO members. Mr. Acheson, on the other hand, felt that the Turks should not be asked to accept an agreed plan in the formulation of which they played no part. Mr. Stikker persisted but the best he could do was to bow to the Chairman's compromise suggestion that political aspects of the command arrangements would "in due course" be discussed by the Deputies.

11. On the question of how the membership of Greece and Turkey would be brought about, the Americans had drafted a Protocol which they proposed should be signed by the existing members. After ratification, in accordance with the requirements of each country's legislative practice, Greece and Turkey would be invited. The Americans saw advantages in this procedure: uniform action would be taken by all members; and the Protocol would include the necessary amendments to the Treaty to provide for the extension of the territorial limits of the Treaty area.

12. The Italians, however, foresaw difficulties in their Parliament if a new document were presented for ratification. This would give the large Italian Communist opposition a full opportunity to discuss anew the whole North Atlantic Alliance, and for this reason the Italians favoured an interpretive resolution of the Council rather than a formal Protocol. Mr. Schuman shared the Italian misgivings about re-opening the question in the Chamber of Deputies but was prepared to support the proposal for a Protocol in view of the opinion of his legal advisers that a formal amendment was necessary. After some editorial changes a Protocol, substantially as drafted by the United States and by the Council, was later signed by the Deputies in London. Delays in ratification, notably by the United States Senate, will however make impossible the formal admission of Greece and Turkey until sometime in the new year. It remains to be seen whether some other formula can be found to permit their representatives to attend the Rome meeting, possibly as observers or as "members designate".

The North Atlantic Community — The Committee of Five

13. For some months before the Council meeting there were increasing indications of a growing interest in the non-military aspects of NATO. The Minister had encountered this interest in his discussions with the Foreign Ministers of Belgium, the Netherlands and Norway during his visit to Europe during the summer. Mr. Stikker in particular was concerned with the strain the defence burden was putting on European economies. Under his lead, OEEC produced a declaration late in the summer calling for increased production over the coming five-year period to enable the defence effort to be met without reduced standards of living, and it was anticipated that Mr. Stikker might press the Council to endorse this declaration or adopt a similar one. Moreover, the United States for the first time was showing a real interest in Article 2 of the Treaty, and discussions, on the initiative of United States officials, had taken place with Mr. Wilgress in London, with the Embassy in Washington, and with the Department in Ottawa.[55] On the initiative of the United States, an item was included in the agenda for the Council meeting in Ottawa.

14. In the negotiation of the Treaty, Canada had been primarily responsible for the inclusion of Article 2. We have felt, however, that defence must have priority over non-military aspects of NATO, and had tended to regard Article 2 as for the time being more in the nature of insurance against action which would prejudice the welfare or free institutions of the Treaty nations rather than as a point of departure for the development of a positive programme. The apparent desire of members to use Article 2 as a basis for a positive programme, however, altered the situation. A hasty exploration at the official level of possibilities failed to indicate any very concrete measures of co-operation which might be developed without tending to make the North Atlantic Community an exclusive entity. A multilateral trading area, for example, was clearly, from Canada's standpoint, preferable to a new North Atlantic preferential area, even if the latter could be attained without violating existing commercial agreements. Nevertheless the need to strengthen the non-military ties between North Atlantic nations was evident if member nations already feeling the burden of defence were not to lose heart. Canada was, therefore, disposed to welcome the proposal to explore the possibilities of developing NATO in its non-military aspects.

15. Early in the Council sessions a sub-committee to consider the problem was set up on a motion of Mr. Acheson. This sub-committee, of which Canada was a member, brought in a report recommending a continuing Ministerial committee of five (Canada, Belgium, the Netherlands, Norway, Italy) "to consider the further strengthening of the North Atlantic Community, and especially the implementation of Article 2 of the North Atlantic Treaty". In particular, it is to consider and make recommendations to the Council on (a) co-ordination and frequent consultation on foreign policy; (b) closer economic, financial and social co-operation; and (c) collaboration in the fields of culture and public information.

16. Mr. Pearson, as Chairman of the Council for the present year, will be Chairman of this Committee. Shortly after the Ottawa meeting a working group, under the chairmanship of Mr. A.F.W. Plumptre, Head of the Department's Economic Division, began meetings in London. The Committee was scheduled to meet in Paris before the opening of the General Assembly of the United Nations. A preliminary report of the committee is expected for the Rome meeting.

Gap Closing — Committee of Twelve

17. The immediate problem, however, still facing NATO is that of meeting the gap between military requirements under the medium-term plan and military availabilities. Various NATO bodies have been actively concerned with this problem: the Standing Group has been examining the problem from the standpoint of providing the forces required; the Defence Production Board has been concerned with the production and distribution of adequate military equipment and supplies; the Finance and Economic Board has been conducting an elaborate investigation on burden sharing, which presumably would be a useful guide for distribution of increased defence expenditure. A Working Party representing these various bodies had been set up by the Council Deputies to prepare for the Council meeting a preliminary report which would examine the problem as a whole.

18. It was apparent, however, that not much progress in actual gap-filling was resulting from these paper exercises. For one reason, various European countries were feeling the strain of existing defence burdens and it was evident that some governments, notably the United Kingdom and the French, were likely to send representatives to Ottawa with firm instructions to say that their peoples could do no more than they were doing. The United States Government made known to the Canadian Government, and presumably to all other NATO governments, in advance of the Ottawa meetings that it was prepared to recommend to Congress for 1952-53 and 1953-54 appropriations for mutual aid similar to that for the current year provided there was assurance that other European members would be prepared to meet the remainder of the gap. The implication was that a vigorous effort to attain this goal must be made by other governments. There was, however, a feeling in some quarters that the requirements laid down by the military authorities were perhaps unnecessarily high and might in some cases be reduced. It was apparent also that there was substantial unused capacity for production in Europe and it was possible that by better co-ordination of national procurement programmes more efficient use could be made of productive resources throughout the NATO area.

There was a feeling also in some quarters that certain governments were not honouring fully their existing commitments under the medium-term plan.

19. In the light of these circumstances, the United States Government before the NATO Council meeting informed the Canadian Government (and presumably other NATO governments) that it hoped that the Ottawa meeting would see fit to establish a special committee of distinguished persons enjoying the full confidence of their respective governments to prepare a special report for the next meeting of the Council after Ottawa recommending ways and means of filling the gap. The reports of the various NATO bodies presented in the Ottawa meeting afforded an opportunity to put forward this proposal. It was not, however, thrown into the Council meeting without "private" discussions beforehand of one or two Ministers from each delegation.

20. The original intentions of the United States Government appear to have been a committee of the "Big Three" with authority to make recommendations about further contributions to defence. Canadian representatives viewed this proposal with considerable apprehension. It was felt that an economic and financial "Standing Group" would be quite undesirable since other governments might be faced with programmes about which they had not been properly consulted. It was recognized of course that all NATO members might have to do more than they had so far promised, but it was felt that any additional burdens could only be accepted after appropriate negotiation. Other non-Standing Group members of NATO were generally of much the same view. After much discussion, largely in "private" sessions between the Ministers concerned, a Committee of Twelve was ultimately agreed upon. This committee was to elect a Chairman and one or more Vice-Chairmen who would together constitute an Executive Bureau. It was clearly understood that when the "Executive Bureau" was examining the defence programme of any member of NATO that member's representative would be present. Committee recommendations applying to any particular member would, therefore, likely have to have that member's prior concurrence. Moreover, the Committee was clearly labelled "temporary"; by inference, it was to be no financial and economic Standing Group.

21. The Committee was promptly appointed after the Ottawa meeting and has been meeting in Paris under the chairmanship of Mr. Harriman, the U.S. representative, Mr. Abbott is the Canadian member. Other governments for the most part are represented by their Finance Ministers. It has called for statistical reports on economics and finance from each member as well as reports on military programmes. Its procedure is to examine each report in the presence of the representative of the country concerned. After examination of the report it is anticipated that there will be a stage of negotiation on each country's defence programme between the Executive Bureau and the Committee member of that country. It is hoped that the Committee's report will be available for the Rome meeting.

22. In some respects, the Ottawa meeting marked a change in emphasis from long-range planning to consideration of immediate readiness to meet armed aggression. The lead was taken by Mr. Shinwell in the Session in which reports were being made on national defence programmes. Mr. Shinwell pointed to the fact that while members were concerned, and rightly so, with programmes under the medium-term plan, there was no very clear indication of the readiness of NATO members to meet aggression, either singly or collectively, in the present or immediate future. He therefore asked his colleagues for a firm and detailed statement as to existing effectives, training programmes, and readiness for battle. Mr. Shinwell proposed a private session of defence ministers in which these could speak frankly to one another — Mr. Shinwell it was noticed could not avoid looking across the table at his French colleague as he said this. After a preliminary discussion, Mr. Shinwell's request was granted but with no very great increase in frankness in discussion. From the meeting, however, there emerged a directive to the Military Committee to prepare for the next meeting of Council an estimate of the relative strengths and capabilities of NATO forces and Soviet bloc forces, in being and in the immediate future. The Council Deputies were requested to provide a similar estimate on industrial and economic resources, and the Defence Production Board was directed to keep careful note of arms contracts actually placed. This shift in emphasis does not of course lessen need for meeting future requirements under the medium-term plan. It does, however, represent a shift from consideration of paper programmes to consideration as well of actual readiness to resist aggression.

Miscellaneous

23. Three other matters of substantial importance discussed by Council are worth noting: the German contribution to Western defence; the organization of the military side of NATO; and infrastructure.

24. As had been expected the Big Three reported on the progress they had made in their tripartite discussions in Washington on the German situation. The Council received official word that the Occupation Statute would be replaced by an equitable contract to give greater autonomy to Germany. On the question of the European Army, Mr. Schuman announced that the Pleven Plan had been accepted in principle by the Germans and he hoped would shortly become a reality. Mr. Acheson gave full United States support to the Plan, as did Mr. Morrison for the United Kingdom, and the hope was expressed that the question of German contributions to Western defence could now be settled at the Rome meeting of the Council.

25. At the time of the re-organization of the Council, the re-organization of the military side was left over for consideration by the military authorities. It was Canada's view, as expressed in the Canadian paper which began consideration of Council re-organization, that effective authority on the military side should be vested in the Military Committee which is, in fact, a Committee of the Chiefs of Staff of the member nations. It was felt further that the Military Representatives Committee should be in effect a Chiefs of Staff Deputies' Committee which would be constantly in session or available for consultation by the Standing Group. It followed as a corollary that any advice on military matters that might be sought by the Council Deputies would be given by the Military Committee, or the Military Representatives Committee, rather than by the Standing Group. It was hoped too that the Standing Group would develop any new proposals affecting member nations by appropriate consultation at the working level with the country or countries concerned so that member nations not on the Standing Group would not be presented with plans listing for them military requirements about which they had not been consulted. On this point, Mr. Claxton took occasion to hint broadly to Council that the Canadian Government was not entirely happy about the existing practice of the Standing Group. The question of military re-organization was discussed at some length in the Council. The final result was that the Military Committee was instructed to comment at the Rome meeting on proposals already made for the re-organization of the NATO military structure.

26. With regard to infrastructure, that is fixed defence facilities in Western Europe for common use, discussion on financial arrangements had been almost deadlocked for months, the United States urging financing on the "user" principle, and the United Kingdom on the principle of "capacity to pay". At Ottawa an agreement was reached with regard to financing the "second slice", that is airfields and communication facilities on which construction is to begin in 1951. The plan agreed to provides for contributions on a more or less arbitrary basis. Canada supported this plan, which did not require very substantial increases in Canada's contribution over the figure already approved by Cabinet as an appropriate Canadian contribution. However, the plan was declared to be without precedent for later "slices" of infrastructure.[56]

Publicity

27. Publicity, as usual in international conferences of a secret nature, proved to be a difficult problem. At the first closed session of the Council, the President suggested that the agenda might be made public and the press might be kept informed, presumably through the procedure of press conferences by the Secretariat and the Chairman, as fully as possible of the day-to-day progress of the meetings. He hoped thereby to do some useful propaganda work for the Organization and to satisfy the swarm of reporters who had gathered in Ottawa. Mr. Acheson took the line that the confidential nature of the meetings should be preserved as fully as possible and that in consequence information to the press should be confined to a final communiqué. He was specifically against publication of the agenda. These views temporarily prevailed. The next day, however, the agenda appeared in the New York Times, almost comma for comma. The NATO Secretariat, particularly the Information Service, it is understood, took up the cause of the press, and the result was a change in policy to permit daily briefing sessions by an Information Officer. These were very well done, and the Press seemed reasonably satisfied. All delegations apparently also held briefing sessions from time to time.

28. The result was that the press got perhaps an undue amount of information of a highly classified nature. However, public knowledge and support of NATO is imperative, and there was probably more good than harm from these developments. Be that as it may, at the last session there were some candid observations on publicity and the Deputies were directed to prepare publicity rules for the guidance of future meetings. The problem is twofold: that of preventing the leakage of information which might endanger military security, and that of providing sufficient publicity to secure public support of NATO and of the defence budgets which the achievement of adequate defence entails. This suggests that the problem might better be solved by a re-classification of the subject matter of the agenda rather than by vain attempts to tighten security on everything.

[56] La contribution du Canada, que le Cabinet a notée avec approbation, le 3 octobre 1951, s'élevait à 3 500 000 £.
Canada's contribution, which Cabinet noted with approval on October 3, 1951, totalled £3,500,000.

Administrative Arrangements

29. Something should be said about the administrative arrangements. This was the largest and most important international conference ever held in Canada, and everything was done to assure efficiency and convenience. Without question, the facilities provided were the most adequate, and the arrangements the most satisfactory for any NATO Council meeting to date. Parliament was not sitting so it was possible to use the Centre Block for meetings and members' rooms for office space for the delegations. The public opening meeting was held in the Commons' Chamber, and the closed sessions in the Railway Committee Room. NATO security regulations and practices are very elaborate, perhaps unduly so, but there was little choice in the matter. Security regulations were accordingly strict, and security guards in smart Service uniforms were everywhere. If the press found cause for merrymaking, the visiting delegations were most favourably impressed. A loudspeaker system, with arrangements for consecutive translation, was set up in advance, but on the first day it became clear that if the agenda was to be completed on time, simultaneous translation facilities, which had not been the rule at NATO meetings, were required. The Army accordingly arranged to install a simultaneous translation system over the weekend. Equipment was picked up at various defence stations across Canada, or borrowed from local radio stations. When the Council reconvened on Monday morning, the system was ready for use. This contributed enormously to speeding up proceedings, and it evoked enthusiastic compliments from the visitors who were most generous in their approval of all the arrangements.

Future Meetings

30. The Council agreed that more frequent and more regular meetings of Council was desirable. It was understood that the next meeting would be in Rome, in accordance with the wishes of the Italian Government. Although no date was set, it was generally agreed that a meeting before the General Assembly of the United Nations in Paris was desirable. It subsequently developed that the Committee of Twelve would be unable to complete a report this early, and a decision was finally taken to hold the next Council meeting November 24.

Note du chef de la Direction économique pour le Comité sur les aspects économiques des questions de la défense

Memorandum from Head, Economic Division, to Panel on Economic Aspects of Defence Questions

CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa], August 31, 1951

THE NORTH ATLANTIC COMMUNITY — ECONOMIC IMPLICATIONS

1. In a sense, the North Atlantic Economic Community already exists. The North Atlantic countries are tied together by age-old ties of trade and finance. Something like 80% of the world's trade takes place within this community. North Atlantic countries, which are entirely independent politically, are completely interdependent economically. This does not mean, however, that the situation of each country or of the group can be improved by putting a fence of trade preferences around the area. On the other hand, it may be improved if trade barriers within and around and beyond the North Atlantic area can be further reduced, especially the barriers that separate the "soft" currency countries from the "hard". This reduction would bring further "integration" of the free world trading area, and more especially of the North Atlantic area which is by far its largest element. But this integration is easier said than done for it involves far-reaching changes in industry and trade which are difficult enough for the countries that are strong, economically and politically, but raise almost insuperable problems for the weaker ones who look for strength and support to the stronger. This paper deals with the difficulties and possibilities of further integration of the North Atlantic countries.

I. North Atlantic Concept — Competition with other Economic Concepts

2. People promoting the concept of a North Atlantic economic community find that their ideas must compete with other concepts. These others are embodied in "going concerns"; they are older and they have deeper roots:

(a) European Economic Unity. This concept is chiefly embodied in OEEC, but it is surrounded and buttressed economically, politically and militarily by such concepts as the Council of Europe, the European Army, the Schuman Plan, the Pflimlin Plan, etc. The idea of European unity is fairly new, at least in its modern dress, but it is gathering disciples in some parts of the Continent.

(b) The British Commonwealth and the Sterling Area. This community is tied together economically by Imperial Preference, fairly free movement of capital, use of London as a financial centre, and the special ties of the wartime accumulation of sterling balances. It has deep emotional and political roots.

(c) The Free World Trading Area. Most of the important trading countries in the Free World (plus Czechoslovakia by historical accident) are members of the GATT, and also of the Fund, and have made undertakings to each other to eliminate discrimination and promote multilateral trade and payments as far as they can. The concept of a Free World Trading Area is founded on the fundamental principles of liberalism. Under these principles, members of GATT can welcome increasing trade not only with each other but with less favoured nations and (at least in non-strategic goods) with countries beyond the Curtain.

II. Canadian Economic Policy Since World War II

3. The weight of Canadian support has been thrown towards (c) - the Free World Trading Area. With our worldwide trading interests, combined with sources of economic strength that are second only to those of the United States, we have promoted freedom of trade and exchange. We have had little to risk and almost everything to gain. Our expeditions into bilateralism have not ended up very successfully (e.g. agricultural contracts with U.K.); restrictions against U.S. imports proved most unpopular; free multilateral trade suits us politically and economically.

4. Any proposal to establish a new economic grouping of North Atlantic countries which would give special preferences or other commercial benefits to each other, while withholding them from the rest of the free world, would not be likely to get a warm welcome in Ottawa. Recent policy towards existing Imperial Preferences is, not to toss them away, but to keep those that serve some special purpose and to bargain the rest away in multilateral tariff negotiations.

5. We have urged our multilateral ideas on others — in the Commonwealth and in OEEC. Admittedly many other countries have need of import controls to protect their reserves and trade balances; nevertheless, we have hammered away against the protectionism which leads to maintenance of import restrictions (against Canadian goods) beyond what can be justified on balance-of-payments grounds. This is pure GATT and Fund doctrine; we have preached it in many pulpits.

6. We have not railed blindly against all import quotas and embargoes that hurt our exports but we have supported those people, in OEEC and the Commonwealth, who regard special preferences and special protections as temporary supports for economic activities that can be strengthened rather than permanent props for fundamentally unsound positions. Our emphasis has always been on the ultimate reduction and elimination of discrimination and restriction. This should be to the long-run advantage of the countries and areas concerned; protection breeds monopoly, inefficiency, sloth and decay. And we have practiced what we have preached. Although we were forced to put up a fence of import restrictions in 1947 we tore it down — despite the protests of those interests that it favoured — as soon as our gold and dollar reserves got back to a healthy level.

III. Present Position and Prospects of the Commonwealth, European Integration and the North Atlantic Economic Community

7. What is happening in the preferential areas? Are they succeeding or failing? Consolidating or falling apart?

8. Commonwealth Preferences were probably never more popular in the United Kingdom than they are today. Perhaps it is a measure of the economic weakness of the United Kingdom and its unwillingness to face North American competition. There is also some anti-Americanism mixed in. The same attitude exists to a lesser extent in other Commonwealth countries, except Canada (and there could be a revival of it here if, regardless of GATT, the United States goes on restricting imports from Canada such as cheese and dried milk). In short, the Commonwealth and Sterling Area is certainly not dead. Frequent ministerial conferences are designed to keep it alive; ministers concerned with finance, supply and even the Colombo Plan.

9. European economic integration does not seem to be as healthy. After a quick and promising start, clearing away a part of the postwar underbrush of quotas and bans, it ran into the tall timbers of strong national and commercial vested interests. Then it slowed down quickly. When, last year, the "trade liberalization" programme bogged down new outlets were sought for the urge towards European economic unity:

(a) the working-party set up under GATT to explore possibilities of reducing the higher European tariffs (France and Italy) without equivalent reductions by the lower-tariff countries, assisted perhaps by some tariff concessions by North America;

(b) the so-called "sector approach", which would reduce European trade barriers in certain specific fields such as iron and steel (Schuman Plan) or agriculture (Pflimlin Plan) but which is open to the ever-present danger of protective cartel arrangements in these fields;

(c) international financial arrangements to facilitate expansion of industries that are economical and desirable from a European standpoint, and to alleviate the impact of the necessary contraction of other industries (the Pella, Petsch and Stikker Plans).

However, with the exception of the Schuman Plan which for political and military reasons has made good progress at least on paper, none of these programmes seem to be meeting with much success.

10. The European Payments Union (EPU) has proved to be a useful piece of machinery. It provides for multilateral settlement of trade balances within Europe and thereby reduces the dependence of European countries on bilateral trade-and-payments arrangements. During the last six months, when Western Germany was in special difficulties, it arranged temporary credits to finance German imports and thereby averted the possibility of a trade war on the Continent. But, unless the United States continues to pour new funds into it, its strength and scope are limited. It is even feeling some strain because it is being called upon to bear a part of the very limited burden arising from the Benelux integration movement. As a result of reduction of trade barriers, the Netherlands has a deficit with Belgium. This is being financed by EPU. Belgium, instead of being forced to grant bilateral credits to finance its exports to the Netherlands, is persistently getting paid in gold by EPU, and people are beginning to wonder how long Belgium (or Benelux) can be kept inside the EPU.

11. We may conclude that "integration" can make some progress in Europe, despite vested interests, if it is quite limited in scope and if someone comes in from outside and picks up the chips. Benelux can go ahead up to a point if EPU picks up the chips; European integration can go ahead up to a point if ECA picks up the chips or if North America can offer some other incentive such as unilateral tariff reductions.

12. If we widen our vision from the European area, and take in the whole North Atlantic area, a number of conclusions seem to emerge;

(a) A North Atlantic Preference Area, with all members substantially reducing trade barriers against each other but retaining existing barriers against the rest of the world, is completely impossible — politically, financially and economically. It clashes head-on with the Commonwealth and Sterling area and with European unity. Already the chips to be picked up by the United States as a result of a mild measure of European integration have proved pretty expensive; the chips to be picked up in Europe as a result of wholesale reductions of European barriers against North American competition would be enormous. Congress (let alone the Canadian parliament) would not pay the price even if European governments would accept it, and a host of European interests would be up in arms with their very lives at stake. Finally a North Atlantic Preference area would split the Free World in two: the North Atlantic countries on the one hand and all the rest on the other.

(b) The reduction of North American tariffs and other import barriers has helped and can help other North Atlantic countries as well as the rest of the free world. Since the most vexed tariff issues in the world are located in Europe, North American concessions designed to help in solving these issues would help to bind the North Atlantic area together economically.

(c) The most tangible evidence of a North Atlantic economic community is now, and is likely to continue to be, the provision of direct aid across the Atlantic and, to a lesser extent, amongst the European countries: United States aid under ECA or Mutual Assistance; Canadian mutual aid; similar aid from the United Kingdom to Continental Countries and so forth.

(d) In the past aid of this sort (under Lend Lease as well as ECA) has been used by the United States as a lever to get European countries to lower their trade barriers against each other and the rest of the world. This sort of pressure can and should continue.

(e) From now on North American aid to Europe will be largely military. Whatever international aid is forthcoming for economic development from the United States, Canada, and other countries, is almost sure to go to the "underdeveloped countries". This will strengthen the free world, and alleviate burdens that might otherwise have to be carried by the old Colonial Powers, but it will not contribute in any direct way to a North Atlantic economic community.

(f) A "community" based on "aid" which, although it is called "mutual" always appears to flow in one direction, is likely to breed squabbles within itself. The rich-relation poor-relation relationship hangs over it.

13. In short, it would probably be a mistake to try to force the further growth and integration of the economic community by any sort of purely economic discrimination amongst NATO countries and against the outside world. One might almost say, judging from nineteenth-century experience, that if the North Atlantic Treaty is a success in paving the way towards more peaceable world conditions, politically and militarily, the economic community of the North Atlantic will grow and flourish as it did a century ago when the international movement of men and money and goods was much more free than today. However, peace seems unlikely to break out suddenly and it is the special problems of cold war and hot peace that are the most pressing. In the economic field these problems consist of emergency shortages of materials, emergency government controls, and uneven impact of the burdens of defence. Some of these problems, notably material shortages, can only be approached on a world-wide basis, such as the International Materials Conference; but even in the field of materials there appears to be an obligation on NATO members, quite outside IMC, to make sure that urgent defence production is not held up because of particular shortages at particular times and places. Thus, the role of NATO in promoting the development of the North Atlantic Economic Community seems to lie in the following fields:

(a) reviewing the aid provided by some NATO countries to others in the light of the general position and weight of defence burdens;

(b) associating this aid with continuing pressure to reduce all sorts of trade barriers, but such reduction to be as far as possible on a most-favoured-nation basis and as little as possible on any preferential basis;

(c) minimizing the harm which the emergency controls in one NATO country do to the others;

(d) arranging, if necessary, for particular help from one NATO country to another, in the fields of materials, techniques, manpower, etc., if thereby the production of urgently needed arms can be increased.

14. The important thing is, not to expect some new sort of North Atlantic Economic Community to spring full-growth from a few North Atlantic Council meetings, but to realize that economic structures grow gradually like coral-reefs or anthills. They are produced, in our relatively free world, not so much by legislation as by the constant economic intercourse of private businessmen and financiers. The fact that people of various countries — bureaucrats and businessmen — work together for defence and for political objectives lays in itself both a political and economic basis for further "economic integration" — i.e. for further trade and finance.

IV. Comments on Some Recent Proposals and Problems

(a) NATO vs. OEEC

15. We have seen that, for some time to come, military aid is almost sure to be at the heart of whatever may be called a North Atlantic Economic Community, and that there may be a good deal to be done, during the period of rapid rearmament, in eliminating conflicts over shortages of materials, over the impact of emergency controls, over burden-sharing, etc. As far as NATO is concerned, these matters are now focused in the Financial and Economic Board in Paris. Similar, often identical problems, connected with the European Recovery Programme, were focused in OEEC.

16. Unhappily, for various reasons some of which are obscure, FEB and OEEC have not yet settled down together. The "larger" and "smaller" circles, hopefully forecast, have so far been tangential instead of concentric. The membership is so nearly the same — especially if West Germany comes into NATO — that it is most unsatisfactory for them to live beside each other in splendid isolation. From the Canadian point of view it would seem desirable that NATO (FEB), with its broader and more immediate concerns, should, at least during the period of rapid rearmament, largely take over the staff and activities of OEEC, with its limited objectives of European cooperation and integration. If this could be done, at least on a temporary basis, and without too much damage or offence to aspirations for European unity, much would be gained. Canadian representatives have a much stronger status in NATO than in OEEC and have always been worried by the possible Little-European tendencies within the latter organization. With ECA aid dwindling and Mutual Security aid increasing, the American influence in FEB is likely to be stronger than in OEEC, and this influence may, in the last analysis, be counted on to resist Little-Europeanism.

17. However, we must not press for NATO to bite off a part of OEEC, even temporarily, without realizing some possible consequences. Canada, which has hitherto been merely an observer of the processes of European integration, may become a full participant in an organization which not merely calls the tune of trade liberalization, on the Continent and across the Atlantic, but which also has to pay the piper. In one way or another some of the costs and burdens of trade readjustment would fall on Canada — whether through financial contributions or tariff reductions. Further, we must not forget that OEEC is the leading symbol of European economic unity and any new growth which seems to put it in the shade will call forth most vigorous opposition.

18. Against these difficulties and disadvantages must be weighed not only the gain to NATO of a greatly improved staff in Paris but, in the long run more important, the advantages of economic integration extended over a wider area and on a firmer economic foundation. In a nut-shell, the costs to be met may be the price which we have to pay, and which we shall want to pay, for more permanent markets for Canadian goods in Europe and for a Canadian seat at a council table where European as well as North Atlantic issues are being thrashed out.

(b) Stikker's "Phasing" Announcement

19. Mr. Stikker proposes to announce that, after 1954, Europe can hope to resume more rapid progress towards higher living standards, with 1946-50 as the reconstruction period and 1950-54 the rearmament period. This announcement would have political advantages at the present time, even though it gives hostages to the future and to Mr. Stalin. However, it is most desirable that any statement about the "progress" phase, which is the pie-in-the-sky, should be carefully thought out.

20. It should not be in terms of a "little OEEC" or consolidation of Europe. If possible it should be in terms of an Atlantic Community within the framework of freer trade in the free world. The emphasis should be against protection and restraints, whether between NATO countries or around their circumference, and towards supporting (indirectly) the GATT and the Fund rather than undermining them. References, if any, to OEEC Schuman and Pflimlin Plans should be as steps towards the broader strengthening of the free world. NATO is in a military sense the nucleus of the free world; but if a nucleus is to remain nuclear it must not do anything to cut itself off from the rest of the structure.

(c) Proposals for Financial [Plans] Devised to Promote Arms Production in Europe

21. During the past year NATO representatives of several European countries have noted that there were industrial plants in Europe available to make arms and have proposed various financial schemes to bring them into production. A recent survey of unemployed arms capacity, carried out by the Defence Production Board, has given new life to old ideas, particularly to those advanced by Mr. Van Zeeland.

22. Production of arms could be speeded up in a number of European countries if the United States would place orders there — "off-shore purchases" of arms. Financially and economically they are not strong enough to expand arms production without aggravating existing inflation and unrest. It now appears that the United States is going to place orders in Europe for spare parts of U.S. equipment and for ammunition. Orders are limited to these two items because there would be both political and strategic objections in the United States if complete equipment to be produced in Europe were ordered. (It is understood that the Canadian Department of Defence Production is willing to place orders over-seas, but in practice the scope for this sort of thing appears quite limited. In so far as it can be made to work, this form of transatlantic financing seems the most efficient and effective means of promoting arms production in idle European plants.

23. Some European spokesmen (French and Italian a year ago, but more recently Belgian) have suggested a "common fund" in NATO to finance additional arms production. Up to the present the obvious disadvantages of such a fund have prevented very serious discussion. It is supposedly designed to meet an emergency. Yet it could only be set up after protracted negotiations to decide how much each member should put into it and how much each could expect to get out of it and how it would be managed and controlled, and its subsequent operation would probably be cumbersome and contentious. Certainly, as long as the United States continues to view the proposal askance it has no chance of adoption.

24. However, if the United States changed its position, deciding that it was politically easier to place arms orders in Europe through a pool rather than directly, and if a pool were agreed upon then Canada would, of course, be expected to contribute. It is an open question whether, in the long run, we would provide more assistance through a common fund than we might otherwise provide under bilateral mutual aid. Certainly mutual aid seems more simple, more direct, and in general more satisfactory. On the other hand, if a common fund does emerge it will certainly become a centre of NATO attraction and activity, with possibilities of long-run political importance in the development of the North Atlantic Community.

(d) NATO "Watchdog Committee" of Ministers Concerned with Article II

25. This proposal should be welcomed as long as it is not expected to produce startling positive results quickly. Watchdogs exist to bite intruders — to protect against untoward developments.

26. The main activities of the Committee might be:

(i) to review from time to time the broad influence pulling NATO countries together and, more important,

(ii) to keep a special vigilance on economic causes of dissention and disunity, especially those that arise during a disturbing period of rearmament and inflation. The Committee would be specially concerned in FEB (and OEEC); precautions might have to be taken not to by-pass the Council Deputies.

(e) An Executive Boss for NATO

27. This is probably not a very practical proposal from a political point of view. However, anything which is successful in moving forward NATO plans for mobilizing and arming its forces contributes to the fundamental health of the organization. And, as argued above, the North Atlantic economic community is more likely to flourish on the basis of a NATO organization that is functioning healthily and busily for its own immediate (defence) purposes, than on the basis of broad resolutions for co-operation or a narrow straight jacket of new preferences and protectionism.

(f) A "Declaration" Regarding Article II of the Treaty

28. We understand that Mr. Van Zeeland has enlisted and is receiving U.S. support for some "declaration" at the coming Council meeting affirming support for the broad principles of social and economic co-operation set forth in Article II of the Treaty. Such a declaration must clearly receive strong Canadian support. No text of the proposed declaration has been received and so detailed comments cannot be made. However, most of the points in this memorandum will probably have some bearing on it.

(g) NATO and East-West Trade

29. If the United States does sponsor such a declaration, it would seem difficult for it to attempt, at the same time, to insist on the restriction of East-West Trade in Europe. If, as we have always insisted and the United States may now be going to insist, NATO is not merely a temporary military device but a permanent economic and social structure, this emphasizes that NATO countries, must, as a long-run policy, try to soften rather than harden the iron curtain. This, surely, is the end towards which we should work — unless we believe that World War III is imminent and inevitable.

[APPENDICE A/APPENDIX A]

Note de l'ambassade des États-Unis

Memorandum by Embassy of United States

SECRET Ottawa, August 29, 1951

NON-MILITARY OBJECTIVES OF NATO

This paper represents a summary of United States thinking as it is currently evolving with respect to the non-military aspects of NATO. These ideas have been discussed informally in London with Starkenborgh, Wilgress, and Bryn, where the immediate reaction was strongly favorable. They also reflect some of the ideas developed by Stikker with regard to the concept of a North Atlantic Community on a long-range basis.

In our view it is important to develop quickly our ideas as to means of strengthening the NATO organization and to discuss them in the NATO Council Meeting in Ottawa in September with a view to obtaining formal approval by the Council for a program of action. Consideration must be given to the problem in both its short-term and long-term aspects if we are to counteract the growing uneasiness in Europe regarding the manner in which NATO is developing, as reflected in Pearson's observations during his recent tour of Europe.

Short-Term Objectives

For the immediate future every effort must be made to overcome the impression that we value NATO only for purposes of military security, an impression which has developed presumably because of our concern with such current problems as the admission of Greece and Turkey to NATO and the implementation of the Medium Term Defense Plan. Reassurance is needed that the United States is primarily interested in preventing, not winning, a war and that the strength of the western nations when developed will never be used for aggressive purposes. We should also affirm our awareness that the defense buildup and the development of economic strength in Europe are mutually consistent and mutually necessary. The present intensive military buildup must be regarded as an investment which, when made, will permit a resumption of the drive to develop a higher standard of living in Europe.

Long-Term Objectives

We regard it as important to develop a more positive attitude on the part of European nations toward NATO, which is fundamentally a program of mutual self-help and self-preservation requiring European leadership and drive as well as American initiative and assistance. It is important to counteract the impression that the United States seeks to dominate its partners in NATO by imposing United States policies upon them and we must demonstrate our desire to take account of the views of other nations in the formative stages of policy-making. It must be made plain also that the United States is interested in furthering the integration of Europe equally with developing the full potentialities of NATO, in order to forestall fears of a Berlin-Paris-Rome axis unbalanced by a broader grouping.

In particular the United States is interested in the long-term objective of developing the non-military purposes implicit in Article II of the North Atlantic Treaty. This has a certain relationship to the problem of European integration, to which the European defense force and the Schuman plan appear to be giving genuine impetus, but that relationship lies in the background of our thinking. The important thing is that United States interest in Europe will not terminate when Europe can stand on its own feet militarily; we will not bring our troops home and return to the attitude which preceded World War II.

Program of Action

Tentative ideas have already been developed for a program of action which we hope will find full expression in the Council Meeting in September in Ottawa. Various possibilities are under discussion approximately as follows:

1. There is some feeling in Europe as a result of Stikker's interest in the concept of a North Atlantic Community that a statement might be released, probably through some European channel such as OEEC, possibly at the end of August. This possibility has been discussed by Stikker, Katz, Marjolin, and various European ministers at Strasbourg. The objective would be to generate a more positive European leadership and demonstrate the responsibility and interest of European countries.

2. The United States has been considering the appropriateness of a statement by Secretary Acheson which might be issued before the Council Meeting in September to reaffirm the interests of the United States in the wider long-term objectives of NATO and propose a special Council agenda item on this subject. The State Department seems to have concluded that it would be preferable for an appropriate item to be included on the agenda and that the Secretary make his statement before the Council when the agenda item is reached. Such a statement would take into account the objectives of the United States as outlined above and would propose a definite program for carrying it out.

3. We would hope to obtain from the Council a declaration of intention subscribed to by Ministers making it clear that, without prejudice to developments in wider frameworks such as United Nations or OEEC, or smaller frameworks such as the European Community, the members of NATO intend to work toward a progressively closer long-term association between any or all of them in all fields of endeavor. If in the meantime some statement such as suggested above has been made in Europe the Council might give it approval. This declaration might also include an announcement of the concrete steps to be taken.

4. One such step would be the establishment of a sub-committee of the Council designated as an advisory committee on non-military objectives, composed of a small group of Foreign Ministers. There have been various suggestions as to the membership of such committee, including a proposal that its chairman might be Stikker, to bring in representation from a small European country, and that the committee should include Pearson and Lange as logical members. DeGasperi might also be included to bring in the Latin countries and the Mediterranean area as well as active support for European integration. It is not suggested that any of the Big Three be included, since the group would then be too large if all of them, plus

Belgium, were to participate in this sub-committee. Still another proposal would include Spofford as a member ex officio. The sub-committee's function would be primarily of a steering and watchdog nature to follow NATO activities from the viewpoint of non-military objectives and development of the North Atlantic Community concept. It would make recommendations from time to time to the Council, or to the Deputies, as appropriate.

5. Another proposal, which does not seem to have made much headway, would establish a high-level advisory committee, of which the U.S. member would be a man of the stature of Conant or Bush and whose members, such as Jean Paul David and Haakon Lie, would concurrently lead national advisory committees to recommend national informational programs designed to bring about a better understanding of the principles on which NATO and other democratic institutions are founded. These committees would be supported by NATIS and would set up a working group selected from Americans and Europeans who have already demonstrated an appreciation of and intelligent interest in problems of intellectual and psychological mobilization. The working group would develop concrete projects and suggestions for consideration by NATO.

6. There is considerable United States interest in measures to obtain maximum coordination of foreign policy in NATO. We have the example of the British Commonwealth, where coordination is promoted in part by an extensive continuous interchange of information among partners who nevertheless maintain their freedom to differ and to negotiate their differences. This idea has been supported by both Lange and Starkenborgh and has found some expression in the Council of Deputies, where meetings in recent months have exchanged views on foreign policy questions involving Russia and the satellites. These have been of real value in developing a considerable degree of common policy toward Yugoslavia and in increasing the coordination of political guidance through the Council and the Deputies. A real advantage of the procedure developed in London has been its informality and the non-binding nature of the conclusions reached. We feel that this could be part of a process to obtain substantial agreement with our partners on specific issues of policy which would be helpful to the United States in reaching sound policies which our allies would be prepared to cooperate in carrying out wholeheartedly. It would probably have been desirable, for example, if the questions of the German defense contribution and the adherence of Greece and Turkey to NATO could have been developed in this manner through day-to-day consultation on the formation of policy in NATO. We think that proposals to develop closer consultation along these lines should not originate with the United States but come rather from the Canadians, Dutch or Norwegians. The objective would to make exchanges of views on foreign policy questions a matter of accepted practice in NATO and to develop at the same time a project for expanding the inter-change of information between NATO members on a regular basis.

Dear Mr. Pearson:

While you have been away, I have been doing a little thinking and agitating about the problems of forming the North Atlantic community. I have now put my ideas in the form of a memorandum to you. Arnold read the memorandum yesterday and said that I should sent it to you at once by registered air mail. (We are not mentioning this to George Glazebrook!)

Arnold was good enough to add that I could tell you the memorandum had his "cordial support".

With all best wishes.

Yours sincerely,

Memorandum from Special Assistant to Secretary of State for External Affairs to Secretary of State for External Affairs

SECRET [Ottawa], September 6, 1951

THE NORTH ATLANTIC COMMUNITY

The purpose of this memorandum is to examine the impasse that we seem to have reached in working towards a North Atlantic community and to suggest the general direction in which we should look for the way out. We have been saying for many months that we are in favour of the "integration" of Western Europe so long as it takes place within the framework of the North Atlantic community. But we have found great difficulty in giving economic meaning to that latter phrase. Consequently, the temptation is strong to say to ourselves that European integration and the formation of a North Atlantic community are equally illusions and that we can safely use the familiar formula without taking some steps to create genuine economic co-operation within the North Atlantic community.

2. It would be highly unwise, I think, to yield to that temptation. The degree of success that has already been attained in working out the Schuman Plan and the Plevan Plan for a European Army suggests that the integration of Western Europe may actually be realized. This development, unless it is accompanied by progress more or less pari passu towards co-operation in the North Atlantic area, will prove unfortunate for Canada, I am convinced. European economic integration could very easily mean the creation of new trade barriers against Canadian imports; and military co-operation among the countries of Western Europe could mean a great growth in neutralist sentiment. Both these possibilities would imperil the success of the North Atlantic Treaty. They would be particularly dangerous for Canada, since we would be left to deal with the United States on our own and almost inevitably would sink into a policy of simple continentalism.

3. We must, therefore, exert ourselves, I think, to begin to give economic meaning and content to the North Atlantic community that we have talked so much about. The unity of Western Europe is taking on a measure of reality. We cannot indefinitely attempt to match that movement merely by phrases. Yet it must be admitted that it is extremely difficult to see how a beginning can be made in forging closer economic links between the countries of the North Atlantic area. That is the impasse which, it seems to me, we have reached at present.

4. In my opinion, the difficulty arises, at least in part, because we have an inadequate idea of international economic co-operation. We have thought of it almost exclusively, it seems to me, in terms of removing obstacles and of increasing the scope of free competition. If international economic co-operation is seen in that light, it will be virtually impossible to assign any special meaning to economic co-operation in the North Atlantic area — or indeed in any other area. An international economic system which is moving increasingly towards free competition has no place for limitation or discrimination; and these are of the essence of any real regional association. If an attempt is made to reduce barriers within the North Atlantic area, the arguments used in favour of such an effort can also be used in favour of a world-wide reduction of barriers.

5. But the way of regarding international economic co-operation to which we in Canada are wedded is inadequate, I think, to deal with existing circumstances in the world, and with existing currents of opinion. Our own domestic economy is a mixture of free competition and of a large number of deliberate arrangements designed to protect groups and individuals from the consequences of the untrammelled play of economic forces. This is true in great or less degree of all countries in the North Atlantic area — even of the United States, as their agricultural policy abundantly illustrates. We must consciously recognize, I think, that any acceptable form of international economic co-operation nowadays will be similarly mixed. It will be based on as high as possible a measure of free competition in order to reduce the real costs of production. But imbedded in it will also be deliberate mechanisms for protecting the welfare of special areas and interests. The international economic system which exists at present is in fact such a matrix. It continues, for example, to be heavily dependent on massive intergovernmental financing. We ourselves, I would claim, have been both shrewd and generous in providing large slices of this financing. But, for the most part, we have regarded it as a method for producing conditions of comparatively stable equilibrium in which trade and payments could operate automatically. This attitude has persisted in spite of our contributions to the Colombo Plan and to the United Nations Technical Assistance Programme, both of which are essentially schemes for assisting depressed areas.

6. However, I do not want to be drawn into a long digression about the theory and practice of Canadian international economic policy. That the two are not always entirely consonant, and that we, like other countries, take action to protect particular Canadian interests when they are threatened by the free play of competition is proved, I think, by our butter policy over the last few years. What I am disposed to argue is that we should realize that any acceptable system of international co-operation must nowadays be a mixture of free competition and of planning, arrangement, facilitation, call it what you will.

7. If that is accepted as true, it becomes possible, I think, to give meaning to the idea of economic co-operation within a region. The region will be set off from the rest of the world not necessarily because trade within the area will be freer than trade elsewhere, but because the governments of the countries in the area have made deliberate arrangements among themselves in the economic field. If we want to foster economic co-operation in the North Atlantic area, the question we must ask is: In what fields can the governments concerned most appropriately make mutually advantageous arrangements?

8. I have not much doubt myself that the next step is to agree that in present circumstances the most promising field for economic co-operation in the North Atlantic area is defence production and finance. There are two reasons for choosing this field. In the first place, governments there have a wide sphere of initiative. Secondly, most of the economic difficulties under which countries in the North Atlantic area are suffering arise because a heavy defence effort has been superimposed on the precarious balance which had been achieved by the middle of 1950. What is required is co-operation to ease the places where the shoe pinches.

9. Let me recall some of the difficulties. Many countries are in balance of payments difficulties and are running deficits because of an increased volume of imports for defence and because of decreased exports as a result of conversion from peacetime production. The addition of defence spending to spending for other goods and services is also creating inflationary pressures in all of the North Atlantic countries. Finally in the background, there is the rise in the prices of raw materials, which is turning the terms of trade heavily against many countries, notably the United Kingdom. What we are looking for, therefore, is some mode of planned co-operation in the field of defence production and finance which will both ease these immediate problems and hold out hope of binding the countries in the North Atlantic area permanently together.

10. To my mind the conclusion is inescapable, that we must increasingly be working towards a situation where the decisions of what will be produced, where it will be produced and how it will be financed will be made by the corporate judgement of the partners in the alliance expressed through the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. I am not competent to suggest either the pace at which we should move towards this objective or the institutional form through which such decisions should be made. Indeed, it may be too early to see the answers to those two questions.

11. Since this conclusion may seem very ambitious, let me at once explain a little what I mean by saying that it should be decided within the North Atlantic Treaty Organization what should be produced, where it should be produced and how it should be financed. I am not thinking of any formal surrender of sovereignty. What I have in mind is the development within the organization of techniques for making authoritative recommendations on these subjects which would inevitably have great influence with the national governments. It might be that in the fullness of time these decision-making functions would be institutionalized into some virtually supra-national authority. But, in my opinion, it is far too early to be thinking yet of such a grandiose structure.

12. The advantages of such a development as I have described might be listed as follows:

(a) The co-operation which would result would be long-lasting. We hope that by 1954 we will have broken the back of rearmament and that defence expenditures can taper off. But it is almost inevitable that they will continue at a high level for a very long period. If war is avoided, the best that we can hope for over the next fifteen or twenty years is the continuance of a state of tension between the Soviet Union and the West. This will require a higher level of armaments than the North Atlantic countries have ever supported in peacetime. If throughout this period there is firm co-operation in defence production and defence financing, one essential strand of the North Atlantic community will have been woven permanently.

(b) The type of co-operation which is contemplated is in many ways parallel to the economic arrangements which now exist domestically within many of the North Atlantic countries for shielding groups and individuals from the naked impact of economic forces. In the United States, for example, the South must still be considered as a depressed area. How is it assisted by the Federal Government? In two main ways, I think: By the large transfer payments made by the A.A.A. and other agencies to individuals; and by the location of defence plants (e.g. the atomic energy plant at Savanah) within the Southern States. Deliberate action of somewhat the same kind is taken in Canada to alleviate the difficulties of the Atlantic provinces. In the same way, the economic problems of the North Atlantic community would be alleviated, both by the siting of defence plants with an eye to national financial difficulties, as well as to strategic considerations, and by making transfer payments from one country to another.

(c) This development would be firmly rooted because it would be an attempt to deal with pressing difficulties. As we all know, if the United States were to buy more defence equipment in Canada, our balance of payments position on current account would be improved and we would be able to extend more mutual aid to our partners in Western Europe. The same is true of other countries in the alliance. Under the proposed arrangements, large subventions by the United States and to a lesser extent by Canada would still be necessary; but they might well be easier to secure, if the whole operation were regarded as planned co-operation for defence rather than as 'passing the hat' or even as 'burden sharing'. Finally, if defence production were really co-ordinated, it is perhaps possible to hope that increases in the prices of raw materials, which have been caused in part at least by competitive bidding, could be abated.

13. It must be admitted that there would be objections in some quarters, both in the United States and Canada, to the course that I am proposing:

(a) In Canada it might be feared that such arrangements would result in greater pressure for Canadian financial assistance to its allies. But such pressure is likely in any case to be very great; and it must be realized that any genuine form of economic co-operation in the North Atlantic area under present circumstances will require financial assistance from the two wealthier allies on this side of the Atlantic. There might also be some doubts in Canada about the surrender of sovereignty which such a system would involve. Here again, I think, it must be understood that, if an Atlantic community is to be formed, some surrender of sovereignty on the part of all the allies is inescapable. We have already in fact surrendered part of our sovereignty by giving to the North Atlantic Treaty Organization the right to recommend what forces will be needed and which countries should supply them. Under the proposed arrangements we would merely be giving to the Organization similar rights in the field of defence production and finance. In Canada's case the surrender of the unfettered power of decision in this field would actually be easier than in the military field, I think, since we could justly claim to sit in with the United States, the United Kingdom and France in making all major decisions.

(b) In the United States the Pentagon would almost certainly have reservations about giving to any NATO body the right to determine that defence production should be situated anywhere outside the United States. They might not take kindly to a state of affairs in which other countries would be able to influence a decision whether new aluminum production, for example, should be located in Canada rather than in the United States; and unless, of course, the United States were prepared to accept group decisions of that kind, there would be no point in attempting to foster the development outlined in this paper. On the other hand, the worst fears of the Pentagon — and of United States businessmen — might be stilled by the reflection that the United States would inevitably be in the dominant position to influence every decision that was made, both large and small. Progress would certainly depend on United States support for the purposes of the new arrangements. But I do not think that we need assume at the outset that such opposition as there would be in the United States could not be overcome. The State Department is now showing much greater awareness than previously of the necessity of breathing reality into the concept of the North Atlantic community. General Eisenhower is keenly aware of the delays involved in the present methods of stimulating defence production and of allocating NATO expenditures. There is a considerable body of opinion in Congress in favour of going much further than this paper advocates in the direction of establishing a North Atlantic federation. The prospect of securing United States support need not therefore, I think, be considered hopeless.

14. I have not enough experience in North Atlantic matters to suggest the precise arrangements which would be advisable if the general approach contained in this paper were adopted. You will be aware that the French and others have several times proposed that a common fund should be established by NATO to meet the charges of common defence. Such a scheme would be in harmony with what I am suggesting. But there might be other and perhaps less pretentious ways of securing the same ends. Conceivably, for example, firm recommendations in the field of defence production and defence finance might be made by small executive committees of the existing Defence Production Board and Finance and Economic Board, the executive in each case to consist of the representatives of the United States, the United Kingdom, France and Canada.

15. The best form of arrangements would obviously require a good deal of further thought and discussion. I would hope, however, that we could agree now on the following points:

(a) that it is necessary to make a start without further delay in giving economic meaning to the concept of the North Atlantic community;

(b) that progress in this direction can more readily be made by way of planned co-operation between the allies than by attempting within the North Atlantic area to form some kind of free-trade bloc;

(c) that the first field to be cultivated in this way should be the field of defence production and defence finance;

(d) that we should move as quickly as possible towards a situation in which decisions of what should be produced, where it should be produced and how it should be financed would be taken by the corporate judgement of the North Atlantic allies expressed through NATO.

16. If these conclusions commend themselves to you, it would remain to be considered how they could be brought before the North Atlantic Council, either at its meeting here or in Rome. My own preliminary view is that in your opening statement here in Ottawa you might discuss this question, touching on the four points I have listed in the paragraph above. Then possibly the Council might empower the Sub-Committee of Ministers, which the Americans are thinking of proposing, to develop these ideas further. Or alternatively, the Defence Production Board and the Finance and Economic Board might be instructed to report at the Rome meeting on how the objectives I have sketched could best be achieved. Obviously this whole question cannot be considered in isolation from the paper on force requirements, which I understand is to be submitted to the Council when it meets in Rome. If the Canadian Government feels it necessary to reject out of hand the recommendations which will be made in respect to Canada in that paper, it would be difficult for you to take the initiative either here in Ottawa or in Rome in proposing wider authority for the Organization in the fields of defence production and defence finance than exist at present. On the other hand, if the Canadian Government is willing not to reject the military recommendations but merely to seek modifications in them so far as Canada is concerned, I do not think that you need feel inhibited from taking the line I am suggesting.

17. In any event, I should like to advise very strongly that you should not accept membership in the kind of small sub-committee that Spofford and Achilles are thinking of, unless it is reasonably clear that it will have some real substance to get its teeth into. You should not become involved in an exercise which might come down to considering only topics like psychological warfare. In reading some of the recent messages from London, I have had the feeling that some of the United States representatives there think that a community can be built out of hot air. On the contrary, it can only be built by meeting successfully (and with as much fairness to all of its members as is possible) practical problems as they arise. That conviction lies at the basis of these suggestions.

18. You may remember that in September 1864 representatives of the Maritime Provinces were meeting at Charlottetown to consider a maritime federation when they received word that a delegation from Canada was on its way with alternative proposals for a wider union. The parallel cannot be pressed too far. But I think that the process of European integration is now at a point where we must either bring forward wider proposals of our own which would lay the groundwork for a North Atlantic community, or be content to watch the creation of a group in Western Europe which, by becoming increasingly independent, might frustrate the wider development we have at heart.

NATO COUNCIL; OTTAWA MEETING

Attached is an uncoded telegram dated September 6 on the U.S. proposals on the non-military aspects of NATO. Owing to the cost of transmission to San Francisco we had decided to reduce the length of the telegram and were in the process of doing so when we were informed that a plane would be going for you this afternoon. Since it was felt that the telegram was not of great urgency, I am therefore sending you the original text by plane.

Le sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures au secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to Secretary of State for External Affairs

TELEGRAM Ottawa, September 6, 1951

NATO COUNCIL; OTTAWA MEETING

1. You will have seen from messages WA-3269 of August 31† from Washington and 2243 of September 4† from London that United States officials are giving a good deal of thought to the non-military aspects of NATO which might be emphasized at the Ottawa meeting. Some of their efforts strike us as pretty wordy and imprecise. There is also evidence of the common American tendency to believe that the creation of new machinery in itself constitutes a step forward.

2. As we have always attached, publicly and privately, a good deal of importance to Article 2, it would be impossible, we think, for the Canadian Government to take a merely sceptical or stalling attitude to proposals for pressing forward with the non-military objectives of NATO.

3. It seems to us that there is now some real danger that either the current vague proposals may result in a collection of empty platitudes or our setting out on various wrong tracks leading nowhere. We have therefore been giving further thought to the lines along which we might hope to see moderate but practical ideas developed.

4. It may prove tactically desirable for the Canadian Delegation to take some initiative in this matter, perhaps in your own opening address at the Council. You might at least pose some of the problems involved, and indicate possible lines of development. This might prove to be preferable to being put in a position of being prompted by others.

5. These are our preliminary reactions to some of the suggestions which have emerged from different quarters. They may prove of some assistance to you in your talks in San Francisco.

(a) Economic Co-operation

It emerged pretty clearly at our last meeting with you that this objective should not be envisaged in terms of an exclusive NATO free trade area. On the other hand, this need not imply that nothing can or should be done to give practical content to the provision of the treaty concerning economic co-operation. We are inclined to believe that one field in which some real progress might be made and which is vital to the maintenance of a stable North Atlantic Community is that of the stimulation and financing of European defence production. LePan has done a very interesting memorandum on this subject, making certain practical suggestions which I think well worth serious consideration, and which is being forwarded to you by airmail today. Obviously proposals of this nature imply willingness on the part of the U.S. (and probably Canada) to contribute financially. It might prove however that such an approach would be more attractive and feasible from the U.S. point of view than the continued delivery of military end items. So far as we are concerned, we shall not likely be able to resist pressure for further contributions to Europe in the next year or two. It is for consideration whether our contribution to a scheme of this kind which might lay the foundation for practical and continuing NATO economic co-operation might not be preferable to contributions in the form of mutual aid.

Any consideration of NATO co-operation immediately raises the problem of its relationship with non-NATO countries. In this connection your conversations with the Swedish Foreign Minister during your trip is obviously relevant and the possibility which you threw out of a "bifurcation of NATO" in which non-NATO states — e.g. Sweden, Switzerland and Germany — might be associated would be worth exploring.

Closely associated with the above is the Stikker Programme for a time-phased approach to European rearmament. You will no doubt have occasion to discuss this in greater detail with Stikker. Our feeling is that, on broad political grounds, some approach of this kind is becoming almost essential if the populations of the European NATO countries are to continue in the next few years to bear the increasing burden of rearmament. The inflationary pressures caused by rearmament are perhaps the most serious problem which NATO countries face today and the heart of the Alliance may be broken if ordinary people in the NATO countries are given no prospect of obtaining some improvement in their standard of living.

(b) Common Foreign Policy

Achilles and others now seems to be showing a tendency to switch the emphasis of proposals for the forthcoming meeting from NATO economic co-operation to the development of closer co-ordination of foreign policies. It is a little difficult to know just what they mean by this suggestion. If what is implied is fuller and franker exchanges of views in the Deputies that is all to the good. The Deputies cannot be empowered to reach semi-decisions which involve their governments in half measure. Where decisions are involved, there must be clearcut resolutions referred back to governments for decision. As you put it to the U.S. Ambassador during your interview with him the other day when he referred to "a common foreign policy" when you pointed out to him that the ideal to be aimed at was rather "common foreign policies".

(c) Psychological Warfare

There seems little doubt that there will be renewed pressure from the United States for the creation of machinery in the sphere of psychological warfare. We are inclined to be pretty sceptical about the usefulness of creating elaborate machinery for such purposes, however admirable. However, ideas so far advanced on this subject have not been precise enough for us to assess their possible usefulness.

(d) Committee of Ministers

As to the procedure for initiating and organizing these various proposals for forwarding the non-military objectives of NATO, we find that the Americans are increasingly favourable to the setting up of a committee of Foreign Ministers. There are, we think, arguments for and against this proposal, but one criterion for judging whether it could serve any useful purpose is whether the specific measures of a non-military character which it is designed to further have any real substance. If the Council decide for example to follow up concrete proposals for the economic development of NATO or in other fields, the Committee of Ministers might have a real job to do. If not, the Committee would be merely window-dressing.

The objections we see to the Committee are:

(a) that it might be a fifth wheel to the coach in that it might take away from the authority and prestige of the Deputies;[57]

(b) that in practice it is difficult to see how its members could work together much between Council meetings;

[57] Note marginale :/Marginal note:
It could operate through its 4 deputies [L.B. Pearson]

(c) that it might raise high hopes of achieving results which would then be disappointed.

On the other hand, if a positive programme is to be developed, then the stimulus and prestige provided by the backing of a ministerial committee might be valuable. The FEB and the DPB might be asked to work out jointly the details of such a programme under the direction of the ministerial committee.

As to the composition of the committee, it is clear that the original proposal for yourself, Stikker and Lange would have to be expanded to include a Latin country, e.g., Italy. The alternative would be to include the U.K., France, and the U.S. This might have a good deal to commend it. It would allay French suspicions and it is evident from reports from Washington that the Americans would like to be included, and the Committee could only achieve results if it worked in very close touch with the U.S. Government. But if you go this far you end up with at least seven of the twelve NATO countries and the argument for efficiency collapses.

6. We are, of course, well aware that both the United States and the European countries have mixed motives in advocating the furtherance of the non-military objectives of NATO at this time. In part, the Europeans are searching for a device which will enable the United States to continue economic aid to Europe. The Americans, for their part, seem actuated both by suspicion of a purely European economic integration and by the desire to coating the pill of the inclusion of Greece, Turkey and later Germany in NATO. On the other hand, there is doubtless involved in these ideas a substantial element of a genuine desire to further a NATO Community. Moreover, the economic and political difficulties which threaten NATO countries as a result of the impact of rearmament programmes on their economies are so grave that it would be difficult for the Council to meet at this time without advancing some proposals for their solution, or at least for an amelioration of the situation.

DEVELOPMENT OF THE NON-MILITARY ASPECTS OF NATO

1. The Chairman said that Mr. Plumptre had drafted, for consideration, a memorandum on the economic implications of development of the North Atlantic community for the use of Ministers in discussing item 6 of the agenda of the forthcoming NATO Council meeting: "Future development of NATO, other than in connection with defence plans".

Further, a U.S. memorandum had been received indicating the preliminary thinking of the United States as to the line it might take on item 6 at the meeting. From this and other reports it appeared that the United States at present hoped that, in Ottawa, the Council would agree to:

(1) make a general declaration of intention to work towards the closer association of any or all of the NATO countries;

(2) establish, on a temporary basis at least, a Sub-Committee to consider, and make recommendations to the Council from time to time on, steps to promote the closer association of the NATO countries; this body to consist of the Foreign Ministers of Norway, the Netherlands and Canada and, possibly, Italy, and to draft instruments (1) and (3) and an announcement regarding its composition and objectives;

(3) issue an endorsement of the "European Manifesto" adopted by the Council of OEEC on August 29th, 1951.

The United States was likely to propose that the Sub-Committee consider, inter alia, before the Rome meeting, means of developing the maximum coordination of foreign policy among NATO countries, and the possibility of a programme for bringing about a better understanding of the free institutions of member countries in conformity with Article 2 of the North Atlantic Treaty. In the latter connection, Washington had in mind the possible establishment in due course of a high-level NATO advisory committee, whose members would also head national advisory committees, to make recommendations on national and international public information programmes. There was also some indication that the United States might suggest study of the possibilities of intra-NATO cooperation in certain aspects of investment, transportation and communications.

Two papers had been circulated.

(Memorandum, August 31st, 1951, "The North Atlantic community-economic aspects" and annexed U.S. Embassy memorandum, August 29th, 1951 — Panel Document ED-43)

2. Mr. Plumptre said that the essence of his paper was that, if it were desired to further the concept of a North Atlantic economic community, thinking in terms of a preference area would be entirely unrealistic; closer cooperation in commercial policy could only develop gradually through trade concessions which should apply to the whole free world trading area; and the nub of intra-NATO economic relations for some years would be aid. Thus NATO's role in promoting the development of an economic community appeared to be in the following fields: (1) reviewing the aid provided by some NATO countries in the light of defence burdens; (2) associating this aid with continuing pressure to reduce trade barriers on a non-preferential basis; (3) minimizing the effects of the controls of one NATO country on others; and (4) arranging, if necessary, for help by one NATO country to another in materials, techniques, manpower, etc. to increase arms production.

Except for the section on OEEC, his paper represented generally the views of his department. The OEEC section suggested that it seemed desirable, from the Canadian point of view, that NATO (FEB), with its broader and more immediate concerns should, at least during the period of rapid rearmament, largely take over the staff and activities of OEEC, with its limited objectives of European cooperation and integration. The general view of his department, however, appeared to be that, for the present, it was undesirable to discourage developments in the direction of European integration for the sake of promoting North Atlantic economic integration.

3. Mr. Robertson said that his main comment on the paper was that portions of it might mislead Ministers by oversimplification of some of the issues.

4. The Deputy Minister of National Defence thought that an attempt to develop a NATO framework for economic cooperation would go on the rocks because the military authorities were likely before long to press for the inclusion in the alliance of several Middle East countries that would have no logical place in the North Atlantic economic community. OEEC, therefore, seemed a better framework for the development of economic collaboration.

5. Mr. Robertson said that this was one of the aspects of the admission of Greece and Turkey that had been causing concern to the Northern European members of NATO. The United States might next propose the admission of Egypt, after which there would be pressure from the rest of the Middle East to enter the alliance.

6. The Deputy Governor of the Bank of Canada wondered if it had not been the original intention that NATO would become a large anti-Soviet grouping.

7. The Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs said that the original concept of NATO had been that of an essentially regional organization and one that would have a natural basis for economic development in conformity with Article 2 of the Treaty — a type of development that the government had stressed during and since negotiation of the North Atlantic Treaty. It was only recently that proposals had been put forward for the addition of Greece, Turkey and other countries.

8. Mr. Robertson thought that the argument for the development of a North Atlantic community was relatively simple in economic terms since the more countries that collaborated in the economic field the better. The difficulty arose when one considered the development of corporate NATO bodies that might have to include representation of the countries of the Middle East. Objections would be raised, on political and social grounds, to institutions that included such representation being concerned with the formulation of policies affecting Atlantic countries.

Thus, the problem of the future development of NATO as against OEEC appeared to be one of political and social rather than economic base. He doubted that it was wise to try to transfer functions and staff from OEEC to NATO. There did not yet appear to be grounds for fearing that Europe was accomplishing a degree of economic integration that was prejudicial to Canadian interests.

10. Mr. Heeney said that the idea was already developing that Turkey might have to be left out of developments under Article 2 if they were to materialize.

While some European statesmen, like Mr. Schuman, who were in favour of European integration were not neutralists, it was clear from Mr. Stikker's reservations about such integration that he feared that it would lead not only to French domination but also to neutralism.

11. Mr. Robertson thought that, while the French leaders favoured European integration in order to ensure the collaboration of Germany, he doubted that they were opposed to integration on a wider, North Atlantic scale.

12. Mr. Coyne enquired whether it was felt that the U.S. proposals for action on Article 2 should be opposed.

13. Mr. Robertson thought that the position was that the Americans had now come around to the frequently-expressed Canadian view that something should be done along the lines of Article 2 and that, while everyone was in favour of the development of the Atlantic community in principle, it was felt that it was now necessary to examine more carefully what action on Article 2 would really mean. The main aim of the U.S. proposals seemed to be, as indicated in the U.S. memorandum, to overcome the impression in Europe that the United States valued NATO only for purposes of military security and to demonstrate that it recognized that the defence build-up and the development of economic strength in Europe are mutually consistent and mutually necessary.

14. Mr. Heeney felt that it should be recognized that the United States had now firmly embraced the objectives of Article 2. Some of its proposals, such as machinery to develop a common foreign policy, common propaganda activities and an advisory Ministerial Sub-Committee, went pretty far and contemplated something in the nature of corporate political institutions. One difficulty was that the United States might create false hopes as to how much could be accomplished under Article 2.

15. Mr. MacKay thought that consideration might be given to the questions of whether it would be desirable for the Council to agree to a declaration of common policies, which would serve to assure Europe that it would be freed of its defence burden eventually, and whether there were any specific types of action — such as mutual aid, as suggested in Mr. Plumptre's paper — that could usefully be undertaken in common.

16. Mr. Drury said that such proposals were based on the concept of NATO as an Atlantic grouping. But what was it felt that NATO should be? Militarily, there could be advantages in a much larger membership but politically, and even economically, the desirability of a larger grouping was not so clear. The alternatives seemed to be a purely military alliance wider than the present one or an attempt to develop a North Atlantic community limited, for political reasons, to something like the present membership.

17. Mr. Robertson thought that it could be taken for granted that Greece and Turkey would, and that other countries might, be admitted to NATO. This factor had made it necessary to view earlier thinking regarding political association to the effect that there might be some political unity in the North Atlantic area. The United States seemed to be advancing its proposals regarding Article 2 at this time because of its pressure for the admission of Greece and Turkey, doubtless hoping to convince Europe that Article 2 could be given meaning despite the admission of these countries.

18. Mr. MacKay thought that the United States was proposing action on Article 2 also because it genuinely favoured such a development. The hard facts of the situation now were that the United States would propose action and Canada, as a protagonist of Article 2, would be in a difficult position to hold back.

19. Mr. Drury thought that the Ministers concerned should nevertheless be warned about looking to Article 2 as a panacea since the military authorities would argue for the territorial extension of NATO.

20. Mr. Heeney said that an argument for supporting action on Article 2 lay in the possible consequences of European integration movement which might, for instance, lead to an exclusive trading area. A better alternative might be to widen this movement to the whole of the present North Atlantic Treaty area. On the political side, a common body had already been set up in the form of the Council Deputies, who were gradually moving towards a position of taking binding decisions. With U.S. support, the FEB and DPB could be expected to move in the same direction. The U.S. proposal for machinery for arriving at common policies seemed a good one but the suggested common propaganda organization presented dangers.

21. Mr. MacKay said that the declaration of the Council of OEEC indicated that the Western European governments aimed at expanding their overall production by 25% in 5 years, in order first to strengthen their defences and, progressively, to have a growing surplus available for raising living standards; that the programme was to be accomplished through co-operative action on the production of coal, steel, power, raw materials, food and housing and on emigration, increasing productivity, curbing inflation and promoting trade; and that, in this connection, the co-operation of other countries would be required in bringing about a fair distribution of raw materials and more stabilization in their prices and in facilitating European emigration and exports.[58]

The question was whether this programme raised the possibility of a degree of European economic integration that would be contrary to Canadian interests or whether it would be useful to join in the proposed endorsement of the declaration which might be included in the suggested declaration of intention regarding Article 2 or take the form of a separate instrument.

22. Mr. Heeney thought that the OEEC declaration might be a bid for North America to participate in the raising of European living standards after completion of the Medium Term Defence Plan in 1954.

23. Mr. Robertson thought that Mr. Stikker's idea in promoting the OEEC Manifesto had been to have 1946-50 considered as the period of recovery, 1950-54 as that of rearmament and the period after 1954 as one in which progress towards higher living standards could be resumed on the strength of European resources freed from arms production. The object was to make the current defence programmes of European governments more tolerable to their people. In the circumstances, he did not see any objection to Canada endorsing OEEC's declaration.

24. Mr. Deutsch thought the proposed endorsement merely a further U.S. effort to promote self-help in Europe.

25. The Governor of the Bank of Canada wondered how the OEEC staff would function if taken over by FEB. OEEC had had specific responsibilities, its members had had a common problem and there had been a clear donor-recipient relationship between the members and the United States, with the latter in a position to force action. On the other hand, the issues in FEB might be diffuse and inexplicit and there would not be the same donor-recipient relationship. He would be sorry to see an early breaking up of OEEC.

26. Mr. Plumptre said that, as the NATO burden-sharing exercise was similar to work being done in OEEC, it had probably been a reasonable step to borrow some staff temporarily from OEEC for this exercise — which, for security reasons, it had not been possible to entrust to OEEC. Again, on the basis of his conclusion that the main emphasis in the coming years would be on aid and production, there was perhaps something to be said for FEB taking over the OEEC staff for the present.

27. Mr. Heeney pointed out that it had frequently been said that steps should be taken to put surplus European industrial capacity to work on defence production and that it would be helpful if means could be found of reaching decisions as to where various items of defence equipment should be produced. The defence production field seemed to be one involving practical matters in which it should be possible to make some progress in the direction of a North Atlantic community. It would probably be necessary to have some kind of political mechanism by which decisions could be reached.

European arms production could, of course, be speeded up to some extent if the United States would agree to make appreciable "off-shore" purchases.

28. Mr. Drury said that there was reluctance in the United States, the United Kingdom and Canada to place significant orders for equipment in Western Europe in view of the vulnerability of the latter.

29. Mr. Heeney wondered if this did not mean that creation of a "common fund", as proposed by certain Europeans, would be the only effective means of obtaining increased production in Europe.

30. Mr. Drury said that the U.S. Congress, desiring to maintain its control over U.S. expenditures on equipment, was likely to be opposed to such a fund.

31. Mr. Deutsch said that the Pentagon would be against allowing a NATO agency to assume the responsibility for deciding in which countries production should be financed from a common fund. It was unlikely that the Canadian government would contribute much to such a fund. A contribution of this type would be tantamount to a contribution towards closing the gap between commitments and requirements under the Medium Term Defence Plan. There would therefore be the question of whether Canada could afford to make such a contribution, at least unless it reduced its present defence effort proportionately. There did not seem to be any grounds for objecting to the principle of a common fund but the government might be reluctant to trust a NATO body to administer such a fund well.

32. The Panel, after further discussion, agreed that Mr. Plumptre's paper be revised in the light of the discussion and that the Department of External Affairs prepare appropriate documentation on the matters raised in the U.S. memorandum for the use of the Canadian Ministers attending the Ottawa meeting of the NATO Council.

Note du sous-secrétaire d'État suppléant aux Affaires extérieures

Memorandum by Deputy Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

SECRET [Ottawa], September 10, 1951

DEVELOPMENT OF THE NORTH ATLANTIC COMMUNITY

The objective should be the progressive development in the North Atlantic community of effective unity in policy and action in the political, military and economic fields for the purpose of increasing the safety and prosperity of the free world and strengthening its free institutions. We are developing effective unity in policy and action in the military field. The problem is how to secure equally rapid development in the political and economic field. Otherwise NATO is likely to become more and more distorted.

Political

2. The principal method of developing effective unity in policy and action in the political field would be by the progressive development of a common foreign policy for the North Atlantic community or, if this sounds too ambitious, the "maximum co-ordination of the foreign policies" of the North Atlantic countries. This point is well developed in Part 3 of Achilles' telegram of August 8.† It means, as suggested in paragraph 6 of the American Embassy's memorandum of August 29, that the North Atlantic countries should follow the example of the British Commonwealth where co-ordination in foreign policies "is promoted in part by an extensive continuous interchange of information among partners who nevertheless maintain their freedom to differ and to negotiate their differences."

3. The Canadian Government has, from the outset, stressed the importance of the maximum co-ordination of the foreign policies of the North Atlantic allies. Thus, in his first speech as Minister for External Affairs, Mr. Pearson, on September 21, 1948, said that "a sharing of risks, resources and obligations in a North Atlantic security system must ... be accompanied by, and flow from a share in the control of policy. If obligations and resources are to be shared, it is obvious that some sort of constitutional machinery must be established under which each participating country will have a fair share in determining the policies of all which affect all. Otherwise, without their consent, the policy of one or two or three may increase the risks and therefore the obligations of all."

4. The establishment of machinery for consultation on foreign policy will not in itself be sufficient. The essential thing, as suggested by Achilles, is the development of certain conventions of an unwritten North Atlantic constitution. The first of these conventions would be that no North Atlantic government should adopt a firm policy on a matter of concern to the whole alliance without previous consultation with the other members of the alliance. A second convention which would flow from this would be that, after the consultation has taken place, each member government should, in determining its own policy, take fully into account the views of the other members. These two conventions are similar to the conventions set forth in the Resolution of the Imperial Conference of 1923 on the negotiation, signature and ratification of treaties.

Economic

5. The problem of promoting the progressive development in the North Atlantic community of effective unity in policy and action in the economic and financial field is not very different from the problem of promoting progressive development in the political field. In both cases it is a question of the development of a common policy for the North Atlantic community or of the maximum co-ordination of the policies of the North Atlantic countries. The problem in the economic and financial field is what steps can the North Atlantic countries take to develop common economic and financial foreign policies which would be best calculated to increase their safety and their prosperity.

6. The prime difficulty in tackling this problem is to decide where to begin. One of the most promising fields, as Mr. LePan has pointed out, is the making of intergovernmental arrangements in defence production and defence finance. I suggest that another would be planned co-operation between the North Atlantic Allies in the specialized agencies of the United Nations.

7. I have a very strong feeling that if the North Atlantic nations were to cooperate in strong, vigorous and imaginative leadership in the specialized agencies, these agencies could be made much more effective than they are today in promoting the prosperity and stability of the free world and increasing its feeling of corporate unity.

8. What is needed is for a group of leading nations to take a new look at western policy in each of the specialized agencies, in order to see if they cannot reach agreement on specific proposals which they will jointly put before those agencies — proposals possibly for new programmes, possibly for amendments in their constitutions. The North Atlantic countries would be acting as a nuclear group. Most of the agencies came into existence as the result of proposals made by nuclear groups. If an effort is now to be made to give them a more vigorous existence it is fitting that a nuclear group should take the initiative.

9. For the North Atlantic countries to act as a nuclear group would tend to increase their sense of community; it would give them a positive creative task to do; it would demonstrate that they are not self-centered and regionally-minded but are thinking in terms of the whole of the free world.

10. It would be premature to attempt to suggest the kind of new proposals which might be put forward in the specialized agencies. The procedure might be for a small group of ministers — perhaps the sub-committee the Americans are thinking of — to draw up terms of reference for meetings of groups of experts on each of the agencies. The important thing is that each group of experts should be given a clear political directive to consider ab initio in the light of the present situation the constitution, policies and programmes of a specialized agency and to make recommendations to the sub-committee of ministers on the changes which are required in order that that agency may more effectively promote the prosperity, stability and unity of the free world.

11. GATT should be considered for this purpose as a specialized agency, and the North Atlantic countries might usefully constitute themselves as a nuclear group to work out further mutual reductions in trade barriers on a most favoured nation basis. The reduction by North Atlantic countries of trade barriers on a multilateral basis would being a further "integration" of the free world trading area and more especially of the North Atlantic area.

12. If the tariff negotiations of a North Atlantic nuclear group are to succeed, it is possible that the meetings of tariff experts should be preceded by a meeting of ministers who would attempt to reach agreement on certain basic economic and political issues underlying the tariff negotiations. The important thing to ensure is that throughout any nuclear negotiations on the reduction of trade barriers full weight is given by the negotiators to political and strategic factors as well as to economic factors.

13. It may be that as a result of a joint discussion by North Atlantic countries of the problem of further reductions in trade barriers, the United States and Canada might agree to make unilateral tariff reductions.

14. Since the goal of the North Atlantic countries should be greater freedom of movement within the North Atlantic community not only of goods and money, but also of men, the North Atlantic countries might also study what steps they might usefully take to increase freedom of migration between the North Atlantic countries. The arguments against a preferential North Atlantic trading system do not apply to a preferential North Atlantic migration system. The immigration policies of virtually every country in the world are based on discriminations and preferences and no Canadian Government would propose the application to international migration of the most favoured nation principle.

15. (I am tempted to suggest that the North Atlantic countries should agree that by, say, 1961 they will establish complete freedom of migration within the North Atlantic community. One advantage of Canada and the United States agreeing to such an objective would be that they would have a direct and compelling interest in supporting during the next ten years policies which would be calculated to diminish the desire of Western Europeans to emigrate to North America. This means that Canada and the United States would have an even greater and more compelling interest than they have today in ensuring that Western Europe were defensible and prosperous.)

au sous-secrétaire d'État adjoint aux Affaires extérieures

Counsellor, Embassy in United States, to Assistant Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

PERSONAL & CONFIDENTIAL Washington, September 10, 1951

Dear Charles [Ritchie]:

Since our talk on the telephone the other day about NATO Council's consideration of "the future development of NATO (other than in connection with defence plans)", I have been trying to clarify my own thinking on this subject. The conclusions which I have reached are perhaps not very clear or novel, but I think that they might possibly fit into thoughts generated in your more fertile mind.

The main purpose of the Council's discussing this item, as I understand it, is to try to think beyond the realization of the defence plans which are now projected or being put into effect and to map out the broader aims towards which the members of this alliance should strive. Recognizing that the attainment of military strength has of necessity been given priority in the first two years of the Treaty's existence, it is now apparently intended that an attempt should be made to chart the activities of NATO in non-military fields, particularly to provide a broader and more popular basis for support among the general public. I think that there is general agreement that the purpose of this kind of discussion should not be to establish any new institutions until there is a clearer appreciation and closer agreement as to what should be done. In other words, we have to proceed from the assumption that at present there are organs enough and the problem is to provide the existing organs with appropriate tunes to play.

As I mentioned in our conversation, it seems to me that the most immediate problem requiring consideration are the consequences of the impact on the economic equilibrium of the democratic nations and of the NATO countries in particular of the accelerated defence programmes which are now being put into effect. Article 2, of course, in its second sentence requires the signatories to "seek to eliminate conflict in their international economic policies" and to "encourage economic collaboration between any or all of them." This will naturally necessitate discussion of the problem of inflation as a matter of immediate concern. Although such a discussion may possibly have embarrassing repercussions, particularly in bringing out the need for further transfers of economic aid to the countries of Western Europe to meet their more dire economic needs, this discussion could also, in my opinion, lead to an emphasis being laid upon the necessity of increasing production, and in particular of making better use of any idle capacity which may still exist in NATO countries. I am sure it will be argued that this question of inflation has already been worried over by every NATO Government and is also being dealt with by existing international bodies such as the International Materials Conference, the I.M.F., the F.E.B., etc. However, it does seem to me that people in Canada as well as in other NATO countries would be encouraged by a statement by the Council that a study of the means of coping with the inflationary effects of the defence programme is to be made a special concern of say the F.E.B. and other appropriate NATO bodies.[59]

The first portion of Article 2, as you know, requires the signatories to contribute towards "the further development of peaceful and friendly international relations by strengthening their free institutions", by bringing about a better understanding of their principles, and "by promoting conditions of stability and well-being". To redefine these general objectives in more specific terms has been a difficulty which we have had to face all along. It does seem to me, however, that the time is coming when we have to make a real effort to define in more specific terms what the North Atlantic Treaty stands for, as well as the things it opposes. It seems to me that what divides us above all from the Soviet System and its present aggressive manifestations are the following:

(a) our sincere desire for peace, as against their interest in prolonged and continuous conflict; and

(b) our moral conceptions, particularly our conception of freedom of the individual and of the relationship of the individual to the Community and state.[60]

[59] Note marginale :/Marginal note:
[I] agree with this [C.S.A. Ritchie]

[60] Note marginale :/Marginal note:
I think this is a point which should be worked in somewhere in the Minister's speech. Now is the moment to give it emphasis. [C.S.A. Ritchie]

If I were to try to choose three symbols for the things for which we stand, I would choose peace, freedom and hope (hope of greater unity). These three symbols, in my mind, are all interconnected and related to our view of history and of the purposes of human living.

I was very encouraged by the tone set by Mr. Acheson at the conclusion of the San Francisco conference when he gave clear and sincere recognition to the limitations under which diplomacy operates these days and referred to "the peace of God that passeth all understanding". Even though the North Atlantic community now looks as if it is going to be divided more than ever, with the addition of Turkey, between religious sects and conformities, I still believe that the moral issues should be faced and defined in terms which appeal in their simplicity and sincerity as a real challenge to Communist dogmas.

What I have said probably adds little or nothing to the imprecise ideas which we are all trying to develop, but reduced to simple political terms it seems to me that the North Atlantic group of nations, having set as its first objective the development of a defence system strong enough to deter aggression and to keep the peace, should go on to claim and exercise leadership of world opinion (or at least that part of the world to which the democratic world still has access) in the political, economic, social and moral fields.

Institutionally, the attainment of such objectives does not necessarily, in my opinion, require any radical departure from the present organization of international relations. It does require improved methods of intergovernmental co-operation and consultation so that the leadership of the North Atlantic Community is not exercised by the United States Government alone but through its properly constituted bodies, such as the Council and its Deputies.

I do not share entirely the ideas apparently held by Mr. Stikker, as reported from London, that the "North Atlantic Community" should be developed to counter French inspired moves towards European unity through federation. I think that there is a real impetus to this movement toward unity in Western Europe based upon the necessities of survival. Canada, the United Kingdom and the United States are not, at least at present, under the influence of a similar order of necessity to consider political federation or something like it as an immediate objective. I think, therefore, that while adequate safeguards should be made against an undue domination of any Western European group by a remilitarized Germany, the idea of a "Western European Community" consisting at least of France, Italy, Benelux, Western Germany, Norway and Denmark should be encouraged. Once this is accomplished it would be easier to judge what advantages would be gained from developing a new political regrouping on a trans-Atlantic basis.

Yours ever,

GEORGE [IGNATIEFF]

Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to High Commission in United Kingdom

LETTER E-3224 Ottawa, October 2, 1951

CONFIDENTIAL

NORTH ATLANTIC COMMUNITY

It may be useful to have on your files some record of the discussions of this matter that took place in Ottawa during the recent North Atlantic Council meetings (other than those discussions which were recorded in the meetings of the Council itself) together with some of the working papers which were produced.[61]

2. The Council decided on Monday September 17, at the suggestion of Mr. Acheson, to set up immediately a Committee consisting of representatives of Belgium, Canada, Italy, Netherlands, Norway and the Chairman of the Council Deputies. This Committee of Ministers met briefly that evening. It had before it some notes based on Mr. Acheson's statement and entitled "Suggested Membership of the Committee proposed by Mr. Acheson on Item VI" (Document A attached).†

3. The Belgian Minister of Finance, Mr. van Houtte, took the chair (on behalf of Mr. van Zeeland who did not come to any of the Committee meetings). The other Ministers present were Mr. Pearson (Canada), Mr. Pella (Italy), Dr. Stikker (Netherlands), Mr. Lange (Norway). The Committee had a general discussion relating both to substance and procedure and decided to set up a Subcommittee of officials to draft a statement regarding the North Atlantic community and the continuing terms of reference of the Committee itself.

4. The Subcommittee met first at 10:00 a.m. the following morning. Baron Snoy of Belgium took the chair, assisted by Mr. Scheyven. The other countries were represented as follows: Italy by Magistrati and Gardini, the Netherlands by Stuyt and Van der Beugel, Norway by Raeder, and Canada by Plumptre assisted at times by Deutsch and LePan when they could get away from other pressing work. The Secretary was Nielsen of the staff of the Council Deputies. No other representative of the Chairman of the Council Deputies came to any of the meetings but Mr. Achilles made a few changes in one or two of the drafts as they flew by.

5. The Subcommittee had before it a document which had been prepared overnight by the Secretary: "Rough Notes on Meeting of Council Committee on Item VI, 17 September, 1951, at 9:30 p.m." (Document B).† After a short general discussion the Chairman proposed that two members of the Committee (Plumptre and Magistrati) should act as a drafting sub-committee. Plumptre said that [Deux lignes de l'original étaient illisibles./Two lines of original were illegible] statement. Subcommittee readily accepted this suggestion.

6. Accordingly, Plumptre produced his draft (Document C).† This really consisted of two halves. The first half, made up of four paragraphs, consisted of some material which had been requested a fortnight previously by Mr. Pearson and prepared by Ritchie. It was designed to combat the "Communist peace campaign". The previous evening Mr. Pearson had instructed Plumptre to try to work this into the proposed statement. The second half of the draft that Plumptre produced was material that he had hurriedly dictated earlier that morning. The difference in the tone and texture of the two halves is clear enough! This was immediately noted by the Subcommittee and it was agreed that the first part of the statement should be somewhat curtailed and the latter built up. In addition the Chairman and Plumptre were asked to draw up a draft of the proposed terms of reference.

7. The next meeting of the Subcommittee took place at 3:00 p.m. the same day. A revision of the statement had been produced and for the first time a draft terms of reference (Document D).† It was at this meeting that the Italian representative first presented a request that the statement should include a reference to the "equal status" and "equal footing" of all members of the community and a related reference to the Italian Peace Treaty. At every stage from this point on this question took up most of the discussion. It is scarcely too much to say that on this account the terms of reference did not get any very close scrutiny at any stage. There is no doubt that the statement got much closer scrutiny.

8. There was a meeting of the Ministerial Committee at 6:00 p.m. on Tuesday at which the process of cutting down the first half of the statement and expanding the second half was carried forward. During the discussion of the Italian issue Mr. Pearson put forward the form of words which eventually found their way into the final statement at the end of the first paragraph: "All obstacles which hinder such cooperation on an equal footing should be removed". Nevertheless the Italians were not diverted from their attempts to get a specific reference to the Italian Treaty either into the declaration itself or into an annex. Discussion of the Italian issue was so prolonged that the meeting had to be adjourned so that members of the Committee could go to Mr. St. Laurent's dinner. The Committee re-assembled in Dr. Stikker's room at 11:00 p.m. and continued the discussion, chiefly on the Italian issue, for another hour and a half. It was, however, during this meeting that a preliminary understanding was reached, at any rate amongst some members of the Committee, to the effect that between the Council meetings in Ottawa and Rome a working group should be set up to carry forward the work in London or Paris, or both. Further, the Ministers, or some of them, appeared to agree that a further meeting of their own Committee ought to take place in Paris just before the General Assembly of the United Nations. At this meeting also the Ministers resurrected some sections of the first half of the statement which had by now become rather emaciated.

9. Accordingly, on Wednesday, September 19, the draft Declaration, together with draft terms of reference, were submitted to Council (Council Document C 7-D/18).† The records of Council will indicate the amendments moved by various members of Council. These amendments were then referred to the drafting Subcommittee for incorporation into a final draft. The only amendment which showed signs of causing serious difficulty was the United Kingdom proposal to include a reference to the "purposes and principles of the United Nations". The Portuguese called attention to the fact that they were not members of the United Nations. However, the reference was changed so that it read "the purposes and principles of the Charter of the United Nations" to which not even the Portuguese could object since it was the exact language of a part of the preamble of the North Atlantic Treaty.

10. Hence the final document was produced. For convenience a copy is attached (Document E).[62]

Note de l'ambassadeur aux États-Unis

Memorandum by Ambassador in United States

SECRET Washington, October 15, 1951

SOME THOUGHTS ON CANADA, THE NORTH ATLANTIC COMMUNITY, AND ARTICLE 2 OF THE NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY

1. I encounter concern in Washington about the emphasis which is being laid in Canada on action to "implement" Article 2 of the North Atlantic Treaty, with the object of developing or integrating "the North Atlantic community" in non-military respects. As a result of the discussions during the meeting of the Council in Ottawa, a ministerial committee of five, with singularly vague terms of reference, will shortly be faced with the task of making recommendations to the Council on what should be done. That is the reason for this paper.

2. I have long been troubled by frequent Canadian references to the need for early action under Article 2. Although there is support in the State Department for an attempt to develop practicable methods, it does not seem to reach to the policy-making level, and I can detect no interest in the Department of Defense or in other Departments concerned with NATO in one way or another. I have reason to fear that in consequence the view is gaining ground here that there is a lack of proportion in Canadian policy towards NATO, involving too little concentration on the urgency of building effective defences against the Soviet danger and the diversion of too much time and energy to talk about hazy ideas. This might lead to a belief that Canada was trying to divert attention from alleged deficiencies in the Canadian military contribution to NATO, such as the absence of national military service, although I have not heard as yet any such suggestion.

3. The Secretary of State, in a broadcast on October 7th, put in three sentences the priorities which currently guide the policy of the United States as follows;

[62] Non imprimé./Not printed. Voir/See United States, Department of State, Bulletin, Volume XXV, No. 640, October 1, 1951, pp. 524-525.

"There are two necessities of the hour which we must keep before ourselves with absolute clarity: one is the need for speed in building our strength so that we can pass through this period of danger as quickly as possible. The other is the need for unshakeable unity among the free nations. There is general agreement that unity is essential to freedom, and that unity is a good quality, but the times call for action, not abstraction."

4. I can speak with some authority on what was understood by Article 2 in the course of the negotiations of the Treaty. There was initially strong resistance by the United States to the inclusion of an article of this description and little interest on the part of the other governments. In the outcome the article was drafted in a form which does not require any collective action. It is primarily a pledge by the governments that in their own national policies they will give effect to the economic and political undertakings set forth in the article. It was recognized also that two or more of the parties might on occasion jointly further these undertakings, especially those relating to economic collaboration. A reason stressed at the time in my instructions from Ottawa was that a reference of this sort in the treaty was desirable as a general cover for a very broad trade agreement between Canada and the United States, a project then under serious discussion. Throughout the negotiations there was resistance to any suggestion that the adoption of the article would lead to the establishment of special NATO agencies. The Secretary of State would have much preferred that the substance of the article be included in the preamble, and it was only with great difficulty that his objections were overcome to putting it in the treaty itself. In presenting the treaty for approval by the Senate the State Department emphasized that the article did not involve the creation of any new general economic or cultural agencies.

5. I should hope that the report of the ministerial committee would recite the difficulties in the way of collective NATO action under the article. I need not rehearse the problems inherent in the membership of NAT countries in other international organizations charged with functions of an economic and cultural nature, such as OEEC, GATT, ECOSOC, UNESCO, IMF, The Economic Commission for Europe, and so on. (One might add the British Commonwealth and the Organization of American States to this list.) The report could also emphasize that among the North Atlantic group the economics and diplomacy of defence, their collaboration in which depends on Articles 3 and 5 of the Treaty, will for a long time dominate the scene, and that this is the responsibility of other NATO agencies. The committee, I think, should do its best to kill the idea that collective action should soon be expected or desired to "implement" Article 2. Might not an effort be made in documents and public statements to avoid in future references to "the implementation of Article 2"?

6. It is clear that progress towards the integration of the North Atlantic countries cannot be achieved for some time except in the context of integrating their capacity to resist Soviet power. The North Atlantic alliance is now getting ready to be able to fight a total war with the Soviet Union, in the hope that adequate preparation will prevent the war from ever taking place. Our military aim is to have in being on any hypothetical D-day a force large enough to ensure that D-day, like tomorrow, never comes. The preparation must be on such a scale that, if it is successful, we shall have achieved a high degree of integration without simultaneously seeking integration of a sort that can definitely be labelled "non-defence". When that stage is reached, there should be the best opportunity for a thorough examination of what more can be done to cement the North Atlantic group.

7. Members of the alliance, however, can encourage the application in non-military matters of the undertakings of Article 2 of the Treaty without setting this as an aim of NATO agencies. Thus the report of the ministerial committee might propose that, when questions bearing on these undertakings arise in other international organizations, the members of NATO therein represented should do their best to see that the application is furthered. The report might suggest that there should at times be preparatory consultation between governments on such issues and also that the delegations of NAT countries should maintain contact on them at conferences. None of the international bodies before which matters of this sort are likely to come includes all the members of NATO; those members represented in any of them might act as guardians of the interests of absent members in connection with the furtherance of Article 2. This suggestion admittedly is window-dressing, but the ministerial committee will have to come up with something positive in its report!

8. A more productive but more difficult approach to the problems before the ministerial committee is to recognize that, while early progress cannot now be made towards the creation of NATO institutions with supra-national authority, the closer integration of some countries of Western Europe is a practical possibility the attainment of which would serve the interests of the North Atlantic community. In Article 2 of the Treaty the undertaking of the parties to "encourage economic collaboration between any or all of them" was deliberately inserted. The greater integration of the sub-region within the North Atlantic area which is composed of France, the Low Countries, Western Germany (not yet, of course, a part of the North Atlantic community in the Treaty sense), and Italy, would be in accordance with the intent of the Article.

9. The idea of the creation of "a political Commonwealth of the North Atlantic" is in present circumstances so remote from attainment that to discuss it as an aim of current policy is unrealistic. In contrast, there is a real aliveness in the idea of a Western European Commonwealth. It comes within the comprehension of the ordinary citizen of those countries of Western Europe which have for generations been subjected to periodic military occupation and have provided the battlefields and a large share of the casualties of many great wars. The idea, furthermore, has the advantage of strong public support in the United States. In addition to its greater realism, it fits into NATO defence planning, and important moves to bring it about on a functional basis (Schuman and Pleven plans) have already been made.

10. This brings me to a point which may be of great political importance. I detect in some at least of the thinking in Ottawa the view that the limited aim of Western European integration and the larger aim of North Atlantic integration are mutually inconsistent, or at any rate in some degree conflicting. Certainly there is an impression in Washington that Canada is cool towards projects of European integration. If this impression is incorrect, steps should be taken to remove it.

11. One of our former difficulties in approaching projects for the integration of Western Europe has greatly diminished. It is now clearly recognized that the United Kingdom will not be a full participant in any such schemes, and the reasons for this are well understood. The idea of a North Atlantic community would, in my view, be strengthened rather than undermined by the creation in Western Europe of a new great power, comprising roughly the territories of the Empire of Charlemagne. Such a power, tied in a strong defensive alliance with the United States, the United Kingdom, Canada, and the Scandinavian countries, might in time alter beneficially the entire balance of world politics. The immediate steps towards its attainment, all of which require action before the end of 1951, are bringing the Schuman Plan into operation, getting agreement on the project of the European Army, and the establishment of the new relationship with Western Germany.

12. What I have said has taken me a considerable distance from the problems directly before the ministerial committee on the North Atlantic community. My remarks have been prompted in part by reading the departmental Policy Paper on "Western Europe and the North Atlantic Community", with much of which I find myself in disagreement. I hope, therefore, that several of the propositions stated in the latter part of this paper will not guide the Canadian attitude in the ministerial committee. If they were to be accepted, I think that we should find ourselves drifting into a series of disagreements with the United States, none of them perhaps of much individual importance, which would have the cumulative effect of diminishing our influence in Washington. We should be regarded, to use the words of the Secretary of State quoted above, as indulging in abstraction, not action.

13. As to the direct terms of reference of the ministerial committee, on point (a) about co-ordination of and consultation on foreign policy, doubtless some general formula can be devised, but it is not likely to mean much; it would be certainly impracticable to envisage a uniform system of consultation applicable alike to Portugal and Iceland on the one hand and the United States and United Kingdom on the other hand. As to item (b), I have nothing to add to what I have suggested above — agreement to encourage the application of the undertakings of Article 2 in other international organizations, to apply them in national policies, and to look with favour on economic and other forms of integration in Western Europe. As to item (c), I have nothing to suggest that would be of value in the NATO context.

CONFIDENTIAL London, October 18, 1951

Dear Charles [Ritchie],

I arrived here Sunday afternoon after a quick and pleasant trip, to find a warm welcome waiting for me. Ed Ritchie and Saul Rae met me at the airport; Dana [Wilgress] has invited me to lunch twice this week.

The Working Group on the North Atlantic Community has already had two meetings this week and will have two more. From the organizational point of view it is starting out along exactly the sort of lines we had hoped. I am, of course, being guided by the discussion, both of organization and substance, which took place in the Minister's office on October 11 — two days before my departure. I have made some notes on that meeting and I attach two copies. I would be grateful if you would look them over. I want to make sure that they are a reasonably accurate record of what took place.

I have talked over these notes with Dana and Saul. Dana had a number of helpful suggestions to make, but there is only one comment that I think I need to mention to you. This refers to the last two sentences of paragraph 4(c).

I put these two sentences in very deliberately because they contain the replies which the Minister gave to two questions that I raised with him: first, what was his own "philosophy" of Article 2; and secondly, did he feel that other Ministers agreed with that philosophy.

In spite of his reassuring answer at the time, I did not feel too certain that other Ministers would accept anything approaching "loose federation" (the phrase he used) even as a long run objective, and I now find that Dana feels the same thing very strongly. Apparently when Dana was in Ottawa for the Council meeting he was spoken to by at least two of the other Ministers directly concerned who spoke to him pretty vigorously along lines which would indicate, in the face of newspaper stories which used the word "federation", that they themselves wish no part in it. I thought I had better send you this piece of information just in case there was some divergence of view of which our Minister was not aware, and which might emerge to his embarrassment at Rome or subsequently.

In regard to paragraph 7(b) of my notes, I should perhaps add that the Working Group is now so organized that none of the countries are likely to wish to put in papers. Submissions to the group are all made orally (everybody welcomed this) and notes are being kept which will serve as a basis for interim reports to Ministers at their first meeting.

One last point, I intended, as you know, to make contacts with Norman Robertson, Towers and Clark before I left. You and I had a talk with Norman, but I failed to contact the other two; I was unwell when my appointment with Towers came around, and Clark did not seem very anxious to discuss the matter so I did not press it. Nevertheless I feel that for the protection of our Department and ultimately for our Minister, there should be some sort of information given at an early stage to the other Departments concerned.

I wonder whether you would consider giving copies of the attached notes, on a more or less personal basis, to Deutsch, Beatty and Beaupré, and possibly to somebody in the Department of Citizenship and Immigration. If this were done it would, I think, be important to delete the last two sentences of paragraph 4(c) to which I make reference above, and possibly one or two other deletions which you would want to make. I would, however, feel quite disturbed if there were no inter-departmental information given in advance about the current work on the North Atlantic Community. There may be certain points which will worry people in other Departments — although not seriously I think. In any case we have got to face up to these worries and it is better to do so immediately than to allow all sorts of dark suspicions to develop. Incidentally if other Departments have any comments to make on the attached notes, I think we should welcome them at this early stage.

Greetings to all.

Yours sincerely,
WYNNE PLUMPTRE

Notes du chef de la Direction économique

Notes by Head, Economic Division

CONFIDENTIAL [London], October 15, 1951

COMMITTEE ON THE NORTH ATLANTIC COMMUNITY
GENERAL PLAN OF WORK

1. On October 11 there was a meeting in the Minister's office to review the coming work of this Committee, and of its Working Group which was to be set up in London the following week, which I was to attend, and of which I would probably become chairman. In addition to the Minister, Mr. Heeney, Mr. Ritchie, Mr. Pick and myself were present.

2. The Minister approved the proposal that the Working Group should, if possible, be conducted very informally. Scope should be given, not merely for formal "national" presentations, but also for a pooling of any ideas on the North Atlantic Community which might be put forward on an individual or personal basis. All the proposals and ideas should as far as possible be compiled, together with some notes and comments on them, into a report for consideration by the Ministerial Committee at its meeting early in November. The Committee could then give some guidance to the Working Group as to which lines of endeavour seemed profitable and which unprofitable.

3. It was, of course, understood that although individual members of the Working Group might put ideas or even papers into the pot, the report of the Group, for consideration by Ministers, would not — or not necessarily — attribute these ideas to the member or members that had produced them. The report would simply compile the various proposals, some good and some bad, together with some comments on them, for preliminary consideration, and for preliminary winnowing, by the Ministers themselves.

4. In addition to this compilation of specific proposals and ideas the Minister asked that the Working Group should:

(a) Make an early contact with O.E.E.C. (Marjolin).

(b) Compile a roster of chief activities of all the existing agencies in which NATO countries were cooperating with each other — running from the Benelux operation through to agencies of the U.N. Special attention might well be paid to the work done by the Western Union organization in Brussels on non-military matters.

(c) Engage, perhaps at the outset of its work, in an exploratory discussion of the philosophy or principles underlying the idea of the North Atlantic Community and the apparently growing interest in Article 2 of the Treaty. In this regard the Minister said that he himself was certain that, during the next fifty years, the NATO countries and probably other free countries as well were bound to come much closer together, perhaps into some form of loose federation, whether by process of gradual growth or as a result of some cataclysm, and it seemed sensible and desirable to try to look ahead and foster this sort of tendency. He felt confident other Ministers would be in sympathy with this as a long term goal, although there might be all sorts of differences and objections about the means and pace of attaining it.

5. The Minister emphasized that he did not expect his own Committee to make a final report at the next meeting of the Council in Rome. It would be necessary to make an interim report at that meeting, and this should include as much material as practicable, but a final report would probably have to await the following meeting. In any case, he did not wish the Working Group to be rushed.

6. In regard to the "pooling of ideas" operation, the Minister ran through a list of most of the ideas that have been put forward from one quarter or another in the past, and made comments as follows:

(a) Political

(i) More frequent and regular meetings of the Council. This recommendation could and should be included in the Committee's report.

(ii) Increased political consultation and exchange of information amongst Council members. This was desirable but it should not necessarily be extended by each NATO country to all other NATO countries on the same basis. Moreover it could and would extend beyond that group of countries; there was no fence around NATO. Finally, there were limits to which some countries, notably U.S.A., could consult with or even inform other countries regarding their intentions.

(iii) Use of the Council Deputies for (ii) above. Again, this was desirable, but it had to be recalled that some Deputies were in a quite different position from others, depending on the political and constitutional practices of their countries. The Portuguese Deputy might be in a much better position to make commitments than the Deputy from the U.K. or the U.S.A.

(iv) Use of the Commonwealth as a pattern for NATO. It might be well to warn other NATO countries against hoping to learn too much from the Commonwealth. At any international gathering, "Commonwealth Cooperation" consisted of "one meeting and two cocktail parties" for the Commonwealth Delegations. Insofar as the Commonwealth countries work in harmony, it is on the basis of the deep common roots of their parliamentary systems and personal freedoms. Further, it should be realized that no really controversial subject is ever touched in a meeting of Commonwealth Prime Ministers; a "burden-sharing" exercise would be out of the question! Moreover NATO has already gone far farther in setting up centralized machinery than the Commonwealth has ever gone, or than Canada has ever been willing for it to go. Proposals that NATO could learn something from the Commonwealth seem to come from the U.S.A.; it would be desirable if State Department could circulate papers to NATO countries as C.R.O. circulates them to the Commonwealth, but it is doubtful how far State Department can go in this direction.

(b) Economic

(v) Consultation amongst NATO members in the economic field, and an attempt to bring a "NATO point of view" increasingly into U.N. specialized agencies, I.M.C., G.A.T.T., etc. through the instructions issued to delegations from NATO countries to these bodies. This might be a desirable objective, but if anything were done it would have to be done with the greatest circumspection to avoid the suspicion, especially amongst under-developed countries, that the NATO (imperialist) powers were ganging-up. It might be possible for each NATO country to review, in a new light, the behaviour of its representatives in the various international agencies; but this, in turn, would raise many difficulties — organizational, inter-departmental, etc.

(vi) Some sort of extension of subsidized travel (migration) arrangements amongst NATO countries. It was considered that there would be serious objections to any such proposals; but at any rate they were worth looking at.

(vii) Intergovernmental agreements covering private investments. The U.S. had a habit of sponsoring such agreements and, if they had any use at all, this seemed to be in relation to relatively irresponsible or shaky governments of the Latino type rather than North Atlantic governments. However, there could be no objection to looking at any suggestion that might be put forward.

(c) Social

(viii) Facilitation of general travel (visas, etc.). This was something that might well be examined; but the legislative limitations on the U.S. Administration (McCarran Act) should be kept in mind. In this, as well as other fields, there might be quite a good purpose in reviewing the legislation and administrative arrangements in the various NATO countries which positively prevent the North Atlantic community from developing.

(ix) Fellowships, scholarships and student exchanges. Before embarking on any new arrangements for NATO purposes it would be useful, at least in the case of Canada, to have a complete review of all existing facilities, financial and otherwise, governmental and non-governmental, that could be used for these purposes. This review should not omit military training (staff-college) arrangements.

(x) Proposals leading in the direction of "common citizenship" amongst some, although not necessarily all, NATO countries. There are grave difficulties here but, at any rate as a long-term possibility, these proposals are worth considering.

(d) Information

(xi) Whatever was done in this field it was most important to keep in mind that the basic objective should always be the building up of a long-range community, rather than a mere temporary surge of strength in the present cold-war against the U.S.S.R.

7. Two other points arose in relation to the pooling-of-ideas activity:

(a) The minister agreed that day-to-day reports on the back-and-forth progress of the Working Group's discussions would not be useful and were not expected;

(b) The Minister said that, if it seemed desirable at some stage for a Canadian paper to be put into the Working Group for discussion, it might well include a good deal of the material that LePan had put into his proposed Draft Statement on Item 6 on the last Council Meeting Agenda (dated September 13); however, the material might have to be recast and, in any case, care would have to be taken to remove those parts to which other Departments had objected.

SECRET AND PERSONAL London, October 30, 1951

Dear Charles [Ritchie]:

I want to thank you for your letter of October 27th, and for your kindness in sending me a copy of Hume's memorandum entitled "Some Thoughts on Canada, the North Atlantic Community, and Article 2 of the North Atlantic Treaty".

I wish you would let Hume know how much I appreciate the trouble he has taken in preparing this memorandum. It has thrown a beam of light through the fog surrounding this subject ever since I was invited by Ted Achilles to attend that dinner at which he broached the subject of the future of the North Atlantic Community. This was the first I heard of the whole idea, so Washington cannot accuse us of taking the initiative.

As you know, I have long been mystified as to what exactly was the reason why we sponsored Article 2 of the Treaty. Ever since I became Canadian Deputy I have not been able to obtain instructions as to what position I should take whenever the question of "implementation of Article 2" came up for discussion. I have felt embarrassed and mystified, but Hume's memorandum serves to put the position in a better perspective.

There is much else in the memorandum with which I am in agreement. I have never been able to take seriously the proposal for closer integration of the North Atlantic countries. The reasons why the European countries should integrate are (1) the threat of Russian aggression, and (2) their economic problems resulting from the loss of overseas markets in manufactured goods.

Canada and the United States are threatened by the first factor, but much less immediately than the European countries because there is either the Atlantic Ocean or the wilderness of Siberia between them and the Red Army. While, therefore, the stimulus for the close integration of the European countries is powerfully present, it is much less so in the case of the North American members of the North Atlantic community. The conception of that community is a very grand one and originated, I believe, with Walter Lippmann, but he never envisaged it as anything more than a close alliance, which in essence it is.

It is when Hume begins to talk about integration of the continental countries of Western Europe that I begin to have more doubts. The Schuman Plan and the Pleven Plan may be considered to be the first steps in the creation in Western Europe of a great new power "comprising roughly the territories of the Empire of Charlemagne". However, this development is one which is fraught with some danger. If the threat of Russian aggression should be removed, there immediately would arise a clash between France and Germany for the hegemony of that power group to which Hume refers. This could only be avoided if the United Kingdom could take part in this closer integration as, in the eyes of the French, a make-weight to Germany. Since I have been in London, I have seen that this is impossible, because the United Kingdom has no more desire of becoming embroiled in close integration with the countries on the Continent than Canadians are likely to have in becoming embroiled in a closer integration of the North Atlantic countries.

I detect in the approach of some Americans to closer Atlantic integration a trace of American imperialism. Let us have, they seem to say, a more closely-knit Atlantic community because the United States will be dominant in that community and can call what tune it likes. A more closely-knit Western Europe, however, savours to them too much of a third force.

I shall look forward to receiving in due course your comments on Hume's memorandum. In the meantime, I thank you very much for letting me have an advance copy of this most interesting document.

Yours sincerely,

DANA [WILGRESS]

COMMITTEE ON NORTH ATLANTIC COMMUNITY

Following for Heeney from Plumptre, Begins: Arrangements are now being made for committee to meet in Paris on November 3 and 5. I doubt that further ministerial meetings will be needed until just before Rome, when a draft interim report would be considered.

2. The Working Group has been very busy indeed and will present a report of considerable bulk and some substance at Paris. I believe it will lay adequate basis for some immediate action and for the preparation of the interim committee report at Rome. Copies will be mailed to you without delay.

3. As previously agreed, we have not been sending you reports of the detailed work of the group. I see (your 1916 of October 27)† that Achilles must have been sending lists of topics under consideration to Washington which must have been rather hair-raising because so many of the items were hare-brained. The work of the group has closely followed the lines, both in form and substance, agreed upon with the Minister before I started.

4. I have suggested to the Minister that the Working Group as such might be wound up at the Paris meeting with further work being handled by the Deputies (five or twelve as required). At present, apart from a host of ideas and some drafting from Achilles, the Canadians (Rae, Ritchie and myself) are supplying all the initiative and most of the drafting and a good many of the ideas; it is a bit risky to be too far out in front. Further, if the Working Group were disbanded it would relieve the difficulties created by the membership of the Belgian senator (who has not turned up yet). If the group were disbanded I would imagine the work would go forward on a fairly routine basis, instead of the present high pressure.

5. If the group disbands it might be useful for me to stay over here a few days after the Paris meeting but there would be no special point in my remaining here and going to Rome. Of course I shall stay as long as the Minister wishes, but meanwhile I would appreciate your advice. Ends.

COMMITTEE ON NORTH ATLANTIC COMMUNITY

Copies of Working Group's preliminary report to Ministers (Document AC/10-D/1 of October 30th)† have gone forward to you by air bag. The following comments may be of some value as background.

2. Section A—co-ordination and consultation on foreign policy. The main item of importance in this part of the report is the reference to the possibility of associating parliamentary representatives in the NATO countries in some way with appropriate phases of the work of NATO. While none of the suggestions in the report are attributed to individual country representatives, you should know that this suggestion was put forward by the Norwegian deputy. You will note that the report makes no recommendations on this subject, and that further discussion of this point has been left to Ministers.

3. In Section B, dealing with economic, financial and social co-operation, perhaps the major item is the reference on page 19 of the report to the suggestion by "one member of the Working Group" (the Italian representative) that the question of migration should be more fully explored. The proposal outlined is taken verbatim from a paper submitted by the Italian representative which, in addition to the points specified under paragraphs A and B, and the additional proposal for the establishment of a NATO labour exchange, contained the following preamble which may be of interest -

QUOTE

1. The problem of the excess of manpower confronting some NATO countries, and Italy in particular, is one of the most important and urgent to be met in order to promote conditions of economic stability and well-being, both during and after the present period of the defence effort. The solution of such a problem would eliminate the main source of economic instability and social unrest and improve at the same time both the production of essential goods and the execution of those works of common utility which some NATO countries have difficulties in carrying out owing to their shortage of manpower.

This situation has been recognized also by NATO in Document FEB D(51)51† dated September 3rd, 1951 (paragraph 147 (c)).

2. This problem has already been explored again and again by international organizations. The OEEC and the Council of Europe have recently given their attention to it but without practical results.

In December 1950 the Council of the OEEC entrusted its Manpower Committee with the task of laying down plans for a better utilization of the European manpower.

3. Last year the Assembly of the Council of Europe, after having considered this problem, recommended to the Council of Ministers to have prepared a multilateral agreement on social security and to consider several proposals directed to facilitate the movement of persons and therefore a better utilization of manpower.

4. So far, practical results in this field have been only achieved by the IRO which has settled more than a million displaced persons. UNQUOTE.

4. It may be taken that this question will be raised by Mr. Pellnudriella at the Ministerial meeting.

5. With regard to Section B (2)—co-operation in the social field—you will note that the Working Group was only able to list the principal areas explored in this field by the Brussels Treaty Organization, and to suggest that the Ministerial Committee may wish to consider giving instructions for further study, which would clearly have to be carried out by specialists in this field if it is decided that further exploration is desirable.

6. Section C—(culture and public information, and part 4 - principles) are based largely on initial drafts by Achilles. Your attention is drawn particularly to annex C of the report, headed "possible immediate objects in the field of culture and public information". This annex was prepared by request at the last moment by the NATO Information Service, and it should be made clear that the Working Group did not have an opportunity of considering it. This will be made clear to Ministers. Since, however, the suggestions made relate to one of the fields which the Committee of Ministers was asked to explore, it was decided to attach these suggestions as an annex to the report.

Repeat London No. 207.

COMMITTEE ON THE NORTH ATLANTIC COMMUNITY

Following from Plumptre, Begins: The ministers met morning and afternoon of November 3rd and completed their review of the Working Group report. They disposed of it as follows:

Section A on political coordination and consultation was generally approved. Some minor modifications will be made in the committee's report to Rome. The ministers spent some time discussing possibilities of associating parliamentary representatives but agreed that in view of wide differences in the constitutions of NAT countries and in the strength of Communist parties it would be difficult to find ground for common action. The matter has been referred back to officials for further consideration.

Section B (I) economic and financial matters. The first three sections (on community, implementation of re-armament, on worldwide responsibilities of NAT countries, and on collaboration with other agencies) received general approval and are to be referred to FEB for comments.

Section 4 on trade and commercial policy was criticized as lying largely outside the scope of possible NATO action but is also being referred to FEB.

Sections 5, 6 and 7, relating to industrial production, employment, prices and raw materials, have been referred back to officials for "later consideration" (i.e. no further consideration until after Rome). The same disposition was made of Sections 9 and 10 on finance and long term investment.

Section 8 on migration was discussed at some length and Spofford was in a position to give some encouragement. The matter has been referred back to officials to be followed up immediately with particular reference to a forthcoming visit to Europe of members of the relevant committee of the United States House of Representatives. The matter will of course have to be carried forward on a basis broader than the Committee of Five.

Section B (II) social cooperation. The ministers approved the recommendation of the Working Group that further study be given to the work of the Brussels Treaty Organization and Nordic group "with a view to deciding which parts of the work which may be taken up and applied amongst any or all of the other NAT countries".

Section C7C collaboration in culture and public information. The committee gave general approval to the rather vague principles embodied in paragraph 20(A) of the Working Group report. It referred back for further consideration by officials the preliminary proposals for "concrete measures in the cultural fields" paragraph 20(C) including contacts between private groups, exchange of students, professors, journalists, et al. It also referred back the proposals of NATIS (paragraph 20(B)) for a broad three year information programme and for some immediate projects, with the request that these should be taken up and carefully screened in the full Council Deputies before submission to governments.

Part IV principles.

These were given general approval but were referred back to officials to be strengthened and tightened.

2. The committee in general accepted the Working Group report, and agreed that it should be circulated to all members of the Council Deputies after it had been edited so as to eliminate the mistakes and inconsistencies that had arisen due to the speed of its preparation. The ministers also agreed that minutes of their own meetings should be circulated to all deputies.

3. The committee also agreed that their Working Group should be discontinued and that the work at the official level should be carried on by the five Council Deputies and their assistants. The Deputies were asked to prepare a draft report to the Council in Rome and the ministers plan to meet in Rome about three days before the council meeting there to consider this draft.

4. Mr. Pearson held a press conference under the auspices of the NATO Information Service on November 5th, and the press communiqué contained in my immediately following message.† Ends.

THE COMMITTEE ON THE NORTH ATLANTIC COMMUNITY

A draft of an interim report to the Council for consideration by Ministers has now been agreed by the five Deputies and will be circulated shortly. I expect that the Ministers will meet in Rome on Friday morning, November 23.

2. The report consists of the main points put forward in the report of the Working Group together with the directions given by Ministers on November 3 for the disposition of various sections of that report. The only recommendations are that the report should be accepted by Council and that the life of the Committee should be extended with the same terms of reference and a further report made at the next meeting of Council.

3. There are only two points in the draft interim report that need to be called to your attention:

(a) Some new material has been introduced in the section on "migration" now described as "movements of labour". Spofford has recently been able to talk in London to members of the United States House of Representatives Committee concerned with immigration. He found them in general sympathetic and encouraging but sensitive on certain points.

Thus the material in the draft interim report stresses movements of labour for defence purposes and makes no reference to migration; it mentions some of the obstacles and difficulties; and it enumerates three types of labour movement: Temporary (i.e. day-to-day), longer term (a couple of years), and permanent. Spofford apparently hopes that if there is a movement of workers to the United States on a "longer term" basis, ways will be found to allow them to stay permanently and Achilles adds that he thinks this may be done outside immigration quotas.

While some of the new points in this section of the report are of no great interest to us, I believe that it is easier for us to accept than earlier drafts. Incidentally there is no mention of Italian proposals for new machinery. Achilles tells us that United States Administration hope that the forthcoming migration conference in Brussels will produce whatever international machinery may be needed to replace IRO etc., but that policy initiative should be taken in NATO.

(b) The "principles" have been relegated to an annex and, even there, their position is insecure. Achilles is very anxious to get the principles sponsored by the Council with a minimum of change. He says that they embody points to which Mr. Acheson has agreed from time to time and he would like to get Mr. Acheson and other members of the Council to approve them formally.

The Deputies of other members of the Committee are lukewarm or cold. The Netherlands Deputy in particular says that Mr. Stikker is so disappointed with the lack of success of his OEEC declaration for greater production that he is now very wary of high sounding pronouncements.

Chairman, Delegation to North Atlantic Council, to Secretary of State for External Affairs

TELEGRAM EXR-15 Rome, November 28, 1951

The interim report of the North Atlantic Community Committee has now been approved for circulation to the Council and is to be discussed on Wednesday. It briefly summarizes most of the main points raised in the original Working Group report, and calls attention to the following possibilities for further activity by North Atlantic countries:

(a) continuing need for early consultation on political matters;

(b) Deputies to undertake general study of NATO and its relations with other organizations (Stikker urged this with OEEC especially in mind);

(c) defence programmes as a basis for building up spirit of North Atlantic cooperation;

(d) movements of labour;

(e) extension of social and cultural work already undertaken in Brussels Treaty and Nordic groups;

(f) fostering contacts between official bodies, private groups, and individuals concerned with kindred problems; exchange of students and others; measures to facilitate travel.

The only definite recommendations are that the Council should adopt the interim report and continue the committee.

III. COSTING OF DEFENCE REQUIREMENTS FOR SUBMISSIONS TO EXECUTIVE BUREAU, TEMPORARY COUNCIL COMMITTEE

6. The Minister of National Defence said that the NATO Temporary Council Committee (TCC) had set up an Executive Bureau and a Screening and Costing Staff to examine the cost of the Medium Term Defence Plan, determine what economies could be made and assess what more member nations could do in the military field without undue strain.[63] The Executive Bureau had submitted questionnaires regarding national contributions under the Plan to be answered at an early date. The answers would be prepared by the Departments of National Defence and Finance. The costing questionnaire sought information under the headings of military personnel, operation and maintenance, construction and procurement and production, for future years.

Following the meeting of October 2nd, 1951, the Chairman, Chiefs of Staff Committee, had given the Standing Group Canada's views on its proposals for Canadian contributions towards closing the gap.[64] As a result of this and other representations, Standing Group paper SG 20/37,† a revision of the Medium Term Plan incorporating General Eisenhower's views, has been amended. This paper had been forwarded to the Executive Bureau as a basis for the costing exercise. It was in four parts: (1) revised requirements as amended to suit General Eisenhower's requirements; (2) agreed national contributions; (3) proposed expanded national contributions; and (4) a time-phased build-up.

[63] Pour les événements précédents, voir le document 476.
For earlier developments, see Document 476.

[64] Voir le document 391./See Document 391.

The agreed Canadian contributions were correctly shown as:

Navy

1 aircraft carrier	2 cruisers
42 escort vessels	25 coastal escorts
14 minesweepers	40 maritime aircraft

Army

1/3 division by D-Day

203 aircraft

The earlier recommendations in the paper for further Canadian naval contributions had been replaced by a recommendation that Canada contribute 10 escorts towards closing the residual naval gap. The Standing Group had been informed that Canada could not complete any additional escorts by mid-1954.

The paper now showed the agreed R.C.A.F. contribution of 203 aircraft, with a notation that Canada had indicated that, with the utmost endeavour and at the expense of front-line reserves, it could furnish 300 aircraft.

The earlier recommendation in the paper that Canada provide in Europe (in addition to its agreed contribution of 1/3 division by D-Day) 1 2/3 Army divisions by D plus 30, had been replaced by a recommendation that Canada provide an additional 2/3 division by D plus 30 and a further division "subsequent to D plus 30", with the comment that while, if hostilities started without warning, the time required for transportation to Europe made it extremely difficult for North America substantially to increase its contributions by D plus 30, if there were warning or the movement of forces from North America were started before D-Day, Canada (and the United States) would be able to meet the earlier phasing proposed.

The Canadian Chiefs of Staff had advised the Standing Group that the additional 2/3 division should not be shown in SG 20/37 in the manner indicated since General Eisenhower could not count on its availability by D plus 30. They had recommended that it be shown as available subsequent to D plus 30 with a note that, if there were warning or the movement of forces from North America started before D-Day, Canada would be able to meet the earlier phasing. The second division could not be provided until D plus 180 at the earliest.

The appropriate approach to costing the Canadian share of the Medium Term Plan appeared to be to assume that the whole defence budget, less war expenditures on account of the 25th Brigade while engaged on United Nations activities, was primarily for NATO purposes. Since the figures to be given to the Executive Bureau should be as close as possible to those eventually to be announced in Parliament as the defence budget, it was felt that they should have prior governmental approval.

A committee of senior officials — Mr. Drury, General Foulkes and Mr. Bryce — had therefore been set up to make a preliminary screening of estimates so as to ascertain as quickly as possible a reasonable figure for the fulfilment of the 1952-53 portion of Canada's contribution to the Medium Term Plan, and an approximation of the requirement for the two following years. This committee, which would continue to examine the Services' requirements, had produced a preliminary costed plan, "Mark III", in a form suitable for the Executive Bureau.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated.

(Minister's memorandum, November 7, 1951, "Costing of defence requirements — Medium Term Defence Plan — for submission to Temporary Council Committee" and attached "Mark III" — Cabinet Document D-311).

Mark III was similar to Mark V (Cabinet Document D-273†), the 4-year defence programme which the Cabinet had considered on January 24th, 1951 and to which it had given general approval on February 22nd, 1951.[65] It consisted of a summary of the Canadian defence programme up to March 31st, 1955; forecasts of the defence manpower build-up and of the average monthly intake of the active forces during the period; estimates of the total annual costs of the various components of the programme, including mutual aid; a summary of estimated costs under the programme of military personnel, construction, major procurement and production and operation and maintenance; and a breakdown of the estimated major procurement and production costs.

The main differences between Mark V and Mark III were that the latter provided for:

(a) under the heading of the Integrated Force (taking into account the decision to have a full brigade group instead of a battalion in Korea), 1/3 division in Europe, together with the build-up in Canada of 2/3 division and a minimum of reinforcements, indicating that, of this 2/3 division, a brigade group and reinforcement organization were temporarily employed in Korea, and that the element in Canada would provide for the training of reinforcements and rotation for forces in Europe and Korea;

(b) (in accordance with the change of plans made after the preparation of Mark V), all of the 11 R.C.A.F. squadrons (203 aircraft) in Europe to be equipped with F-86's, instead of partly equipped with CF-100's. The CF-100's were to be kept for the air defence squadrons in Canada;

(c) an additional operational training unit for long-range transport personnel;

(d) some re-shuffling of types and numbers of aircraft required, but no overall increase in requirements;

(e) some expansion of the Defence Research Board programme;

(f) increased financial requirements for administration, largely because of the expansion of inspection services with the increased workload, and the inclusion of $40 million to be spent on a new Defence Headquarters up to March 31st, 1955 — the latter proposal requiring consideration as to policy in due course;

(g) inclusion in the defence programme of the approved mutual aid programme and of infrastructure costs and contributions to SHAPE and subordinate commands;

(h) modifications in the forecast of the manpower build-up of the active forces to March 31st, 1955, the Navy figure for that date being down from 21,000 to 20,450

because it was not now considered possible to obtain some 500 of the officers required; the Army figure being up from 49,000 to 57,000 owing to the decision to despatch a full brigade group to Korea; and the Air Force figure, including women, being up from 43,240 to 44,200 as a result of the decision to man some of the additional radar stations being built jointly with the United States.

The forecast of the average monthly intake of the active forces in 1952-53 was below that for 1951-52, which was higher because of the recent special campaign to raise the 27th Infantry Brigade. The main unknown was how many of the 4,000-odd men who had enlisted in the Army for 18 months and would be due for discharge in February and March, 1952, would re-enlist. The results of the recruiting drives for the Special Force and the 27th Brigade had shown that extra men could be obtained for the Army by special campaigns.

7. The Deputy Minister of National Defence said that the estimates of the costs of the defence programme for 1951-52 to 1954-55 and the summary of costs by major categories represented the type of information required by the Executive Bureau of the TCC. These figures had first been screened by the Services with the Department of Defence Production from the point of view of the possibilities of deliveries. A subsequent examination by the above-mentioned committee of senior officials, in consultation with the Services, had resulted in the elimination of items that were not militarily essential.

Since there had been little time to prepare the data required by the Executive Bureau, the figures of $2,287 million for budgetary expenditures and $2,455 million for cash disbursements on the defence programme in 1952-53 represented only a first approximation of the cost of the programme in that year. His department would have figures that could be better justified when it submitted draft defence estimates in January.

Meanwhile, the present figures did give a good indication of financial requirements in 1952-53, although those for the two later years were inevitably less firm. It was hoped that, on the understanding that it would be made clear that the figures for 1953-54 were in no sense final, it could be agreed that the expenditures forecast for the next three years be used as the presently estimated costs of the programme in completing the returns to be made to the Executive Bureau and in the discussions of the Canadian programme that the Minister of Finance would be having with the Bureau on November 16th. While there were still certain unknowns, such as the cost of some of the types of Army equipment to be ordered, the officials concerned in the Department of Finance had agreed that the estimates of expenditures for the next three years represented the approximate amounts that the present defence programme would cost and that, if less than $2,287 million were provided for 1952-53, expenditures would have to be deferred to the two following years, resulting in increased financial requirements then. A number of involuntary deferments during the current fiscal year explained in part the higher estimates than originally forecast for expenditures in 1952-53.

8. The Minister of Defence Production wondered if the proposed expansion of the Defence Research Board development programme was wise. It appeared desirable for Canada to do less development and more production in the case of the CF-100, the Orenda engine and other projects. Data on new types of equipments that it was desired to produce in Canada and training in preparation for the production of such items could be obtained in the United Kingdom which was devoting a very large effort to development.

9. The Chairman, Defence Research Board said that progress with production of the CF-100 and the Orenda appeared to be a problem for Avro management. The company had been good in the development field but poor in organizing production. Last year the development shop at Avro had been turned over to production. Most of the airframe and engine development contemplated in the D.R.B. programme was not related to the CF-100 and the Orenda but looked to types to be produced a few years hence. Development of the CF-100 and the Orenda did not entail a duplication of work in other countries since a special type of interceptor had been required for Canadian purposes.

Development work on the CF-100 and the Orenda was nearing completion and they would go into production fairly soon. The airframe and engine, however, had possibilities of development as a supersonic fighter and the proposal was to provide for a start on this project in 1952-53. Most of the proposed increase in the D.R.B. development programme was attributable to this project.

It was not possible to do satisfactory and rapid development work on an intermittent basis since the development teams became dispersed. Much of the development programme had been undertaken as a result of allocations of responsibilities between Canada, the United States and the United Kingdom.

10. Mr. Claxton said that the Inter-Service Committee on Development was preparing a report on the D.R.B. development programme which could be considered in due course.

11. The Deputy Minister of Finance doubted that quite as much as the $1,465 million forecast in Mark III would be spent on defence in 1951-52.

12. Mr. Drury said that this would depend largely on rates of deliveries during the remainder of the fiscal year. Some 70% of defence expenditures for the year would be on construction and equipment which were handled by other departments. Underspending during the year by his department on the other portions of the programme would total about $100 million. Despatch of a brigade group to Korea would result in higher expenditures on personnel than originally expected.

Maintenance of both the brigade group in Korea and that proceeding to Europe would be handled by payment of a capitation fee which had still to be agreed upon with the U.S. and U.K. authorities. The U.S. authorities had only recently put forward a figure applicable to the 25th Brigade but this had appeared high and the matter was being investigated further. Some interim payments had been made to the United States on account of the 2nd Battalion, Princess Patricia's Canadian Light Infantry, and every effort would be made to arrange for payment, before next March, of amounts owed to the United States and the United Kingdom for maintenance of the two brigade groups during 1951-52.

As regards the maintenance of R.C.A.F. squadrons in or proceeding to the United Kingdom, the U.K. authorities had agreed to provide free of charge all available stores for these units, and Vampire aircraft for the squadron presently in the United Kingdom, as an offset against Canadian expenditures in training R.A.F. aircrew. The only outstanding question appeared to be which country would pay for additional construction in the United Kingdom required by the R.C.A.F. which, so far, needed only a depot. The former U.K. Secretary of State for Air had indicated agreement to these arrangements which, however, had not been embodied in a formal agreement as the United Kingdom did not wish to have to extend similar facilities to the United States. Squadrons proceeding to the United Kingdom in future would take with them their own F-86's.

13. The Minister of Finance said that Mark III indicated the Navy programme to which Canada was committed and would have to carry out whatever the final estimate of cost. The same was substantially true with respect to the Air Force programme, although there were some possibilities of modification as regards procurement of aircraft and mobilization stocks. It was less clear whether the whole of the Army programme in Mark III was a commitment as the government had not yet discussed in any detail the cost of the ultimate completion of a corps of 4 divisions and 2 armoured brigades in wartime, or of the procurement of mobilization stocks for a force of this size (Mark III, page 2). These questions would have to be studied, and discussed at a later meeting so as to establish firm figures for the costs of the Army programme in future years. He had always felt that the Army programme would have to be considered in connection with the large air force contemplated.

14. Mr. Claxton thought that the Army programme outlined was as already agreed but recognized that the question of the extent of Army mobilization stocks had not yet been fully discussed.

15. The Chief of the General Staff said that the mobilization stores of ammunition contemplated in the Army programme were limited to first- and second-line ammunition (e.g. about 250 rounds per gun) for two divisions allocated to NATO, and training scales of ammunition for the remainder of the infantry and armoured forces planned. SHAPE had recently indicated that any forces allocated to the Integrated Force up to D plus 90 must have reserves of ammunition for 90 days. Further, it had been considered desirable to order ammunition in sufficient quantities to ensure economic production runs.

16. Mr. Abbott said that the presently estimated National Defence cash disbursements in 1952-53, totalling $2,455 million, added to expected expenditures of roughly $200 million on defence production, atomic energy, civil defence and other projects in the general field of defence, represented about 13% of the anticipated gross national product in that year and more, he felt, than the country would be prepared to pay or the economy could stand. He would, however, not object to the Executive Bureau being informed that the present estimates of expenditures in the next three years were initial approximations of costs that had still to undergo further screening.

17. Mr. Claxton thought that the programme for the next three years that had been submitted was physically attainable from the point of view of production, construction and manpower.

18. Mr. Abbott felt that if the whole programme were retained, the expense would be found high and, with deferments of expenditures, financial requirements for the last two years would be increased. It was quite possible that the programme outlined, together with the capital investment programme, would impose serious pressures on the economy, leading to further rises in the price level. It was estimated that there would be a rise of 3 to 4% during the next year, even assuming that the volume of consumption did not increase. It appeared that the maximum that the public could be persuaded to divert from production in 1952-53 was $2.4 billion — or about 10% of the estimated gross national product — including National Defence expenditures and the estimated $200 million to be spent on other projects in the general defence field. The impact of the defence and investment programmes on Canada's balance of payments position was a cause for some concern since there would be deficits of about $700 million this year and $500 million next year, it being contemplated that equipment to the value of $250 million be bought in the United States during 1952.

19. The Prime Minister thought that, while the public would support a deterrent Canadian Army force in Europe in peacetime and a maximum Army effort in wartime, it would probably not be prepared in peacetime to support the stockpiling of substantial mobilization stores since this would compete with civilian supply and might give the impression that Canada was making preparations for war rather than to deter aggression.

20. General Simonds said that not only forces deployed in peacetime but also the speed with which countries could mobilize in wartime had a deterrent effect on potential aggressors.

21. The Committee, after further discussion, noted the report of the Minister of National Defence regarding preliminary estimates of the costs of the Canadian defence programme during the next three fiscal years and agreed that:

(a) the Minister of Finance and the Departments of National Defence and Finance use these estimates of costs in making the necessary submissions to the Executive Bureau of the Temporary Council Committee, pointing out that the figures were tentative and subject to further screening in Canada;

(b) the Minister of Finance, in discussing the Canadian programme with the Executive Bureau on November 16th, indicate that at present the government did not expect cash disbursements in excess of $2.4 billion, including some $200 million for defence production, atomic energy, civil defence and other projects in the general field of defence, to be authorized for defence purposes in 1952-53;

(c) reports be prepared on the proposed Defence Research Board development programme, and on plans for the build-up of the Army and the procurement of relevant mobilization stores, for consideration at a subsequent meeting.

REVIEW OF THE CANADIAN PROGRAMME BY THE EXECUTIVE BUREAU OF THE TCC

1. On Friday, Mr. Abbott met with the Executive Bureau consisting of Messrs. Harriman, Monnet and Plowden. The morning was taken up with answers to questions prepared by McNarney's Screening Committee on the military aspects of the Canadian programme. The afternoon was devoted to questions concerning Canada's economic situation and to a discussion of Canadian capabilities for further economic assistance to Europe. Harriman and Monnet were not present in the morning because they were occupied in urgent discussions with the French Government over the French financial crisis. They were present, however, in the afternoon.

2. The discussion of the military programme was centered primarily on McNarney's list of questions which had been received in Ottawa shortly before our departure. Mr. Abbott explained that the physical aspects of the Canadian military programme were clearly defined, that the necessary decisions have been taken and that the preparations were in hand for the fulfilment of the physical commitments which have been undertaken. In the light of this position the answers to the military questions presented no particular difficulty. McNarney, however, added some further observations to his original list of questions. In his report to the Executive Bureau he stated "the overriding factor in considering the Canadian defence contribution is the issue of national service. Apart from financial considerations, we believe that if Canada had national service, she could increase the size, or improve the readiness of her forces". When Mr. Abbott made a brief reference to some of the considerations respecting this question in Canada, the matter was not pursued further. McNarney also suggested that Canada should be in a position in 1953, if the Korean war had ended, to provide one full division for active service in Europe, instead of the one-third division now committed. It was explained that this would entail, in the opinion of the Canadian authorities, an undesirable and unwise use of Canadian manpower from the point of view of the best use of the total resources of the North Atlantic community. Also such a contribution by Canada would be quite out of proportion to the United States commitment for the stationing of forces in Europe.

3. The formal question concerning the Canadian economic situation were largely mechanical and routine. There was some discussion of whether or not Canada was devoting too many resources to new capital investment and whether it was not possible to further reduce non-essential investment. It was explained that the Canadian investment programme was heavily directed to the development of strategic resources and defence supporting industries and that a series of fiscal and other measures had been taken to restrain non-essential investment including housing. The sharp reduction in the construction of new housing presented serious political and economic difficulties. The members of the Executive Bureau were particularly impressed with the novel device involved in the four year postponement of depreciation charges. They asked for a memorandum explaining this measure for the information of other members of the committee.

4. The formal economic questions were followed by a smaller informal meeting where Monnet, supported to some extent by Harriman, expressed the opinion that the present Canadian defence effort did not constitute a burden as heavy as those being undertaken by most of the other NATO countries and invited Mr. Abbott to consider seriously the possibilities of increasing Canada's defence effort by enlarging its mutual aid programme. Mr. Harriman suggested in particular that Canada might give additional mutual aid to European countries in the form of wheat, aluminum and copper. He referred to the current financial crises in France and the United Kingdom and said that these countries would have difficulty in financing their imports of vital raw materials and foodstuffs and felt that Canada could help in this respect. Harriman said that the United States was faced with the necessity of again increasing the scale of economic assistance to Europe and he felt that the resumption of Canadian economic aid, in addition to aid in the military field, would be of great help with Congress and United States public opinion. It was suggested that the order of magnitude of additional Canadian mutual aid assistance might be $200 million for 1952, corresponding to an increase in the defence effort, expressed as a percentage of the gross national product, from 10 percent to approximately 12 percent. With regard to the possibility of a further increase in the Canadian defence effort, Mr. Abbott said he did not think that the Canadian Government or Parliament could be persuaded, in the present circumstances, to commit more than the maximum of $2.4 billion projected for 1952-53, and that he would not recommend an increase. He said the Canadian Government would review the proposed expenditures with a view to achieving all possible economies in carrying out the physical programme which has been undertaken and would be prepared to consider possible rearrangements which might be proposed in order to make the best overall contribution within the maximum figure of $2.4 billion. The Canadian representatives stated that the heavy outlay on expansion of production of vital raw materials in Canada was in many respects as important as the direct defence effort and imposed an additional substantial impact on the economy which was not included in the direct defence expenditures. Consequently they could not attach a great deal of weight to simple comparisons of percentages of G.N.P. Mr. Abbott emphasized that an additional Canadian effort by way of additional mutual aid amounting to approximately $200 million more that the $227 million already projected, would on account of the substantial overall Canadian current balance of payments deficit, and the much larger deficit with the United States, in effect mean that Canada would have to borrow an additional $200 million in the United States. Because of this circumstance Canada is clearly not in a position to export raw materials without the receipt of foreign exchange which she needs to meet her own bills. Mr. Abbott said that the Canadian public still had a clear recollection of the over-commitments in assistance to European countries which Canada took upon itself during 1946 and 1947 and the results therefrom in objectionable restrictions and taxation. He said it was the policy of the Canadian Government, to avoid as far as possible, through appropriate internal as well as external policies, the recurrence of such a situation. Mr. Harriman suggested that the Canadian balance of payments position might be alleviated if United States defence purchasing in Canada could be speeded up. The Canadian representatives said that they would be glad to explore the possibility of larger United States defence purchases but emphasized that because of the inevitable time lags involved in the placing of orders, the necessary technical arrangements and the development of production lines, early results could not be expected.

Attached is a very good memorandum which Plumptre prepared for me on the T.C.C. operations in Paris.[66] Attached also is a copy of the telegraphic report sent back to Ottawa. It seems to me that these proceedings are likely to have very important repercussions in terms of Canadian policy over the next few months.[67]

When I was in London, Norman Brook asked to see me about Mr. Churchill's visit to Ottawa in January. It now seems likely that Mr. Churchill will arrive in Ottawa some time after January 10th and that he will remain for about three days. Although Brook said that Mr. Churchill had, so far as he knew, nothing particular in mind to raise with the Government, I feel almost certain that in one way or another the subject of economic aid from Canada is bound to come up. Clearly this will be the principal problem under discussion when Mr. Churchill meets Mr. Truman. So far as I can find out the report that the Americans have in mind a transfer for the benefit of the United Kingdom of some portion of the $600 million available for economic aid is accurate. It seems to me that we are likely to be faced in Ottawa with a demand that in some measure we do likewise. The grounds for such a plea will be familiar — the influence of Canadian action (or inaction) on the U.S. Congress, etc. In fact the Americans and the British are likely to be as one in this, as hitherto.

You will notice that in the T.C.C. an amount of "$200 million for 1952" was suggested as an appropriate figure for additional Canadian mutual aid to European countries. The arguments against such an addition were advanced very strongly by Mr. Abbott, but I think we should be prepared for a renewal of the proposal, or a similar one, when Mr. Churchill arrives in Ottawa fresh from Washington.

REVIEW OF CANADIAN PROGRAMME BY EXECUTIVE BUREAU OF T.C.C.

1. I have had preliminary discussions with Ritchie and Rae in London and with Parkinson, Couillard and Deutsch in Paris regarding the Review by T.C.C. which was reported to Ottawa by telegram dated November 19. Discussions centred on (a) the suggestion "that the order of magnitude of additional Canadian mutual aid assistance might be $200 million for 1952"; (b) Mr. Harriman's suggestion that "Canada might give additional mutual aid to European countries in the form of wheat, aluminium and copper"; and (c) the Canadian reply to these suggestions.

2. The essence of the Canadian reply might be summarized as follows. Mr. Abbott "did not think that the Canadian Government or Parliament could be persuaded, in the present circumstances, to commit more than the maximum of $2.4 millions for 1952-53, and that he would not recommend an increase". The Government would review possible economies and rearrangements within this total "to make the best overall contribution". Canada's heavy outlay on expansion of vital raw material production was not reflected in simple international comparisons of proportions of national income devoted to defence. An additional $200 million of mutual aid "in effect would mean that Canada would have to borrow an additional $200 million in the United States",[69] because Canada was already running a heavy deficit in its balance of payments and because it was "the policy of the Canadian Government to avoid, as far as possible, through appropriate internal as well as external policies, the recurrence of ... objectionable restrictions and taxation" such as had become necessary when Canada undertook over-commitments to assist European countries in 1946 and 1947.

3. It would probably be impossible to give a reply, from the Canadian point of view, that would seem completely convincing and satisfying to the U.K. and Continental members of NATO. All of them are floundering in a sea of economic troubles, evidenced by inflation, budgetary difficulties, and import restrictions. None of them is likely to be entirely sympathetic to a statement that Canada, in seeking to assist NATO, is trying to keep clear of the same troubles. On the other hand, just because most of the NATO countries are already in serious difficulties, economic and political, it does not necessarily follow that NATO would be strengthened if Canada got itself into similar difficulties. Indeed one could argue the opposite: unless and until these other NATO countries get their own houses in better shape, any aid Canada can give them will be of negligible assistance and Canada will do well to keep its own house in good order in the meanwhile. Unfortunately, it is difficult if not impossible to make this argument without giving offence to our less fortunate or less competent fellow members of the Pact, and the effect of our policy, in so far as it has an influence on the alliance, is likely to be to divisive rather than cohesive. This would seem to be a serious matter which should be kept in mind.

4. We must also keep in mind the impact of our actions on the United States. If and when Canada announces a military programme of the order of $2.4 billions for the coming fiscal year — a substantial increase over the present — this will no doubt be helpful to the U.S. Administration. It would also be helpful if an appreciable increase in mutual aid could be announced. There does not seem to be any special virtue in the figure of $200 millions on top of the $227 millions which is apparently already included for mutual aid within the $2.4 billions. (I can make no sense of the suggestion put forward in T.C.C. that an additional $200 millions would raise from 10% to 12% the proportion of our gross national product devoted to military purposes; $200 millions is far less than 2% of our national product). However, it is probably easy to exaggerate the effect on the U.S. Congress of anything Canada may do; the Administration is prone, for its own purposes, to exaggerate our influence.

5. It might be useful, for purposes of further consideration in Ottawa and in view of the continued pressure which will probably be brought to bear on us, to review more fully than was possible in T.C.C. the possible results of an increase of $200 million in our mutual aid programme:

(a) First, there is the suggestion that the Canadian Government would meet the added deficit on international account by borrowing in the United States. This seems undesirable on all counts. It would merely involve passing on to the United States the burden of our additional effort (at least for the time being until repayment of the borrowing began). This would get us no particular credit either in Congress or overseas. Nor was Canada's last emergency effort to borrow in New York, in 1947, a happy precedent.

(b) Another possibility (which may have been considered already in the Department of Finance or the Bank of Canada but was apparently not mentioned in the T.C.C.) is some reliance on our new element of economic flexibility: the free Canadian dollar. This may provide an important difference between the present and 1947; then we were committed to defend an existing exchange rate; now, as the overall balance of payments tends to move against us, the value of the Canadian dollar can be allowed to fall to redress the balance. The questions to be considered are: How far is the rate likely to fall and what readjustments will be required in the Canadian economy? Will U.S. private capital take fright, or will a temporarily cheaper rate for our dollar actually tempt more to come in? How will the rise in the price of the U.S. dollar affect the cost of living in Canada? And so forth.

(c) Another possibility is that we might allow our reserves of gold and dollars to run down by an additional $200 millions. Our present reserves — of the order of a billion and a half — are reasonably comfortable; on the other hand their maintenance is precarious. We are at present running a deficit on trade and other current accounts of the order of half a billion a year and this is being roughly counterbalanced by an inflow of capital from the United States. Such an inflow is notoriously unstable and might be sharply reduced if our reserves began to fall rapidly. Obviously we could stand a loss of $200 millions if that were all; but we are already faced by the danger of other and larger losses.

(d) Finally, we might be faced by the need for renewed restrictions and controls designed to stabilize our balance of payments. It should, perhaps, be pointed out that these would not be needed automatically or immediately; they would only be needed if our reserves fell dangerously or if our dollar fell to a damaging extent. However, an extra NATO commitment of $200 millions would unquestionably bring closer the possible need. The NATO commitments, coming last and on top of an already unbalanced situation, would perhaps have to bear the blame for import controls, special taxes, travel restrictions, and other unpleasant measures. Whether it is worth while running the additional risk of these measures in order to gain the advantages for NATO of the additional Canadian commitment, is a question that can only be considered on broad political grounds.

(6) Whether or not an additional mutual aid commitment of some $200 millions is undertaken by the Canadian Government, the actual figure included in the annual Parliamentary Estimates for mutual aid probably should allow for some elbow-room. The figure quoted above for 1952/52 ($227 millions) is apparently the exact total of existing commitments or near-commitments. In the Estimates the figure should be rounded off to give something like $50 millions extra to meet unforseen demands which may be met during the year. As Canadian defence production gets rolling the possibility and the need for such action will increase.

7. Before undertaking a substantially larger additional mutual aid commitment, thought should probably be given to the form it would take. It is one thing to make free transfers of military equipment to allies in peace or war. It is quite another to give away, free of charge in time of peace, the goods on which Canada's livelihood depends, such as the wheat, aluminium and copper to which Mr. Harriman referred. The position of the United States, where domestic primary producers are mainly dependent on the domestic market, is of course very different from that of Canada which depends on export markets.

8. As Mr. Abbott pointed out to T.C.C., not much weight can be attached to simple comparison of the percentages of national production devoted directly to defence by the various NATO countries. Nobody can say whether a figure of 10% or 12% or any other figure of that general size, is too high, too low, or just right for us. The question which will probably assume importance is whether, as a result of the T.C.C. exercise, there is a real increase in the actual rearmament efforts (not merely in the paper programmes) of most of the important NATO countries. Thus the question whether we ought to give further consideration to accepting the additional mutual aid burden suggested by T.C.C. must turn to a considerable extent on whether other countries are likely to increase their defence efforts, either independently or conceivably as a partial result of our own action, along lines which T.C.C. is no doubt suggesting to them.

9. Our Department is obviously not competent to supply even tentative answers to most of the questions raised in this memorandum. It might, however, be helpful, to our Minister and possibly to others, if answers, or at least comments, could be elicited from the Departments and agencies chiefly concerned.

EXAMINATION OF CANADIAN SUBMISSION BY THE TEMPORARY COUNCIL COMMITTEE OF NATO

Mr. Donald Bliss, Minister of the United States Embassy, called on Mr. Ritchie on November 29th to discuss the examination of the Canadian submission by the Executive Bureau of the TCC. Mr. Bliss had been in Paris and had apparently worked closely with Mr. Harriman on the Canadian replies. His account of the proceedings corresponded closely with that contained in Telegram No. 91 of November 19th from the Canadian Delegation.

2. Mr. Bliss addressed himself in particular to Harriman's suggestion that Canada might be able to provide additional mutual aid to European countries in 1952, perhaps in the form of wheat, aluminium and copper to a value of $200 million. He said that Harriman had recognized the validity of Mr. Abbott's argument that additional mutual aid on this scale would imply borrowing to roughly the same extent from the United States.[70] Bliss thought, however, that Canadian balance of payments difficulties in making additional mutual aid available to European countries could be overcome if the United States were able to step up its defence purchasing in Canada. He was personally enthused about this possibility and had discussed it with leading officials in Washington, none of whom were opposed to the idea. He had also talked with Mr. Howe who was confident that Canada could undertake the additional production that might be required. Dr. Clark, on the other hand, had indicated concern about the inflationary effects which a rapid and heavy increase in United States purchasing might involve. Bliss hoped that serious consideration would be given to his proposal and that active steps would be taken to secure additional U.S. defence orders. In this connection, he emphasized that it would be necessary for Canadian officials and businessmen concerned to seek U.S. defence contracts rather more actively than heretofor.

3. Note: In the event that Canada finds itself in a position in 1952 where the extension of some additional mutual aid seems necessary, it is for consideration whether the amount of such aid might not be linked with the amount by which U.S. defence purchases in Canada exceed an arbitrary level.[71]

DRAFT EXECUTIVE BUREAU'S REPORT† AND FINAL SCS REPORT†

The final SCS report and the draft of the TCC report prepared by the Executive Bureau have just been received.

2. The SCS report was received in time for inclusion in this morning's airbag and the only two copies obtainable were sent one to you and the other to London. We assume London will be in touch with you. The quick check which we had time to make of the text and tables in the Canadian section revealed that they were the same as were obtained last week by Newsome, two copies of which were given to Deutsch. In addition the section contains three tables; one of them is the projected costing of the Canadian defence procurement programme in accordance with the new SCS recommendations. This costing indicates the possibility of economies mainly in the field of aircraft production. Another table is a costing of the total defence programme for Canada over the three-year period also worked out on the basis of the SCS recommendations.

3. The E.B. draft of the TCC report which will be discussed by the TCC on the 14th was received too late for inclusion in today's airbag. Couillard is taking copies of it to London tonight for discussions with Wilgress. Copies will be airbagged to you from London. All country sections will only be available on Thursday. Each country received today its own country section only. We are repeating this section to you in our immediately following telegram.

4. You will note that although "the TCC considers that the Canadian defence programme should be maintained about at the level now being programmed ... it is felt that Canada should increase its assistance to other countries ... partly through larger military transfers ... but largely in the form of economic assistance". The amounts "suggested" are $200, $250 and $300 million for 1951-52, 1952-53, 1953-54 respectively. Since we have no other country section but our own, we have no specific information on which "suggestions" the E.B. is making to other countries. A draft E.B. cover note to the country sections however would indicate that no increase in the percentages of defence expenditures to G.N.P. is "suggested" either for the United States or the United Kingdom the figures shown for the main countries are as follows:

Defence expenditures as percent of G.N.P.

Figures "suggested" are in brackets

	1950-51	1951-52	1952-53	1953-54
Belgium	3.8	5.1 (8.0)	6.8 (10.1)	6.6 (10.2)

U.S.A.	6.9	14.4 (14.4)	17.6 (17.6)	18.4 (18.4)

5. We have been informed that the E.B. will be available for discussions with national representatives up to Thursday. It has not been made clear what might be expected to come out of these discussions beyond correction of factual errors in the country sections. It should be noted however that country sections will not be circulated to other delegations before Thursday.

TOP SECRET. IMPORTANT.

Reference: My immediately preceding telegram No. 96.
Following is text of draft annex on Canada prepared by Executive Bureau. (Part VII, Section 26 of draft TCC report).

"1. Main factors considered by the TCC

(a) Canada is undertaking a substantial defence programme relative to the size of its national resources. Although its plans do not call for a large number of men under arms, an increase in this aspect of its programme would meet a difficult political problem and would intensify the shortage of labour.

(b) Canada is projecting a large investment programme, a significant part of which is concentrated in areas which will increase the supplies of essential raw materials, and which will contribute toward easing the shortages of these materials in the NATO countries.

(c) Due to the large increase of Canadian purchases in the United States for its armed forces, and to the post-Korean rise in import prices, Canada has a sizeable deficit in its balance of payments with the United States.

(d) The Canadian economy has had a remarkable expansion from its pre-war level and a continued sharp increase in the total output appears to be assured for the next few years.

2. Recommendations

The TCC recommends the following defence and assistance effort as being within the political and economic capabilities of Canada. In arriving at this recommendation, the TCC recognized that certain action will have to be taken by Canada as well as by other countries along the lines indicated below.

			Total
	1951/52	1952/53	1953/54	1951/54
Present country plans
($ million)	1,560	2,338	2,802	6,700
(Can $ million)	(1,660)	(2,487)	(2,981)	(7,128)
TCC recommendations
($ million)	1,748	2,573	3,084	7,405
(Can $ million)	(1,860)	(2,737)	(3,281)	(7,878)

3. Economic consequences of recommended programme and action required.

(a) The TCC considers that the Canadian defence programme should be maintained about at the level now being programmed. However, in view of the serious difficulties that are being, and will be, encountered by other countries, it is felt that Canada should increase its assistance to other countries by the amounts indicated. This increased assistance might take the form partly of larger military transfers, but it is conceived to be largely in the form of economic assistance. The fact that several European countries are experiencing serious balance of payments difficulties with the dollar area, necessitating sharp curtailments of dollar imports, makes an additional effort by Canada in this form particularly appropriate.

(b) In view of the favourable economic prospects of Canada, it appears that the additional burden recommended can be undertaken without interfering with Canada's essential investment programme and still leave scope for increasing consumption levels.

(c) The balance of payments problem with the United States must be taken care of. It is to be expected that the major part of the dollar deficit with the United States will be covered by direct investment and by long-term financing, which is appropriate for a country undergoing substantial development of its basic resources. The remaining deficit should not present a serious problem, if available means for covering it are adequately utilised. The most significant of these is the potential increase in the procurement by the United States armed forces in Canada. This will not only increase Canada's dollar earnings, but it should also facilitate the economic production in Canada of some defence goods at present imported from the United States."

EXECUTIVE BUREAU'S RECOMMENDATIONS RE CANADA

I shall have to make some statement at the TCC meeting in Paris on Friday on the "suggestions" made by the Executive Bureau for an additional Canadian effort.

2. As I see it, there are four possible alternatives open to us:

(a) We might accept the recommendations as they stand on the ground that they purport to represent a fairly disinterested judgment of our position in comparison with that of all the others. Mr. Abbott made it quite clear and explained, during the Canadian examination and again at the TCC meeting on December 4, that additional Canadian aid in the form of economic aid could not be expected. Furthermore, there is the absence of any increase in the United States commitments and of any fairly firm guarantee that other NATO countries will accept the EB recommendations.

(b) We might reject the recommendations as not warranted by our own estimates of our politico-economic capabilities. This could be done by entering a reservation explaining the Canadian position. This course could have serious consequences, not only for the attempts to get the European countries to maintain or increase their defence efforts but also for future cooperation among the North Atlantic countries. The Americans would consider it a serious loss in the psychological effect on Congress which they attach to Canadian participation in economic aid.

(c) We might enter a reservation without explanation when the report is being considered on Friday. Alternatively, the reservation could be made on the ground that the Canadian Government has not yet had time to take a decision. Furthermore, it could be stated that no such decision could be arrived at in the absence of a clearer indication of the basis on which the apparent arbitrary increases for Canada were arrived at. Such a reservation now would merely defer the showdown or might give rise to expectations that eventually we would come round and accept the recommendations, at least in part.

(d) We might prepare a counter offer, and preferably inform the EB of it before the report goes to the TCC on Friday. Such an offer might be made conditional on the favourable action of European countries on at least part of the recommendations made to them. A counter offer might note that the bureau has found the present level of our defence effort to be about adequate and has considered that more might reasonably be asked of us only in the field of economic aid for others. On the assumption that our present end item aid programme bears a fair relation to our supply or output of such items, and that (as is noted in paragraph 29, of DR/13 for the United States) we shall also be making certain military establishment expenditures in Europe, we might offer to contribute economic aid in abut the same proportion to national income as the United States is proposing to do. This would mean providing something like 50 or 60 million dollars (say 1/16th or 1/17th of $1 billion) in 1951/52. We could probably represent this as involving proportionately more sacrifice, or risks, for us than for the United States in view of the fact that we are already running a heavy balance of payments deficit. By this means we could satisfy ourselves that we were doing at least our fair share and were not insisting that our earlier figures must be regarded as sacrosanct and above any critical examination. In this way, we could also prevent the European countries from using our example as an excuse for entirely rejecting the TCC recommendations respecting them. Our relatively cooperative attitude would no doubt also be of some help in enabling the United States administration to continue to secure congressional approval for future aid programmes — which are important to us, not only indirectly for our defence but also for the maintenance of our trade with some of the NATO countries in this new period of dollar stringency.

EXECUTIVE BUREAU'S REPORT FOR T.C.C. MEETING FRIDAY

Following for Wilgress, Begins: The Government have been able to give preliminary consideration only to the draft report on the basis of the above telegrams. The report itself only arrived yesterday afternoon with Mr. Pearson.

2. However, because of the necessity of instructing you before tomorrow's meeting, the Ministers principally concerned have conferred and have agreed that your attitude at the meeting should be that set forth in the immediately following paragraphs of this message.

3. In the first place it will, we assume, be quite clear that the action requested of the T.C.C. tomorrow will be merely consent to reference of the report to governments and not (repeat not) in any sense approval of the report on behalf of governments.

4. The Canadian Government have had no opportunity to study the report; they are consequently in a position to give merely their preliminary reactions at this time.

5. The Canadian Government hopes that the T.C.C. report will find general acceptance among North Atlantic countries and provide a new impetus to the common defence effort. Canada desires that its own programme should harmonize as far as possible with the programmes of other members of NATO.

6. The draft report makes some specific suggestions regarding economic assistance by Canada to other countries. In the current fiscal year, which in Canada ends with March 1952, foreign assistance exceeding $200 million is being provided to North Atlantic Allies and it is not possible for any material change to be made. With respect to the following years, certain points should be emphasized:

(a) It would be impossible for Canada, which depends for its livelihood on sales of basic products, to embark on a programme of giving these products away. There are in fact very special difficulties involved in economic assistance of this kind which do not apply in like degree to military transfers.

(b) It is doubtful whether, for the year 1952-53 it would be practicable, even if it were desirable, to devote to the Canadian defence programme a total amount exceeding the $2.4 billion already suggested. However, as we have already stated, the Government are prepared to consider adjustments within that programme calculated to give greater effect to the Canadian contribution to the joint effort. There will of course also be a measure of flexibility for the year 1953-54.

(c) It will not be possible for the Canadian Government to undertake economic assistance of the kind indicated in the current fiscal year nor in 1952-53 apart from the military assistance we are planning to give. In addition, of course, there will be the substantial Canadian expenditures in Europe on infrastructure and for the maintenance of Canadian forces.

7. For the reasons indicated above the Canadian Government hope that the report can be amended to remove the references to Canadian economic assistance. If this can not be done, you are authorized to agree that the report should be forwarded to governments, provided our position is made clear (along the lines of Mr. Abbott's statement to the T.C.C.) with respect to the sections regarding economic assistance from Canada. In other words, our agreement to the proposal to forward the report to governments should not be understood as constituting agreement to those sections.

8. With respect to the military sections of the report, these appear to be generally acceptable. The suggestion, however, that the S.C.S. report be dealt with separately without reference to the T.C.C. seems to us contrary to the purposes of the Council in setting up the T.C.C. We feel strongly that these S.C.S. conclusions should form an integral part of the T.C.C. exercise. Ends.

EXECUTIVE BUREAU'S REPORT FOR T.C.C. MEETING FRIDAY

Following Personal for Wilgress from the Under-Secretary, Begins: We have been trying to get you on the telephone to supplement the instructions contained in the Minister's earlier telegram of today. In case we are unable to reach you the Minister wishes me to give you additional guidance in two respects.

2. It would appear from Parkinson's telegram No. 99 of December 12th† that the Representatives of other countries will find themselves tomorrow in a position similar to your own with respect to the draft report. In these circumstances the Minister hopes that you will not have to be among the first to raise objections to any portion of the report. Although the Government feel strongly with respect to the sections on economic assistances they do not (repeat not) wish the spotlight to be turned on Canada, nor to give encouragement to others to take exception to the report's recommendations.

3. From Parkinson's telegram it would also seem possible, if not likely, that some Representatives may propose delay on the ground that their governments have not had adequate opportunity to study the report's proposals. This indeed is the Canadian position and we do not think it reasonable that governments should be rushed to conclusions in such important matters unless it is absolutely necessary. It seems to us that a little more time might achieve greater unanimity.

4. If there is a general disposition to postpone adoption of an agreed report for despatch to governments you could, at tomorrow's meeting, confine yourself to a brief general statement which would include reference to our objection to the sections on economic assistance, in this event you could leave it to a later meeting to record more fully the reasons for our attitude, unless in the meantime the offending sections can be deleted.

5. Finally, we very much hope that it will be possible to have a reasonable postponement so that the report may be dealt with in a much more deliberate and considered fashion than is possible under the present timetable. Ends.

EXECUTIVE BUREAU REPORT FOR T.C.C.

Following from Wilgress, Begins: The meeting of the TCC on Friday was occupied entirely with questions of procedure and doubt concerning approval of the report. Several members said that they had had no time to read the report so that at 1 o'clock Harriman adjourned until Saturday morning.

2. The deliberations on Saturday morning commenced with an address by General Eisenhower who gave his full approval to the recommendations contained in the report, especially the conclusions reached by the screening and costing staff. After an opportunity had been given for members to address questions to General Eisenhower, Harriman made an appeal for unanimous approval of the report but without commitments as to the recommendations concerning particular countries. He read out a summary of the report which he said were the principles which the committee would be asked to approve.

3. I made an appointment with Harriman before the afternoon session and explained to him our difficulties. He said it would be out of the question to delete the references in the report to economic aid by Canada because this would lead to the deletion of other sections which were causing embarrassment to other countries. In general this was that each of the members of the committee, except Belgium, were willing to have the recommendations concerning their respective countries approved by their governments. He felt that Christianson of Denmark might have some difficulty in persuading his colleagues in the Danish Government. This left only Belgium and Canada as likely to stand out against the recommendations and he hoped that we would not make it easy for the Belgians to water-down the recommendations regarding their country. I made no commitments to Harriman but told him I would play my cards with care.

4. On the resumption after lunch it was agreed, largely because of the insistence of the Europeans, that we should go through the report section by section. We soon ran into difficulty when the Belgians proposed the deletion of the last two lines in table one on page 7 of the D.R/5. I felt I had to support him and also to refer to the references to a Canadian contribution at the end of paragraph 10. I proposed that these references in the report should be held over until we had considered the whole report. This lead to a general discussion as to the procedure we were following. Harriman emphasized the importance of securing approval of the general principles embodied in the report and said that no government would be committed to the recommendations because this would be made clear in the foreword. He intimated that the foreword had been revised since Parkinson sent you his telegram on December 12. It was proposed that the foreword should be discussed after we had gone through the report. I felt it desirable to say nothing at this stage in order that we should not be the first to register disagreement, particularly as the Belgian Minister was also waiting for others to make the running.

5. We made fair progress through the various sections and when we came to DR/7 I spoke about the importance of the conclusions of the screening and costing staff being treated as an integral part of the report, particularly when the Military Committee were drawing up their comments. This created a good impression and was generally approved.

6. The discussion became more active when we reached D.R. 13 through 17, since the first part of the section led to a general debate on the danger of inflationary pressures. This served our purpose as divergencies of views on the part of the European countries were revealed.

7. The discussion will be resumed tomorrow and when we come to paragraph 29 on page 14 of D.R./13 through 17, I will have to make a statement to point out the absence of any reference to Canadian expenditures in Europe for procurement and for the maintenance of Canadian forces. I will then have to go on to develop our general objections to the recommendation concerning Canadian economic aid.

8. There will be a further opportunity of reiterating these objections when we reach the section dealing with the recommendations on Canada, but I take it that the instruction in your telegram No. 82 of December 14 does not require me to make a reservation but simply to see that we are fully protected in the foreword which will come up for discussion after all the sections of the report have been reviewed and approved for reference to governments. I shall endeavour to see that the foreword not only provides that no government is committed to the country recommendations contained in the report but also that approval of the general principles does not imply approval of the manner in which these principles have been interpreted in the report with respect to any individual country.

9. I should have mentioned earlier in this telegram that the general intention is to hold a meeting of the TCC prior to Lisbon for the purpose of receiving comments by governments on the recommendations contained in the report. The earlier suggestion was that this meeting should be held in Lisbon two days prior to the meeting of the Council but Sir Edwin Plowden tells me that he will insist on the meeting being held in Paris, probably towards the end of January because Harriman cannot get over earlier. I told him that it would suit the convenience of Mr. Abbott if the meeting followed the Commonwealth meeting which is due to end on January 22.

10. The general position therefore is likely to be that the committee will be asked to approve the report for transmission to governments but without commitment by any government as to the specific recommendations concerning the country in question. Governments however will have to submit their comments on these recommendations prior to the next meeting and a supplementary report will be drawn up for consideration by the Council along with the report we are now approving.

11. We hope to finish on Sunday but the meeting may go over until Monday. I realize there is no time to secure further instructions from you but I will send you further reports as the discussion develops. Ends.

EXECUTIVE BUREAU REPORT FOR TCC

Following from Wilgress, Begins: Further to my telegram from Paris of December 15, I have to report that the discussions on Sunday took a rather different turn from what I had expected.

2. Before the meeting was called to order, Harriman called me aside and said that he had been discussing procedure with a number of the Finance Ministers at a dinner which they attended the previous evening. He said it was proposed that the Executive Bureau should see the various members of the committee who had difficulties about the report, with a view to seeing what could be done to bring the report more in line with their views. He mentioned particularly that the Belgian Minister had to leave that afternoon, and that the Executive Bureau had arranged to see him after lunch. I told Harriman that I too had to leave that night, whereupon he said that the Executive Bureau could arrange to see me after the afternoon session. I also told Harriman that I intended to make a statement when we reached paragraph 29 on page 14 of D.R./13 through 17, since Mr. Abbott would expect me to make his position clear. Mr. Harriman said that he hoped I could refrain from making any statement until after I had had a talk with the Executive Bureau. I said that this might be difficult and it would depend largely on the course of the discussion.

3. When the meeting was called to order, Harriman announced that it had been agreed that in the afternoon the 12 members of the committee would meet alone to discuss future procedure. He had not mentioned this to me, so I was taken somewhat by surprise, but I assumed it was also something which had been agreed at the dinner the previous evening. We then made rapid progress through the balance of the report. When we came to paragraph 29, referred to above, Mr. Harriman said: "Mr. Wilgress has a particular difficulty in connection with this paragraph, and the Executive Bureau will be discussing with him how the wording of the paragraph can be adjusted to suit the Canadian position." I therefore contented myself with pointing out that paragraphs 29 and 30 made no reference to Canadian expenditure on our military establishment in Europe, and that I thought this could be taken care of by a sentence in paragraph 30. It was agreed that we should discuss the drafting of the sentence with the Executive Bureau.

4. No great difficulty was experienced with the balance of the report until we came to the section on organization. This took up the balance of the morning session, and I shall be reporting to you on this in a separate telegram. As the meeting was breaking up I reminded Harriman once again that I had to leave Paris that evening, and he said he would arrange for the Executive Bureau to have a discussion with us after the meeting in the afternoon. This meeting was called for 3.45 in order to give the Executive Bureau time for their discussion with the Belgian Minister.

5. When I came to the closed executive meeting in the afternoon, Harriman told me he had agreed with the Belgian Minister that the country annexes would be regarded as assumptions, and that all the TCC would be asked to do would be to approve the main body of the report but without commitments by governments as to the assumptions. I reminded him that I might have to make a statement, but he said he hoped that I could refrain from doing so until after my talk with the Executive Bureau. To this I made no commitment.

6. When the closed meeting began, Harriman said that he had had a very satisfactory talk with the Belgian Minister and as a result it was now proposed that the TCC agree upon the main body of the report and recommend the plan of action to governments and to NATO as a whole. The language of the report would be revised to show that the annexes were assumptions for governments to comment upon before the next meeting of the TCC. A supplementary report would be drawn up at the next meeting of the TCC for submission to the Council. He then went on to say that the understanding is that we recognize the critical nature of NATO and that each member of the committee should go back to his government to see how much of the recommendation concerning them can be accepted. I immediately realized that this statement of Harriman's placed us in a difficult position, and that I would have to make a statement on our position. This was confirmed when the Belgian Minister delivered a long oration eulogizing Mr. Harriman for the part he had played both in European recovery and in the defence effort. He said that the procedure outlined by Harriman was satisfactory to him. He was followed by Dr. Pella, of Italy, who also eulogized Harriman and said that the procedure was satisfactory to him. He too would go back to his government to see what could be done to implement the recommendations of the report, but that before doing so he wished to discuss with the Executive Bureau the special position of Italy. The Norwegian Minister, whom Harriman had praised for his forthcoming attitude throughout our discussions, also said he wished to have a talk with the Executive Bureau that evening.

7. The situation was therefore that if I did not make a statement then, the Ministers would go away believing that we were considering implementing the recommendation in the report regarding economic aid. It would also appear that we too were engaged in some bargaining with the United States and that this was the reason for our silence on the specific recommendation in the annex regarding Canada. It was also important that the other members of the Committee should know the reasons for any changes that might be made in the report to meet our special position.

8. Accordingly, I asked for permission to speak and delivered the statement for which I had been awaiting an opportunity for two days. My statement was largely based on your telegram to OEEC Paris, No. 82, of December 14th. I pointed out that like the other Ministers we also hoped that the TCC report would find general acceptance among North Atlantic countries and provide a new impetus for the common defence effort. Canada desired that its own programme should harmonize as far as possible with the programmes of other members of NATO. I then went on to refer to the fact that it was not possible for us to provide economic aid in addition to the other forms of assistance we had already undertaken and our general defence effort. I referred to what Mr. Abbott had said in the meeting of the Committee on December 4th, and emphasized the difficult problem we had in connection with the deficit in our balance of payments with the United States. I mentioned that unlike other countries we were not engaged in discussions concerning our balance of payments, but were endeavouring to deal with the situation through our own policies. I then referred to what Harriman had said about each of us going back to his own government to secure the implementation of as much of the recommendations as possible. I referred to the fact that I was representing Mr. Abbott, who had already explained to the Committee that it was not possible for him to recommend assistance in the form of economic aid. Our position therefore was different to that of the other ministers in that Mr. Abbott could not conscientiously recommend to the government a course which he had already explained to the Committee it was not possible for Canada to undertake. I concluded by stating that I felt sure that Mr. Abbott and his colleagues in the government would review the situation in order to see what could be done within the limits of our present programme to adjust this programme more to the needs of the new situation created by the report.

9. Mr. Harriman received this statement without the slightest sign of displeasure. He paid a tribute to what Canada had already done and said that there was nothing new in what I had said, since Mr. Abbott had made the position very clear. He then suggested that I should wait until I had had my talk with the Executive Bureau when it would be seen what changes could be made in the report to meet our particular case. He then went on to refer to the fact that Canada was meeting its deficit with the United States partly by earning dollars from other countries by virtue of its creditor position with these other countries. This was a factor to which they might have to give consideration. This is a point which Harriman had mentioned to me in the discussion I had had with him the previous day, and goes a long way, I think, to explaining how the precise figure of economic aid from Canada had been arrived at. Parkinson and Ritchie were able to gather from those working with the Executive Bureau that the actual recommendation to Canada had been based largely on information which had been received from the United States Embassy at Ottawa. Someone in the Embassy, presumably Bliss, had telegraphed that we would probably consider extending assistance to our NATO partners in the form of economic aid. I refrained from pointing out to Harriman that our creditor position with Europe was in large measure derived from the efforts we have been making to supply our traditional customers with the essential commodities of which they are so greatly in need.

10. After the closed meeting broke up, we met with the Executive Bureau. I had expected a discussion on the general subject of our balance of payments, and had warned Parkinson and Ritchie to be prepared accordingly. However, the discussion was confined solely to seeing what adjustments could be made in the report to meet our particular case. I took the position that we wished all specific references to Canadian aid to be deleted from the main body of the report. The Executive Bureau were very forthcoming and we accomplished our purpose, although in some cases by the device of rather obscure language. Sir Edwin Plowden and Eric Roll were very helpful, particularly in drafting some of the texts to meet out wishes. Harriman said that he did not want me to think that each member of the Committee was committed to going to his government to see what could be done about the recommendation in the annex concerning his country. He had simply made the plea in the closed meeting in order to have the European Ministers make every effort. He did not think that Mr. Abbott was committed in any way by the procedure they proposed to follow. In spite of this assurance, Harriman agreed to a reference in the foreword, which has now become a letter of transmittal to governments, to the fact that no individual member of the Committee was committed. I am sending you a separate telegram giving the text of the changes in the main body of the report and in the foreword to meet our particular case.

11. We were able to learn from Plowden and Roll that their main concern is to have an agreed report which Harriman can take back to Washington to use in his efforts to persuade Congress to be more forthcoming in such matters as off-shore purchases and the manner in which economic aid can be extended. There was a great atmosphere of unreality and even of deception but it was clear that Harriman was being successful by endeavouring to deal with each country separately. I do not believe my intervention at the closed meeting upset these tactics unduly, particularly as he had already reached agreement with the Belgian Minister. Moreover, what I said will not appear in the summary record, as it was made in the closed meeting, but it was delivered in the hearing of all the Ministers present.

12. The position now is that governments will have until January 15th to submit their comments on the recommendations appearing in the annexes relating to each country. The time and date of the next meeting has not yet been fixed, but it will probably be late in January, and at that meeting a supplementary report will be drawn up based on the comments received from governments. In the meantime active discussions will take place between United States representatives and each government concerning economic aid, and this process of bargaining will be related to the recommendations in the annexes to the report. As if to rebut what I had said about there being no negotiations about Canada, Mr. Harriman said on leaving that I had probably not heard that discussions were now taking place in Ottawa concerning the placing of larger military orders in Canada.

13. Before I left Paris, Baron Snow, who is taking the place of the Belgian Minister on the Committee, came around to the hotel to explain that the Belgian position is very similar to that of Canada in that they were being asked to extend grants to other NATO countries. This they could not contemplate, although they would consider other ways in which they could assist the general situation. He hoped that I would be able to let the Belgian Deputy know of any developments in connection with what we were doing about the report. Obviously he derived some satisfaction from our difficulties, although I do not believe that my intervention in the afternoon had been an important factor in determining the Belgian course, since they too will be engaged in active negotiations with the United States.

14. I left Parkinson to be our representative at the meeting this morning. I think it will be largely a question of confirming what has already been done and of deciding upon the place and time of the next meeting. Ends.

TEXTUAL CHANGES IN PORTIONS OF THE TCC REPORT OF PARTICULAR INTEREST TO CANADA

I. Foreword

This section was redrafted by the Executive Bureau to take account of our position. The text has still to be approved by the full TCC. It would seem to me that our difficulties are covered by the proposed language of Paragraphs 2 and 3(a) and (b) which makes it clear that the government is not committed to any recommendations in the report and that the Canadian member of the Committee is not committed to the assumptions made regarding Canada. The following is the text suggested by the Executive Bureau, Begins:

1. In accordance with the directive of the North Atlantic Council at its meeting on the 19 September last, the Temporary Committee of the Council transmits the following report.

2. In their consideration of the problems remitted to the Committee the twelve national representatives have regarded themselves as members of a team towards a solution of the overall military, political and economic problems of NATO as a whole, rather than as delegates acting on detailed instructions from their governments. It follows from this that the recommendations made in this report cannot be regarded as constituting governmental commitments. It also follows that effective action on the lines proposed by the committee will depend on acceptance and implementation by individual governments.

3. The report has been approved by the TCC on the following understanding:

(a) The body of the report contained in Parts I through V is recommended for acceptance by the North Atlantic Treaty Organization and member governments. The principles, method of approach of the recommended plan of action and the major findings of the Committee are summarized in Part I. The quantitative estimates in Parts II and III rest on a series of assumptions as regards the actions of individual member governments which do not constitute commitments of governments or necessarily of individual members of the Committee.

(b) Accordingly, Part VI containing annexes relating to defence efforts of individual member countries in relation to their politico-economic capabilities are submitted to member governments for their consideration.

(c) The report of the screening and costing staff of the TCC is a Cosmic Top Secret annex to this report; as indicated in Paragraph I of Part IV, the SCS report is recommended for the urgent attention of member countries and North Atlantic Treaty agencies.

(d) The special attention of member governments and North Atlantic Treaty agencies is directed to Paragraph 20, Part I, setting forth recommendations for immediate action.

4. The Committee proposes to prepare a supplementary report for consideration by the North Atlantic Council at its meeting in Lisbon on 2 February 1952. The Committee accordingly requests each member government to forward its comments on the present report, including in particular the annex in Part VI concerning action by it. These comments should be sent as soon as possible, and in any case not later than 15 January, 1952, to the Secretary of the Temporary Council Committee, 2 rue de la Faisanderie, Paris XVI.

5. This report is also being referred to the Military Committee in accordance with the decision of the North Atlantic Council at its Rome meeting. Ends.

II. Paragraphs 10 and 11 of the Section on "The Process of Reconciliation" (TCC-DR/5)

The Executive Bureau proposes that the last sentence of Paragraph 10 should read:

"Against these costs there are credited the defence expenditures proposed by the European countries, together with assumed North American financed military end-items, whether delivered from North America or produced in Europe under the United States off-shore purchases programme, and certain additional contributions submitted for the consideration of various member governments."

In Table I in Paragraph II, the description of the next-to-last line will be changed to read: "less additional expenditure submitted for consideration of governments", and the specific reference to Europe and Canada will be omitted.

III. Paragraph 7 of the Section on "Politico-Economic Capabilities" (TCC-DR/6)

The summary portion of this paragraph will be redrafted and probably will be included in the introduction to the country sections in order to separate it from the main body of the report.

IV. Paragraphs 29 and 30 of the Section in Part II on the dollar balance of payments (TCC-DR/13 through 17)

These two paragraphs have been redrafted by Parkinson and Lindemann, of the United States delegation, on lines which I had discussed with the Executive Bureau. The precise redraft has not yet been approved by the Bureau or by the full TCC. The following is the text of the proposed redraft, Begins:

29. As nearly as can be estimated at present, the TCC believes that the dollar deficit of the European NATO countries for the three-year period ending in July, 1954, will amount to about 7 dollars billion. The means available to cover this deficit cannot be assessed exactly, even for 1951/52—e.g. because of uncertainty as to the division of the total United States aid between end-items and economic aid, and as to the portion of the latter which will be needed for non-NATO countries. Furthermore, the degree to which United States funds will be used for off-shore procurement will have an important effect both on the size of the deficit and on the problems which it creates. However, some broad estimates can be made. Taking into account

(a) United States economic aid already appropriated for 1951/52;

(b) A projection of this aid for planning purposes for the next two years at about the same level;

(c) Projected United States military establishment purchases in Europe; and

(d) The assumptions made in the country annexes, there appears to be something over 4 dollars billion available to meet the deficit.

30. This leaves an uncovered deficit to about 3 dollars billion for the three years. While plans with respect to certain additional expenditures can occur in the following categories: United States off-shore procurement; United States contributions to common infrastructure; possibly large additional receipts from United States military establishment expenditures in Europe, if appropriate arrangements can be made by the United States authorities and by the European suppliers. There will also be a Canadian contribution to common infrastructure and Canadian expenditures in Europe for its military establishment. Thus, for the period as a whole, the presently forecast deficit appears at first sight to be manageable. Ends.

V. Country Annex Relating to Canada

I did not attempt to get this annex redrafted since the foreword made it clear that we were not committed to it in any way and I felt that a formal request for revisions in it might imply that we could be regarded as associated with it in some degree. If the opportunity presents itself, Parkinson will, however, try very informally to get the analytical part of the annex improved in certain respects which I have discussed with him, particularly with a view to bringing out the fact that Canada has both a large United States dollar deficit and a substantial overall deficit.

TCC MEETING DECEMBER 17

Following from Wilgress, Begins: The TCC concluded its present series of meetings Monday night. The last day was devoted to the formal adoption of amendments of varying substantive importance and to the insertion of a number of corrigends. No major difficulties were encountered however since the major issues had been agreed to in the restricted meeting held on Sunday of the twelve TCC representatives.

2. The most substantive discussion yesterday was on the foreword to report. The Belgian representative (not the one who attended Sunday's meeting) was afraid that the following statement in the foreword did not cover his position clearly enough: "The quantitative estimates in Parts II and III (of the report) rests on a series of assumptions (contained in Part VI — country annexes) as regards the action of individual member governments which do not constitute commitments of governments or necessarily of individual members of the Committee". His intervention made it possible for Monnet and several other members to express their dissatisfaction again with the words "or necessarily of individual members". The Belgian intervention was ill-advised since the majority of the members of the Committee was willing to undertake to recommend adoption by their governments of the assumptions made with respect to their country and indeed some of them, like Monnet, were anxious to be so bound. Harriman explained to the Belgian that the words to which he objected had been inserted to meet the Canadian position in this respect, which was the same as that of Belgium. The Committee agreed that the draft as quoted above fully met the Belgian position. We did not have to intervene.

3. The only change made in the text of the foreword (as contained in telegram No. 2985 from London) was in the preamble to paragraph 3 which now reads: "the TCC has agreed to the report on the following basis:".

4. All the amendments of concern to Canada, as contained in telegram No. 2985 from London, were approved yesterday precisely as given therein.

5. Of the other amendments approved perhaps the most important was that concerning the section on EPU (Document TCC-DR/13 through 17). The new draft is rather less critical of the excessive creditor position of Belgium.

6. With respect to amendments to the Canadian annex (see telegram No. 2985 final paragraph) we were able, by an informal approach, to get the Working Group to agree to one minor change, but not to any others. Paragraph 1(c) of the Canadian annex will now read: "due to the large increase of Canada's purchases in the United States required for defence or defence production, and to the post Korean rise in import prices, Canada has a sizeable deficit in its balance of payments with the United States, which is only partially offset by its surpluses with other areas". It was not possible to gain acceptance of a change in Paragraph 3(a) to indicate that Canada, too, has serious balance of payments difficulties. As you may guess, such a change would, in the view of the Working Group, weaken the effect of the major recommendation and, in their view, was covered as to the argument by the reference to the problem in Paragraph 3(c). We pointed out the unreality of the argument used in the last part of Paragraph 3(c), having in mind the fact that additional orders would take a long time to produce any impact on the balance of payments. In view of the fact that this annex is the responsibility of the Executive Bureau, to which we clearly are not committed, and to the fact that the notion expressed in this paragraph is firmly held by Harriman himself, it was not possible to persuade the Working Group to go back with proposals for a revision of this paragraph.

7. The report as revised will be issued shortly and we shall airbag copies to you.

8. Harriman emphasized the importance of the request which is made in the revised foreword to the report that each member government should forward, before January 17th, its comments on the present report, including in particular the annex in Part VI concerning action by it, and also on the SCS report. He explained that these comments would be collated by the Working Group (i.e. the Deputies) of the Executive Bureau which would meet later in January. Comments on the SCS report are to be handled by McNarney's staff. He suggested and it was agreed that after consideration by the Executive Bureau, the TCC shall meet again in Paris rather than in Lisbon in view of the large staff required. No date was fixed for this TCC meeting at which a supplementary report is to be prepared for Lisbon.

9. The Committee agreed to leave it to Harriman to prepare a press release covering its activities. In agreeing to do this, he said he was anxious to consult with SHAPE so that "the release would be balanced as between the military and the economic". The press release, which Harriman issued at a two-hour press conference this morning, is contained in my immediately following telegram.† A letter which Eisenhower sent Harriman on December 14th was annexed to the press release (see Document TCC-D(22) airbagged to you on December 17th.)[72] Ends.

ECONOMIC ASSISTANCE TO YUGOSLAVIA; LABRADOR FISH

23. The Secretary of State for External Affairs, referring to the discussions at the meetings of December 28th, [sic] 1950[73] and April 13th, 1951,[74] recommended approval for the inclusion in the supplementary estimates for 1951-52 of up to $45,000 for the purchase of some 125 tons of Labrador fish and its shipment to Yugoslavia as a gift for purposes of relief. A substantial portion of the funds required would have to be paid, in any event, under the present support programme if, as appeared probable, the fish proved unmarketable.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated.

(Minister's memorandum, May 18, 1951 — Cab. Doc. 154-51)†

24. Mr. Pearson said that the other North Atlantic countries considered it important to extend economic assistance to Yugoslavia in order to stabilize conditions there until the next harvest. The United States and the United Kingdom were undertaking large relief programmes. It appeared that the political difficulties previously anticipated at the meeting of December 28th, 1950, in connection with direct Canadian aid to Yugoslavia, would not be serious in this case as the shipments would be small and there was strong evidence that Tito would shortly give a further indication of his desire for co-operation with the democracies by releasing Archbishop Stepinec.

25. The Cabinet, after discussion, approved the recommendation of the Secretary of State for External Affairs and agreed that up to $45,000 be included in the supplementary estimates for 1951-52, for the purchase of Labrador fish and its transportation to Yugoslavia as a gift for purposes of relief.

PROVISION OF ARMS TO YUGOSLAVIA

26. The Minister of National Defence, referring to the discussion at the meeting of May 18th, 1951, reported that the Foreign Military Aid Branch of the U.S. Department of Defense had recently communicated to the Canadian Joint Staff, Washington, a request that Canada provide military aid to Yugoslavia in the form of certain of the remaining U.K.-type supplies and equipment that it was planned to make available to the North Atlantic Treaty Organization but which were still unallocated. The letter had indicated that the request was on behalf of the U.S. government; the members of the Standing Group had considered that it would be desirable for Canada to furnish a substantial portion of the equipment requested; the United Kingdom, France and the United States were taking action to provide arms to Yugoslavia; and, it was proposed that the Canadian equipment requested be made available free of charge at Canadian ports for shipment at U.S. expense to a stockpile being established by the U.S. government near Yugoslavia or, if possible, direct to Yugoslavia.

For various reasons, the portion of the remaining Canadian stock of U.K.-type equipment still available for transfer had decreased in size since communication to the Standing Group some months ago of the list on which the U.S. authorities had based their request. While the matter was still under consideration, it appeared that, if the presently-indicated requirements of NATO countries for Canadian supplies were to be met, only a limited number of rifles and some range finders could be provided for Yugoslavia.

(Letter, May 15, 1951 to the Canadian Joint Staff, Washington, from the Foreign Military Aid Branch, U.S. Department of Defense)†

27. The Minister of Trade and Commerce pointed out that the Defence Appropriation Act, 1950, alone provided authority for the gift of equipment to other countries.

28. The Minister of Public Works suggested that, if it were decided to provide arms to Yugoslavia, they might be furnished as mutual aid under that Act to a NATO country, which could then arrange for their transfer to Yugoslavia.

29. The Secretary of State for External Affairs considered that the channel used by the U.S. authorities in raising the matter was inappropriate for the type of question involved.

30. The Prime Minister thought that no decision should be reached before it was clear what contributions the United States and the United Kingdom planned to make and until certain political developments in Yugoslavia were clarified.

31. The Cabinet, after further discussion, noted the report of the Minister of National Defence as to the amount of U.K.-type equipment that might be available in Canada to meet a request from the U.S. military authorities for the provision of arms to Yugoslavia, and agreed to defer decision on the matter for the present.

ECONOMIC AID TO YUGOSLAVIA

On Wednesday Griffin and I went to see Bryce of the Department of Finance about this subject.

2. We told Bryce quite frankly that, although the opinion in the Department was unanimous that Yugoslavia must be kept afloat, we have rather mixed feelings about the extent of any Canadian participation in economic aid. We found that Bryce was rather more receptive to the proposal than we had anticipated. He readily agreed that Yugoslavia must be supported and expressed the view that, if we are going to offer any aid at all, it must be something more than a token "codfish" offer. We did not discuss any amounts in detail or the type of aid which Canada could make available but we drew the conclusion that Bryce thought it would not be worthwhile asking for much less than a couple of million dollars in whatever form might be appropriate.

3. It was agreed that Bryce would speak to his Minister who is expected back in town within a few days. He would not tell Mr. Abbott that this question had been raised officially but merely inform him that a resolution had come before the Deputies and that we might expect, sooner or later, an approach either from the Yugoslav Government or from one of the Standing Group countries to consider economic aid to Yugoslavia in some form.

4. I am of the opinion that we should now proceed to clear this question with the Cabinet and in this connection I believe it would be desirable to wait until Mr. Pearson returns from Europe rather than attempt to carry this matter into the Cabinet without him. Accordingly, as soon as the Minister returns, a memorandum should be put before him outlining the proposal.[75]

Memorandum from European Division

SECRET [Ottawa], July 27, 1951

ECONOMIC AID TO YUGOSLAVIA

Recently, the three governments of the United States, United Kingdom and France considered it advisable to develop a plan of assistance which, in cooperation with other forms of assistance, should lead to the attainment of equilibrium on Yugoslavia's foreign payments and enable Yugoslavia to be independent of extraordinary foreign economic aid. The assistance planned is as follows:

1. Grant of money
2. Postponement of debt payments
3. Revision of debt repayment schedules
4. Facilitating the procurement of goods now in short supply in Yugoslavia.

At the same time, the three governments considered that the problem of Yugoslavia was of concern not only to them but to all the NATO members whose security is involved. Accordingly the following resolution was submitted to the Council Deputies:

"Economic assistance to Yugoslavia.

"The Council Deputies, reiterating the view expressed in their agreed minute of January 22, 1951 (See Document D-D(51)29 Final)† that 'it is most desirable that the Western Powers give economic assistance to the Government of Yugoslavia to the best of their ability', and recognizing that on the basis of the developments described in document D-D(51)174,† the time has now come to take concrete steps of this kind, recommend to member governments that, if they are approached by the Yugoslav Government, they cooperate to the fullest extent feasible by extending economic assistance to Yugoslavia.

"Member governments are advised that the Governments of France, the United Kingdom and the United States expect to approach each of them individually through diplomatic channels to ascertain what cooperative measures they can undertake, and to cooperate with them in working out specific arrangements for the implementation of such measures."

Since the wording of the resolution could be interpreted as a guarantee of aid by all members agreeing to it, we informed Mr. Wilgress that it was not possible for him to accept it until the government had had adequate time to give full consideration to the question. Mr. Wilgress thereupon informed the Department that no guarantee of aid was expected but that the resolution required only the reiteration of the view expressed earlier (Doc D-D(51)29 Final)† — that it is desirable that the Western Powers give economic assistance to the best of their ability, and recommend that if they are approached by the Yugoslav Government they should cooperate to the fullest extent feasible by extending economic assistance to Yugoslavia.

As the Minister was at this time in London, the Department requested Mr. Wilgress to obtain his views. Mr. Pearson pointed out that he considered we should agree to the resolution since it appeared that to do otherwise would place us in the position of being the only abstainer. However, he instructed the High Commissioner to emphasise "that all we are under any obligation to do is to cooperate to the fullest extent possible in the consideration of any request for economic assistance". He also added that he thought the High Commissioner could accept the draft resolution without any specific approval from the Cabinet although if there were time the Department might put it up on these lines.

Since both the Minister and the Acting Minister were away, it was decided not to put anything up to Cabinet on this matter at this time.

On July 23 at the Meeting of the Political Working Group the United States representative, Mr. Galloway, circulated a memorandum† referring to military assistance to Yugoslavia. The gist of the memorandum was a request that the NATO members reaffirm their belief that the ability of Yugoslavia to defend itself will contribute to the preservation of peace and security of the North Atlantic area. The reason for this request is that since the United States Government is contemplating assistance to Yugoslavia by providing military equipment and additional economic aid, it is required by legislation to consult with other NATO governments. The attached Aide Mémoire is therefore in line with our previous one of March 28 (copy† of which is attached).

Mr. Morgan received this Aide Mémoire yesterday, July 26.

At this stage, it appears necessary to decide whether Cabinet should be approached on the stand we should take if the Yugoslavs make a request for assistance. I think that if a memorandum were to be put to Cabinet it should outline the present position and recommend either that we should grant aid to Yugoslavia if approached (if it is sufficiently clear we intend so to do), or that we should be prepared to give consideration of any request on its merits. Alternatively, it might be preferable to refrain from submitting a memorandum to Cabinet until an actual request is made. This has the disadvantage of uncertainty and delay both from the Yugoslav point of view and from the point of view of any working group in this Department. On balance, therefore, it would seem preferable to forewarn Cabinet so that we would be able to deal more promptly, either for or against, with any request that might be made.[76]

ECONOMIC ASSISTANCE TO YUGOSLAVIA

Reference para. (1), the following is the text of the Aide Mémoire transmitted through the United States Embassy in Ottawa on July 26:

The Canadian Government has considered the question raised in the memorandum† circulated by the United States representative at the meeting of the NATO Political Working Group on July 23, 1951, of further provision of assistance to Yugoslavia by the United States administration under the authority of the Mutual Defence Assistance Act of 1949, as amended pursuant to the terms of Section 408 (cc) of that Act.

The Canadian Government reaffirms the position it has taken in this regard in its Aide Mémoire of March 28, 1951,† to the effect that the ability of Yugoslavia to continue as an independent nation is of great importance for the preservation of the peace and security of the North Atlantic area.

The Canadian Government, therefore, agrees that the provision of further assistance to Yugoslavia will contribute to the maintenance of peace and security. Such assistance is of importance for the defence of the North Atlantic area in view of the strategic location of Yugoslavia and the serious effect on the security of the North Atlantic area which would result from the inability of the Yugoslav Government to obtain military as well as other equipment and supplies it requires to provide for the defence of its territory.

UNITED STATES REQUEST FOR CANADIAN MILITARY AID TO YUGOSLAVIA

1. We have been approached again by the State Department regarding the possibility of obtaining Canadian military aid for Yugoslavia. The approach was informal and made at a junior level to obtain our reactions. During a talk about other matters with Vass, officer in charge of political-military affairs in the State Department, we were informed that the State Department were considering how to request the Canadian Government to furnish military equipment to Yugoslavia. The military situation in Yugoslavia is apparently quite critical and the only available existing stocks which could be readily transferred to Yugoslavia comprise some German equipment in Norway and at least part of the unallocated United Kingdom type equipment held by Canada. He said that no firm decisions had, as yet, been reached, but that the following three possible methods of approaching the Canadian Government on this problem were under consideration:

(a) The Standing Group might make a recommendation to the effect that all or a portion of the unallocated Phase 3 equipment offered to NATO should, in the interest of North Atlantic Treaty defence, be sent to Yugoslavia;

(b) The United Kingdom, the United States and France might jointly approach the Canadian Government with the request that the offer of the present Phase 3 equipment to NATO be withdrawn and the equipment or a portion of it be allocated to Yugoslavia;

(c) The United States or the United Kingdom might make a bilateral approach to Canada with a similar request. He said that one difficulty with respect to a United States bilateral approach was that Canada might expect the United States to purchase the equipment for transfer to Yugoslavia. He said there was very little likelihood of this as present United States policy does not contemplate offshore purchasing in Canada under the M.D.A.P.

2. Vass was reminded of the recent request which had come from the United States Department of the Army. He was also told that aside from the question of availabilities there was no certainty that the transfer to Yugoslavia of this equipment would be possible under existing Canadian legislation.

3. Vass said that this discussion could be regarded as advance warning and that the State Department would appreciate any comments which we might wish to offer on the type of approach which could be made to Canada, the likelihood that the equipment could be made available, and the best means, from our standpoint, of making this equipment available. He mentioned that there might be possible political difficulties for Yugoslavia in accepting equipment on the basis of an allocation recommended by a North Atlantic Treaty Body.

UNITED STATES REQUEST FOR TRANSFER OF CANADIAN ARMS TO YUGOSLAVIA

Following from Under-Secretary, Begins: The questions raised by your telegram received some discussion at Cabinet Defence Committee on October 2 in connection with the first item on the agenda, which concerned allocation of Canadian Army equipment to various countries. We are sending in this message a summary of the discussion which took place, and will let you know as soon as possible, what, if anything, you should say to the State Department.

2. The subject was raised by the Minister of National Defence, who referred to the preliminary consideration given the matter at the meeting of the Cabinet on May 30, 1951. He reported that the U.S. authorities, considering that Yugoslavia required arms urgently, were preparing to press for Canadian action in the matter. The Standing Group strongly favoured the proposal and one or all of the Standing Group countries were likely to make a formal request to Canada in the near future.

3. The Prime Minister wondered how public opinion would react to Canadian provision of equipment to Yugoslavia in view of the situation regarding Trieste. Mr. Pearson doubted that the two questions would be viewed as related to one another. He mentioned that the Standing Group were trying to bring Italy and Yugoslavia together on the Trieste question and there was some possibility that they would succeed. If they did, the allied position in the area would be strengthened and assistance to Yugoslavia would be made easier. Although in May the provision of equipment to Yugoslavia had been deferred in view of certain political factors, it was unsatisfactory that equipment should be given for example to Portugal and not to Yugoslavia, which would put it to far more effective use, having already some twenty-eight divisions in being.

4. Mr. St. Laurent enquired whether General Eisenhower had been brought into the discussions on provision of arms to Yugoslavia by NATO countries. To Canadians he was the expert on what measures should be taken in Europe to prevent war. Possibly he had already expressed views in the matter. Should he recommend the provision of Canadian equipment to Yugoslavia with a view to strengthening Western Europe, it would be helpful.

5. Mr. Pearson thought that the Standing Group would not be backing the provision of military aid to Yugoslavia without first having consulted General Eisenhower, and agreed that, should a formal approach be made to Canada for the provision of equipment, General Eisenhower's views could be sought.

6. Mr. Claxton said that, while it would not be desirable to transfer to Yugoslavia U.K.-type equipment required by NATO countries, there would be some items, such as 25-pounder guns, which would be very useful to Yugoslavia and were not required in the NATO area.

7. Mr. Bryce suggested that consideration might usefully be given to the possibility of transferring equipment to Yugoslavia through a third party, as had been done in the case of Turkey during the last war.

8. After some further discussion the subject was dropped on the understanding that the Committee would, upon receipt of a formal request supported by General Eisenhower's recommendation for the provision of arms to Yugoslavia by Canada, be prepared to consider what items of equipment not required by NATO countries might be transferred to Yugoslavia.

9. Subsequent to the discussion in Cabinet Defence, we received General Foulkes' account of his recent conversations in Washington, of which he has already told you. There was some discussion of the general subject of provision of arms to Yugoslavia and we are recapitulating several points of importance. Apparently the United States by reason of legislative restrictions may have difficulty in sending any further military equipment to Yugoslavia except for a certain amount of unimportant and obsolete material. The Pentagon does not appear to have altered its view that the position in Yugoslavia is quite critical, but it is having second thoughts about the desirability of sending further equipment to that country without a good deal more information than is at present available as to how effectively it would be used. The Pentagon is anxious to send to Yugoslavia a group of eighteen liaison officers to make a detailed study, which would form the basis of a judgment as to whether or not armaments shipped to Yugoslavia might be wasted through inefficient employment. Until some such study is available, the Pentagon is not anxious to send further modern equipment to Yugoslavia when it might be of more use in countries of Western Europe where technical knowledge is more advanced even though the number of trained troops may be smaller.

10. This information obtained by General Foulkes puts in a new light the approach made to you by Vass. There may be some possibility that the formal request foreseen by Vass will not in fact materialize. We suggest that you let the subject lie fallow until you hear from us again.[77]

UNITED STATES REQUEST FOR TRANSFER OF CANADIAN ARMS TO YUGOSLAVIA

1. As reported in my despatch under reference, the State Department have not permitted this question to "lie fallow". Yesterday, Ignatieff was asked by Haselton to meet with the Officer-in-Charge of Balkan Affairs and the officer on the Yugoslav Desk, to receive what was described as "official notice" that a new approach to the Canadian Government may be expected shortly from the governments represented on the Standing Group with a request for the provision of military aid by Canada to Yugoslavia.

2. The State Department officials explained that this United States approach was being made at this time because the signing of the bilateral agreement between the United States and Yugoslavia yesterday now made it possible for the United States Government to go ahead with its own increased programme of military aid to Yugoslavia. (The text of the bilateral agreement signed November 14th is contained in my immediately following teletype en clair).[78] The United Kingdom and French Government, with whom there has been constant consultation on this matter, will likewise extend military assistance to Yugoslavia.

3. This formal approach, it was explained, was being made so that the Canadian Government would have definite notice that the Standing Group members intend to raise this question again with the Canadian military representatives. It would thus give an opportunity for the Canadian authorities to review the possibility of transferring Canadian arms to Yugoslavia on the basis of the list of unallocated military equipment submitted by Canada to the Standing Group. The State Department officials were aware that there was a need by the Yugoslav forces which could not be filled from United States, United Kingdom and French sources for field artillery, particularly 25 pounder guns. They also suggested that if the Canadian Government found it difficult to make commitments now for the transfer of a number of items in substantial quantities to Yugoslavia in the future, consideration might be given to going ahead on a piecemeal basis with the transfer of one or two items of equipment in small numbers, gradually extending the transfers as it became clear that the equipment in question was not required by Canada or in the NATO area.

[78] Non imprimé./Not printed. Voir/See United States, Department of State, Bulletin, Volume XXV, No. 648, November 26, 1951, pp. 863-864.

4. There was some general discussion on the point raised in paragraph 2 of your message EX-1975 of October 12th,† concerning the usefulness of such transfers of equipment to Yugoslavia. The State Department representatives were unable to throw any light on the impression referred to that the Pentagon may have some doubts on the efficiency of the employment of equipment by the Yugoslav forces. All that they could say was that they were satisfied that, as a result of the negotiations leading to the bilateral agreement just concluded, they could count upon a much greater degree of military co-operation with the Yugoslav forces. The Yugoslav Government had agreed now to a considerable addition of staff in the office of the United States Military Attaché in Belgrade to supervise the transfers of equipment. Under Article 6, paragraph 3, of the bilateral agreement, the Yugoslav Government agreed to "take appropriate steps to ensure the effective utilization of the economic and military assistance provided by the Government of the United States".

5. There was also some discussion on the respective role of the Standing Group and General Eisenhower in the making of recommendations on the relative priority to be accorded to the NATO area and Yugoslavia in the provision of equipment. The State Department representatives expressed the view that since Yugoslavia was outside the NATO area, there might be difficulty in making any formal request to General Eisenhower for a recommendation on a matter which evidently lies outside his area of responsibility. The Standing Group also has no direct responsibility in regard to Yugoslavia, although in the discussions which have taken place in the Council Deputies, it has been recognized that it was desirable for NATO members to keep in touch with one another on the defence problems of Yugoslavia since these impinged in an important way on the defence of the NATO area. As far as the new approach to the Canadian Government was concerned, the Standing Group was involved because the equipment which might be transferred by Canada to Yugoslavia was included in the list of availabilities submitted by Canada to the Standing Group. It might, therefore, be expected that the Standing Group could express an opinion, or even a recommendation to the effect that more urgent requirements for the Canadian equipment in question existed outside the North Atlantic area and that no objection would therefore be raised to such unallocated equipment being made available to Yugoslavia.

6. The discussion ended by the State Department officials being reminded again that, apart from the uncertainty existing with regard to the availability of Canadian equipment to Yugoslavia, there was also uncertainty as to whether such transfers to Yugoslavia would be possible under existing Canadian legislation. The State Department officials were not clear as to exactly when the new approach to us would be made through the Standing Group. They thought it might be within the next two weeks. However, it does not seem probable that the question would be raised until after the next round of NATO meetings are concluded in Rome because of the absence of senior officials.

CIRCULAR DESPATCH ON THE ROME MEETING

I should like to give you some impressions of the Rome meeting of the NATO Council which the Press have pictured as a near failure but which, by crystallizing important issues and pointing out the urgent necessity of their solution, did in fact do much to prepare the ground for the next Council at Lisbon, which may be the decisive meeting in NATO history. Admittedly there were, as the Press reported, differences of opinion, but if these did not exist there would not be any need for NATO meetings. These differences were aired and the exercise certainly did not widen the area of disagreement nor even reveal any unsuspected divergence of view. I think it is fair to say that as much was accomplished as could reasonably have been expected from the meeting when it was held before the report of the Temporary Committee of the Council was ready; when the European defence community discussions had not yet reached any conclusion and when the tripartite negotiations with Germany were still going on. Furthermore, the new United Kingdom Government had just taken office and Mr. Churchill had not yet had his meeting with President Truman, on which so many decisions of U.K. policy apparently must wait. Taking these factors into account, it was a hopeful meeting, and we can look to Lisbon for progress on the analysis of the TCC report and the Medium Term Defence Plan; on the various command questions, the standardization of small arms and perhaps even on the new status for Germany and the establishment of the European defence community, although it must be recognized that the chances of the last two being ready for final action are slim indeed.

There were several procedural innovations at the Rome meeting. The first was at the public opening meeting where, as well as the welcoming addresses by Mr. De Gasperi, as head of the host state and by Mr. Pearson, who was in the Chair as President for the first time, Mr. Van Zeeland, as past President, Mr. Kraft of Denmark, and Mr. Eden also spoke. Thus, you see that we only heard from one of the Big Three at the opening meeting, that being Mr. Eden who was attending his first NATO meeting. Mr. Acheson, perhaps feeling that the participation of General Eisenhower and General Gruenther, together with Mr. Harriman at later sessions, would so emphasize the predominance of United States influence, decided not to speak at the opening session and, in fact, did not play a very conspicuous part in the Council's deliberations at this meeting. That is not to say, of course, that American influence behind the scenes was, to any extent, reduced.

In his opening remarks, Mr. Pearson stressed the fact that there was nothing inconsistent in holding the NATO meeting while United Nations were busy discussing disarmament. He said that "our determination to strengthen our defences under the North Atlantic Pact when we have unfortunately every reason to feel that strength for defence is necessary in the world today, and our loyalty to the principles of the United Nations Charter are two parts of the same policy". He went on to affirm that "we have no intention of diverting from peaceful use anything like the resources which would be needed for aggressive action, but we have every intention of securing the strength needed to defend ourselves". This is a point which was also made by General Eisenhower later during the Council. He affirmed that the professional soldiers in the Kremlin were well able to assess the magnitude of NATO defensive military preparations and to recognize that they fall far short of what would be necessary if any aggressive military action were contemplated. Mr. Pearson went on to say that while the meeting will be rightly concerned with the most immediate and urgent task of strengthening our defences, NATO would not be neglecting the long-range purpose of building the North Atlantic community into a closer association for the economic and social advancement of its peoples. This would emphasize that NATO has always been and must remain more than a mere military alliance.

In his remarks, Mr. Kraft, the Foreign Minister of Denmark, also referred to the similarity of purpose of U.N. and NATO. He stressed the close connection between the work in Paris and in Rome and denied the Russian propaganda that they were incompatible. He put it this way: "Rome represents the work of today and Paris the work of tomorrow. In Paris we are planning for the future. Our goal is the progressive reduction of armaments. The world of today is so full of contradictions that before we can reach the goal we set ourselves in Paris, we must solve the problems which are before us in Rome, namely, to prepare the strengthening of defence which is required in order to bring about an approximate balance in the strength of the East and the West. Without such balance there will be no security and without security all talk of reduction of armaments is empty."

At this opening meeting Mr. Pearson welcomed observers from Greece and Turkey. Turkey had nominated its Ambassador in Rome and Greece had sent to the meeting the Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. Their attendance was limited to the plenary session of the Council.

On Saturday afternoon the Council had its first closed session and as the first item considered draft rules to govern press relations at Council meetings to provide what is called, somewhat optimistically in Mr. Pearson's opinion, a "controllable flow of information". The substance of the decision was that specific topics on the agenda should not be discussed with the press. They should not even be mentioned as topics which were up for discussion. The three placed in this category at Rome were the special political topics on which reports were heard; the relative strengths of Soviet and NATO forces and the study on the effectiveness of NATO forces. On other topics it was decided that the Chairman of the Council should use his discretion in giving information to the press at briefing sessions which only he, alone or with a Council colleague, should give.

The reports from the Military Committee were then submitted by its Chairman and it was decided that to expedite the Council's business the majority of these, which were largely technical, should be referred to a sub-committee of Defence Ministers who would report back to the Council at a later session.

A progress report on the Civilian Agencies was then submitted by Mr. Spofford, the Chairman of the Deputies. These were for information and did not call for any action.

The meeting then heard from various Foreign Ministers on political topics of particular concern. It had been decided, on the recommendation of the Deputies as a result of a suggestion first made through the Working Group of the Committee of Five, that the general review of world events by each Foreign Minister which had been on the agenda of previous meetings, should be replaced by reports on selected topics or areas of special interest.

Mr. Acheson, somewhat reluctantly it must be recognized, began with a short report on the Far Eastern situation. He declared that there was little information he could add to the full reports carried by the press, but he did make several significant observations. He stressed the fact that the Far East was the area where actual fighting is now taking place — fighting which is all communist-directed and which has the result of diverting NATO forces.

He declined to forecast on the outcome of the cease fire negotiations and insisted that while the United Nations Commander was sincerely anxious for peace, he was also most realistic about communist manoeuvres in negotiation.

Mr. Acheson explained that, in his view, if an armistice was achieved "certain things will flow" and conversely, if there is no armistice "other things will flow". In elaboration he explained that following an armistice immediate action for the reconstruction of Southern Korea should be taken but that nothing should be done, in his opinion, in North Korea until there is a political settlement. Nevertheless, before any real help could be given to South Korea he felt strongly that the administrative procedures in the United Nations would have to be overhauled. He also stressed that there should be no illusions about a speedy withdrawal of troops after an armistice. On the other hand, if there is no armistice, additional contributions in troops will be necessary and assistance would also be required from those who have not yet sent forces.

Turning to the Pacific area generally, he outlined the U.S. Administration's intentions to present to Congress at the first opportunity the Pacts which form the basis of the Pacific security system. He described these as just a beginning "a nucleus around which other nations can associate themselves".

There was no discussion following his statement but Mr. Pearson remarked on the importance to all of us to know, as far in advance as possible, when the flow of events, which Mr. Acheson foresaw, is likely to begin, so as to prevent any of us from being engulfed by it and to enable us to take our part in directing it. Mr. Pearson could see action in the United Nations by Mr. Vishinsky, as one consequence of the flow in either contingency. In the event of an armistice Vishinsky is likely to insist that the time is now ripe for a general discussion of Far Eastern questions and it would require a good deal of prior consultation among us if we are to act together.

Mr. Eden then gave a report on the situation in Egypt. His main theme was to assure the Council that the United Kingdom would do everything possible to limit the area of conflict to the Canal Zone. He confirmed that the United Kingdom was both able and determined to maintain its position and rather surprised the meeting by describing local relations with the Egyptian army as excellent. The British apparently cooperate with them to the extent of facilitating the daily movement of a supply train across the Canal Zone to the Egyptian forces in the Gaza Strip.

The three main points of U.K. policy in the area are: to maintain United Kingdom rights under the Treaties; to prevent the conflict spreading; and to remain ready to reopen discussions with the Egyptians on the Four Power proposals.

There was evident sympathy and support for the United Kingdom position in the Council and there was some discussion. Mr. Stikker, the Netherlands Foreign Minister, explained the difficulties which his Government had had with Egypt, when it had become necessary for their new Minister to present his credentials. The Egyptians had insisted on the recognition of the King as King of the Sudan and up to the time he spoke the credentials had been refused. He described how necessary it would be to form a united front on this matter. The same situation had apparently arisen with respect to the credentials of the new Egyptian Minister to Lisbon, in which case the Portuguese Government had declined to accept credentials which varied in any way from the former description of the King.

Mr. De Gasperi made a short intervention in the debate pointing to the traditional Italian interest in the Middle East and to the necessity of firmness in meeting the situation, for he insisted that it would be an error to underestimate the consequences of the manifestations of excessive nationalism which were evident in the area.

The Greek observer, at the invitation of the President, then described the particular difficulties of his country regarding the credentials for their new Ambassador in Cairo — a situation which was made the more serious by the fact that there are some 120 thousand Greek citizens in Egypt who are pressing the Greek Government to meet the Egyptian demand for recognition of the King's new title. He declared, however, that the Greek Government was determined not to give way.

The meeting then heard from Mr. Lange, who described the diplomatic difficulties between Norway and the Soviet Union arising from the latter's protest that the placing of Spitsbergen within the NATO area and the preparation of NATO bases in Norway was a contravention of the Norwegian Soviet Treaty. There had also been objection to the Norwegian Government's action in concentrating Soviet War graves. Mr. Lange saw that there was a possibility that the Soviet protest arose from a real fear that military measures are under preparation in Spitsbergen as part of North Atlantic defence planning, and this is the interpretation which he holds. On the other hand, the Soviet Notes might have a different motivation — that of preparing the ground for Soviet action in this northern area, and while feeling that the Soviet Government could not be under any misapprehension that Spitsbergen, like the rest of Norway, is part of the North Atlantic area and would benefit fully from the protection of the Organization and thus could not believe in the possibility of successfully pursuing any isolated aggression. Nevertheless, recently there had been a certain increase in the strength and number of Russian naval units and merchant ships under the Russian flag in northern waters. Norway has asked the proper organs of the North Atlantic Organization to make an evaluation of this development.

Mr. Schuman then spoke on the situation in Indo-China. He explained the support which the nationalists in that area were now getting from communist China although, as yet, there was no evidence of the participation of Chinese "volunteers". He explained that over one-third of the military budget of France is used to support the action in Indo-China and stressed that France is thus carrying out two engagements, the one in the Far East, and their undertakings in Western Europe — in two places for the same end. He referred to Mr. Acheson's remarks on Korea and saw as a possible consequence of an armistice the transfer of Chinese volunteers to the Indonesian front.

He, like the others who had spoken after Mr. Eden, expressed his support for the British position in the Suez.

Monday was U.S. day at the Foro Italico — the day when General Gruenther made his "presentation" to the Council and when General Eisenhower made his personal appearance before the Military Committee and later before the Council.

General Gruenther gave a clear and informative summary of the facts behind medium-term defence planning and the estimate of relative strengths of Soviet and NATO forces, but he did not really add any information to that contained in the two Standing Group documents which had been prepared on this subject. There is little doubt, however, but that his presentation was useful, for some of the political representatives may have shied away from studying these figures of strengths and force requirements in detail and he certainly made it quite clear that the forces which were being requested were the minimum required to plan any kind of a stand against a possible Soviet attack. On the whole his tone was encouraging and confident and he left no doubt that, even as matters stood, SHAPE was prepared to make a stand no matter when the balloon might go up.

Mr. Harriman, the Chairman of the TCC, followed General Gruenther and reported on the work of that Committee. This was, of necessity, an interim report as their work is still in mid-career. He mentioned specifically, however, that in his mind the failure to provide airfields on time was a critical defect in the military preparations and that a lack of knowledge of requirements was one of the most serious questions in the whole infrastructure problem.

He also paid special attention to the acute shortage of coal in Europe which he saw to be one of the gravest problems. He urged the highest priority and co-operation in its solution.

Regarding the final report of the Temporary Committee he explained that it would be impossible to reach agreement on all points, certainly within the time limit, and, in any event, to do so it would be necessary to water down the conclusions to a degree where they would be meaningless. In any event, whether we are to be presented with a series of recommendations, each supported by eleven votes with one dissenting, or whether we are to get something more worthwhile, the report of the TCC will be ready by the middle of December and will come before the next meeting of the Council.

He was followed by Edwin Plowden, the U.K. Vice-Chairman of the Committee, who made an arid scholarly review of the economic problems with which the Committee had to wrestle and then, after a much needed seventh-inning stretch, came the long awaited moment and General Eisenhower appeared.

After all the build-up he had received, it would hardly be possible not to be disappointed and unfortunately most were, but General Eisenhower certainly spoke with vigour and conviction. But one felt that his remarks might have been better suited to another audience.

He declined to accept the validity of political limitations and remarked that "if we allow statements of what is politically feasible to sway us we will achieve nothing". This remark brought the reaction he, no doubt, expected and the following day Mr. Butler, Mr. Lange and Mr. Kristensen all referred to the need to recognize political difficulties. Mr. Butler said: "The General was good enough to tell us that we must surmount our own political difficulties and that I assure him we will do our best to do. To follow up again what the Defence Minister of Canada has said, politics is "l'art du possible" and we will do all that is possible within our own sphere bearing in mind what I have said that I feel certain there is not only no moral difficulty but an inspiration from what we have heard from this meeting." Mr. Lange, in referring to the political problems, spoke of the necessity of convincing those who hold the purse strings and suggested that it might be useful to have a study of the situation which could be used publicly. Mr. Kristensen was thinking along the same line and recommended a study of Soviet foreign policy.

General Eisenhower also referred to the problem of European unity which he described as his "favourite topic". He said he had come to believe that we must have a European army in order to get German strength without risk and without loss to them of self-respect. This, alongside the Schuman plan, must, in his opinion, succeed. General Eisenhower, like General Gruenther, ended on a note of confidence stressing unity as the great asset next to troops.

The next day, as I have mentioned, there was some discussion on General Eisenhower's remarks. The Council then turned to consideration of the item on German participation in Western defence. The Chairman reviewed the question up to the Ottawa meeting and then Mr. Schuman reported on the Paris discussions. There has evidently been some considerable progress and Mr. Schuman, on the whole, drew an encouraging picture although it appeared later, from remarks by Mr. Stikker, that such important points as the composition of the supreme authority, its relationship with the Council of Ministers, in fact the relationship of the EDC with NATO, as well as the financial consequences of the arrangement were still far from settled. In fact, some of them had not even been considered.

Mr. Schuman had stated that the conference had never lost sight of the fact that the European defence force was destined to be an integral part of the NATO defence force and that, in consequence, a close and constant liaison with SHAPE was being maintained, and, on the other hand, the Council of Deputies was regularly kept informed. After describing in detail the contemplated military structure he said that on the present timetable if the necessary legislation in Germany should come into force on the 1st of April, 1952, the twelve basic units which are actually foreseen would be ready for use on the 1st of April, 1954.

He said that in the political sphere the technical committees of the conference were exploring the problems of the composition and powers of the various bodies necessary to establish the functional equilibrium of the Organization. He gave no details, however, nor any regarding the association with NATO.

He ended by stating that neither the reconstruction of the Wehrmacht nor the neutralization of Germany was possible. In the existing international circumstances only the integration of Germany into Europe, according to the conditions foreseen in Washington last September, would constitute a durable solution and he expressed again his conviction that with the good faith of all participants it would be possible, within a few weeks, to bring the project to a complete and effective conclusion.

Mr. Acheson then discussed the tripartite talks with Germany on contractual relations. He described the agreement on general relations, including a charter of an arbitration tribunal which had been agreed in Paris on the 22nd November and the four related specific agreements which were still under discussion. They are: an agreement on Acts and certain interests of the Three Powers and the transfer of certain responsibilities to the Federal Republic; an agreement on the status of foreign forces stationed in the Federal Republic and their protection; an agreement on logistical and financial support; and an agreement on security safe-guards.

Mr. Acheson explained that in the discussions it became clear that a peace settlement for the whole of Germany was an essential aim of the common policy of the Occupying Powers and the Federal Republic and that the final determination of the boundaries of Germany must await such a settlement.

In regard to the arbitration tribunal he described the preoccupation of the German Chancellor, that there should be some international body or forum to which Germany could appeal if the state of emergency declared by the Occupying Powers under the Agreement were continued beyond a period which seemed reasonable to the Germans. Although it seems most unlikely that such a situation would arise, it was concluded that the North Atlantic Council would be the appropriate body since it is the agency dealing with security matters in Europe. Mr. Acheson was most encouraging in his hope that all the agreements could be accepted in final form before the end of the year and he joined General Eisenhower in exhorting all concerned with the European defence community to speed it along to a successful conclusion by about that same time.

To this end he presented a draft American resolution which, together with a Benelux resolution, was turned over to the Deputies for consolidation. Mr. Stikker, who followed Mr. Acheson, introduced the second resolution which called for the participation in the European defence community of all free countries in Western Europe. In presenting this resolution Mr. Stikker said that these would comprise "in any case, Great Britain and our Scandinavian allies".

He spoke briefly, also, of the disagreement which exists concerning the financial consequences of a European defence community and his remarks revealed that the Netherlands were having second thoughts about the EDC.

When he presented this resolution, Mr. Stikker referred particularly to the delicacy of the problems it raised and wondered whether it would not be possible to have them discussed in a more restricted Council. This point is one which came up several times during the meeting and there is no doubt a considerable body of opinion which would favour limiting the attendance which has now grown to about three hundred and thus destroyed the intimate confidential character of the meetings of Ministers. The Council Deputies have been instructed to study this particular question and some action may be taken in this direction at the next meeting.[79]

TELEGRAM 543 Ottawa, December 29, 1951

SECRET. IMPORTANT.

Repeat London No. 2310.

1. Canada has been requested by SHAPE to enter into negotiations with the Government of France for the development of the airfield at Faulquemont for occupation by the Royal Canadian Air Force by September 1, 1952. A formal invitation† has been forwarded to Canada and to France through their respective National Military Representatives at SHAPE, requesting the two countries to commence negotiations and to advise SHAPE when such negotiations are to begin in order that a representative of that Headquarters may assist. (The text is in the hands of the Canadian Military Representative at SHAPE).

2. Although it had been intended originally that airfield and operating facilities up to the minimum agreed standards would be constructed by the host country through arrangements to be made by SHAPE (bilateral negotiations between countries being required only for personnel accommodation and facilities over and above the agreed minimum standards and for the eventual admission of Royal Canadian Air Force units to the field), SHAPE has now indicated that it will not be able to carry out the basic negotiations at this time (see section 1 of AC/4-R/27 for the original understanding and SHAPE/LOG/1-121/51; LOG 6100 for the position taken later by SHAPE).

3. Accordingly, you are requested to address a note immediately to the French Government along the lines indicated below.

Outline of Communication to the French Government

(1) In accordance with the invitation received from SHAPE, the Canadian Government is desirous of entering into negotiations with the French Government on the following matters relating to an airfield in France intended for occupancy by units of the Royal Canadian Air Force as part of the infrastructure programme covered by the agreement reached at the Seventh Session of the North Atlantic Council (document D-D(51)248)†

(a) Agreement by the French Government to receive representatives of the Canadian Government and to develop with them and with SHAPE mutually acceptable arrangements concerning the rate and technical details of construction on the airfield to be occupied by units of the Royal Canadian Air Force, in accordance with paragraph 6 of document D-D(51)290.†

(b) Confirmation that the site in the vicinity of Faulquemont recommended by SHAPE, as reported in SHAPE's telegram SHAPTO 168† (copy available with Canadian Military Representative to SHAPE), is suitable for the Royal Canadian Air Force and that the French Government is prepared to make it available within the NATO infrastructure programme.

(c) Provision of the airfield, operating facilities and basic utilities required at the approved site up to the agreed minimum standards established by SHAPE and the Standing Group on the financial terms specified in documents D-D(51)248 and D-D(51)290.

(d) Arrangements for the construction of any other operational facilities at this field required by the Royal Canadian Air Force over and above those approved by SHAPE and the Standing Group as minimum standards.

(e) Arrangements for the construction of personnel accommodation at this site in accordance with specifications acceptable to the Royal Canadian Air Force and to SHAPE.

(2) These negotiations are proposed by the Canadian Government in order to facilitate the early conclusion of a part of the infrastructure programme essential to the defence plans undertaken by the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. In view of this fact, the Canadian Government considers that, as far as these negotiations concern the provision of land and facilities up to the minimum standards required by SHAPE for operational purposes, the Canadian Government is acting for NATO in its dealings with the French Government.

(3) In view of the fact that the first units of the Royal Canadian Air Force are expected to be ready to occupy the selected site by September 1, 1952, it is the desire of the Canadian Government that these negotiations should commence as soon as possible.

(4) It is also the view of the Canadian Government that a representative of SHAPE might be associated with these negotiations when matters of concern to SHAPE are under discussion and that the French and Canadian Governments should extend an invitation to SHAPE to be represented on those occasions.

(5) To the extent that arrangements, supplementary to the Agreement between the Parties to the North Atlantic Treaty regarding the Status of their Forces, may be required eventually to govern the entry of Royal Canadian Air Force units into France and their occupancy of the approved airfield, it is suggested that any necessary negotiations on this subject might take place at a later stage. (End of outline of communication to the French Government).

Negotiating Background

4. As indicated in paragraph 3(2) above, the Government regards these negotiations as being undertaken in behalf of NATO, and considers that this point should be made clear in the terms of the agreement that will be necessary between Canada and France regarding the airfield.

5. With regard to point (1)(a), the principle of the admissibility of Canadian personnel for inspection of the site and for consultation with the French authorities regarding work on the airfield would appear to be established in paragraph 6 of D-D(51)290. It would seem desirable, however, to reach a rather more detailed understanding with the French Government concerning the role of Canadian personnel in examining the site initially, in laying down precise specifications for the construction of the field within the broad performance or operational standards specified by SHAPE and the Standing Group, and in establishing the specifications for any supplementary facilities and personnel accommodation required by the Royal Canadian Air Force. The preliminary negotiations should not prejudice the method of carrying out the construction, but should pave the way for detailed plans to be worked out by a team including representatives of the R.C.A.F. and of the Department of Defence Production. The airfield might be completed more quickly and at less cost if Canada, rather than France, makes the contractual arrangements direct with French contractors. Such an arrangement would facilitate under proper control the appropriate supply of Canadian materials and components such as prefabricated huts. It is desirable in the early negotiations with France not to preclude the development of such an arrangement but to leave the final settlement of this problem until the Canadian team have had an opportunity of surveying requirements and reporting to you.

6. No commitments should be made, at least at this time, to give France special concessions regarding the supply of raw materials from Canada. You may receive further instructions on this subject as the negotiations proceed.

7. Concerning point (1)(b), the present understanding is that the French and Canadian Governments should agree on the site, subject to SHAPE's approval which can probably be assumed in this case since this particular site has been recommended by SHAPE.

8. With reference to point (1)(c), the French Government is responsible for arranging to have the field and its related facilities brought up to the minimum standards. Payment of the Canadian share of the costs, as determined by the Ottawa agreement (D-D(51)248), will be made on the advice of the Committee which is to be established pursuant to document D-D(51)290, and in accordance with the terms of payment specified in that document.

9. With regard to points (1)(d) and (e), it will be open to the Canadian negotiators to urge that these costs should be shared. Particularly since the airfield in question is one which was already in existence, it would seem fair to suggest that these additional facilities are likely to have a significant residual value to the French authorities for either military or civilian purposes and that, accordingly, they should not be unwilling to meet some part of the cost. The Canadian Government is willing to agree that the French Government should own the fixed installations, including accommodation, beyond minimum standards, although it might ask France to make some payment if the latter takes over and uses these fixed installations. Canada should, however, have user rights for the period that the airfield is required for the purposes of the North Atlantic Treaty.

10. The question of the responsibility for ordinary maintenance of the airfield has not been included in the subjects for negotiation since this is a matter which has not yet been discussed in more than a preliminary manner in the various NATO bodies. On earlier occasions, the French representatives have suggested that, in return for retention of ownership of the commonly financed facilities, their Government would be prepared to meet the costs of the upkeep of at least those facilities (although possibly not of the facilities financed nationally by the government whose forces are occupying the field). Since then the position has become somewhat confused and it is not completely clear whether the French authorities would be prepared to accept this obligation without further payment. During the negotiations the situation may be further clarified as a result of discussion in the NATO Infrastructure Committee, in which event it would be appropriate for the Canadian negotiators to discuss the question with the French authorities. For the present at least the Canadian Government view is that it would expect France to provide maintenance. The question of what services should be regarded as maintenance for this purpose, and of whether France should be expected actually to provide the services or merely to pay for them, should be regarded as one for discussion at a technical level if the issue should arise.

11. The question of the possible exemption from taxation by host governments of the various expenditures (whether commonly or nationally financed) associated with infrastructure is a matter at present being examined in a more general context. Accordingly, it would seem undesirable to raise the question for discussion at present unless the French Government should so wish. As matters develop, it may be found appropriate to introduce this subject into the negotiations at a later stage. It is in order, however, to inform the French Government early in the negotiations of the general view of the Canadian Government that the arrangements regarding taxation which will apply to Canadian expenditures abroad arising out of the NATO programme should be in accord in each case with the most favourable arrangements granted by the host government to any other NATO government.

12. It is suggested that you should be primarily responsible for the conduct of the negotiations with the French Government on the subjects listed above. It is assumed that you will wish to delegate a member of your staff to participate continuously in the detailed negotiations.

13. It is intended, in agreement with Mr. Wilgress, that the interests of the Department of National Defence in these negotiations will be represented by Mr. Alex Ross as occasion may required. Mr. Wilgress will also make Mr. A.E. Ritchie available, as may be necessary, to advise on any features of the general NATO infrastructure discussions which may be relevant to these particular negotiations. On any legal questions, particularly those involving interpretations of the NATO Agreement on the Status of Armed Forces, Mr. E.A. Coté of Canada House will also be available for consultation.

14. On the military aspects of the negotiations, it is intended that the Chairman of the Canadian Joint Staff, London, who is as you know, the Canadian National Military Representative to SHAPE, will be the officer responsible for advising you and providing such assistance as you may require. He will make the necessary arrangements for the provision of Canadian technical staff, including expert representation from the Department of Defence Production, to work in Paris under your supervision. (The Department of Defence Production has engaged for this purpose Mr. Albert Deschamps, a well-known engineer and contractor of Montreal).

15. You may consider it desirable to have a meeting with all the Canadian advisers and experts mentioned above prior to the first meeting with the French representatives.

16. The Council Deputies are to be informed of the procedure Canada proposes to follow. Separate instructions are being sent to Mr. Wilgress on this point, and are being repeated to you. Please send Mr. Wilgress the exact text of the note to the French Government as soon as it has been delivered, and of course you will send me a copy and keep me fully informed of developments.

NEGOTIATIONS WITH FRENCH GOVERNMENT CONCERNING
R.C.A.F. AIRFIELD

As indicated in paragraphs 3 (2) and 4 of our message, the Government considers that in entering these negotiations it is acting on behalf of NATO. Accordingly it has decided that the Deputies should be informed of this view.

2. It would appear to us that there are three possible methods of bringing this matter to the attention of the Deputies. As a first preference, we suggest that it might be appropriate merely to circulate to the Deputies the text of the Note to be transmitted by General Vanier to the French Government. If this course is to be followed, it will be necessary for you to consult with General Vanier as to the time, to ensure that the Note has actually been received by the French Government before being circulated in the Deputies.

3. It may be, however, that either you or General Vanier will see objections to this course. If so, you are at liberty to use either of the following methods. You might prepare a short précis of the contents of the Note, clearly indicating the particular point to which we have referred, and circulate it to the Deputies. Alternatively, you might at an early meeting merely read such a précis.

4. You will be receiving from Paris the exact text of the Note when it has been sent, and also any comments which General Vanier may wish to make as to the most appropriate manner of bringing the matter to the attention of the Deputies. You may then use your own judgment as how best to proceed.

NEGOTIATIONS WITH FRENCH GOVERNMENT CONCERNING RCAF AIRFIELD

1. The following are our immediate comments on your messages:

(a) The Special Committee on Infrastructure is to have a comprehensive discussion with representatives of SHAPE and the Standing Group on January 3 on infrastructure problems including the "scope and timing of bilateral negotiations between potential occupying and 'host' countries". In these circumstances might it not be desirable to delay submitting our note to the French Government until the results of this meeting are known?

(b) The reference in paragraph 3(2) of telegram No. 2310 to the fact that the Canadian Government regards itself "as acting for NATO in its dealing with the French Government" might require some further explanation if it is not to be misunderstood, and possibly resented, by the French authorities, who might consider that they are also in a sense representing NATO in these negotiations. The general right of NATO forces to use these fields and other multilaterally financed facilities would seem to be established by the resolution reported in our telegram No. 3000 of December 18.† The user rights which we shall be seeking in our negotiations will presumably relate to the RCAF and will not apply to other NATO forces which might be assigned to the field at a later stage. The French may, therefore, find some difficulty in understanding precisely the sense in which we feel that we are representing NATO as a whole. It is true, of course, that we are likely to have to make a variety of arrangements which might reasonably have been considered to be the responsibility of SHAPE but that may not be regarded as entitling us to describe ourselves as representing NATO, particularly since the French authorities as well will be doing many things which SHAPE might reasonably have been expected to do in connection with the airfield. In view of the difficulty of defining the capacities, in relation to NATO, in which we and the French Government will be taking part in the negotiations, you might wish to consider whether the last sentence in paragraph 3(2) could be omitted since the rest of the note appears to give satisfactory matter-of-fact description of our functions, as we see them, in the negotiations. In order to re-emphasize the NATO character of the negotiations, particularly regarding user rights, it might be well to add the following words at the end of paragraph 3(1):

"and by the general resolution of the Council Deputies regarding the availability of infrastructure facilities to components of NAT forces (D-D51-289 Revised)"†

(c) It would seem desirable, as you suggest, that the other NATO countries should be informed of the basis on which the negotiations between ourselves and the French are to proceed, although it might be noted that the United States representatives have taken no steps to inform NATO on the negotiations which they are carrying out with the French and other European countries regarding similar infrastructure facilities. If the other NATO governments are to be informed of our negotiations it might be most satisfactory to use the special Infrastructure Committee rather than the Council Deputies for this purpose. We assume that it would also be desirable for us to consult with the French representatives here regarding any document which we might propose to circulate.

(d) In view of the confusion which has arisen in the past concerning the locations suggested by SHAPE for the various airfields, it might be well to use in our note the full description given by SHAPE. As indicated in our despatch No. 5160,† the correct description of the location of the airfield for the RCAF is "Grostenquin/Faulquemont".

NEGOTIATIONS WITH FRENCH GOVERNMENT FOR R.C.A.F. AIRFIELD

1. Our telegrams Nos. 2310 and 2319 of December 29 were based on a decision reached by Cabinet Defence Committee. In the Government's view it is important that Canada should not appear through these negotiations to be undertaking in its own right and as an individual North American nation a programme of construction of airfields and, in more general terms, of the development of military installations in Europe, which might indicate an intention on the part of Canada to maintain forces in Europe indefinitely. The reference in paragraph 3 (2) of telegram 2310 to the effect that the Government regards itself "as acting for NATO in its dealings with the French Government" is an expression of this position. It is not, however, intended that this phrase should be taken to carry any very specific legal significance.

2. We should, of course, have no objection if the French authorities wished to go on record as stating their view that France is also representing NATO in these negotiations.

3. With regard to informing the Deputies, we are prepared to accept your view that the infrastructure committee might be the appropriate body. The main consideration is that other governments should be informed in general about the steps being taken. We approve your suggestion that you consult with the French representatives in London regarding the transmission of this information, and we hope that you may be able to explain to them the reasons for which we are taking this action.

4. We approve your suggestions that (a) the airfield should be described as "Grostenquin-Faulquemont", and (b) there should be added at the end of para. 3 (1) of the Note to the French Government the following words "and by the general resolution of the Council Deputies regarding the availability of infrastructure facilities to components of NAT forces (D-D(51)289—Revised)."

5. With regard to your inquiry whether presentation of the Note might not be delayed until after discussions in the Infrastructure Committee on January 3, we would have no objection, provided that the discussions referred to are completed reasonably promptly. We should not like the negotiations with the French Government to be unduly delayed since it will be necessary to complete negotiations at a reasonably early date if the airfield is to be constructed in time for occupation next autumn. It may be, of course, that General Vanier has already presented the Note, and if so, I should think that no great harm will have been done. Please consult him directly about the timing of presentation of the Note and inform us accordingly.

MEETING OF COMMONWEALTH PRIME MINISTERS
LONDON, JANUARY 1951[1]

AGENDA

Mr. Attlee suggested that, in the announcement about the meeting, it be said that the Prime Ministers would "discuss questions of common concern including particularly all aspects of the present international situation". At the Prime Minister's suggestion, the words "particularly all" were omitted since it would clearly not be possible at a ten-day meeting to discuss all aspects of the present international situation. The Prime Minister has not yet, however, made any more specific comments on the agenda and you might wish to discuss with him the desirability of his sending some message to London on the subject.

2. Mr. Attlee's "tentative suggestions" for an agenda which he put forward in his communication of October 20 are:

1. International Situation

(a) Russia and Communist threat to peace.

(b) United Nations measures to preserve peace.

(c) Europe.

(i) Western European and North Atlantic Treaty Organisation developments.

(ii) Germany.

(v) South East Asia (Indo-China, Indonesia).

2. Defence

(a) Implications of United Nations Organisation obligations.

(b) Role of Commonwealth countries in resisting aggression.

Projet d'une communication du premier ministre au premier ministre du Royaume-Uni[2]

Draft Communication from Prime Minister to Prime Minister of United Kingdom[2]

TOP SECRET [Ottawa], November 21, 1950

AGENDA

I have already indicated to you, through Sir Alexander Clutterbuck, that in my opinion it would not be possible at the meeting of Commonwealth Prime Ministers to discuss all aspects of the present international situation and that it will be necessary to select certain aspects of the international situation for discussion.

2. In order to make a wise selection of the aspects that might most usefully be discussed, it seems to me that we should first clarify our minds on the main purpose which meetings of Commonwealth Prime Ministers can serve at the present time.

3. The Commonwealth is today a most useful bridge between Western democratic states and Asian democratic states. There exist dangerous misunderstandings today in Asian democratic states about the policies and purposes of the Western democracies. Undoubtedly we in the Western democratic states likewise misunderstand certain aspects of the policies and purposes of the Asian democratic states.

[2] Cette ébauche a été parafée par L.B. Pearson.
This draft was initialled by L.B. Pearson.

4. It would seem to me, therefore, that meetings of Commonwealth Prime Ministers would be apt to be most useful if the discussions at those meetings were to concentrate on an effort to remove such misunderstandings and if the agendas were framed with this objective in mind. The result would be that the meetings would provide us in the West with an opportunity to explain to our Asian colleagues those aspects of our policies which we have reason to believe they do not entirely understand. Similarly the Prime Ministers of the Asian members of the Commonwealth would have an opportunity to explain their respective policies to us in an effort to remove any misunderstandings which we in the West may have of them.

5. The agenda might, for example, include an exchange of views on such items as:

(1) Developments in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization and proposals for closer union of the North Atlantic Community.

(2) Developments in the Council of Europe and proposals for closer union of Western Europe.

(3) The United Action for Peace Resolution of the General Assembly and the future work of the Assembly's Collective Measures Committee.

(4) Policy towards Communist China (including questions of Korea and Formosa).

(5) Policy towards Germany.

6. From our point of view, these might cover the main questions in which the Asian members of the Commonwealth may not fully understand our motives and actions. The Asian members could, no doubt, draw up a similar list covering subjects on which they think we may not fully understand their motives and actions.

7. An incidental advantage of this approach to the agenda for the Prime Ministers' meeting would be that it would help to make clear that the purpose of the meeting is to create a better understanding by each nation of the Commonwealth of the policies of the other nations and that the purpose is not the unrealistic one of attempting to reach a common policy or to interfere with the right and duty of each member of the Commonwealth to take such action, either nationally or as a member of a regional group or of a collective security group, which it considers serves its own interests and the interests of the free world. Unless this principle is clearly established there is danger that the Commonwealth link might in time constitute an impediment to positive and fruitful international initiatives by the various member states.

8. I would hope that this principle of Commonwealth consultation would become apparent at the forthcoming meeting of Prime Ministers in a discussion, for example, of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization and of the proposals which are being made for closer union of the North Atlantic Community. The purpose, certainly, or any exposition which I might make of Canadian policy in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization would be to try to remove any doubts that may exist in the minds of the Asian Prime Ministers of our complete sincerity when we say that our objective is to preserve peace by deterring the aggressor and that our objective is not to wage war. I would also hope that the very nature of the discussion would make it clear that, while we confidently hope that our motives and our policies are not being misunderstood, we are under an obligation to pursue these policies even though all members of the Commonwealth may not feel able to give them complete support.

9. Similarly, the United Kingdom might wish to take advantage of the opportunity to explain its policy in respect of the Council of Europe and of the proposals which are being made for closer union of Western European countries.

10. I put these suggestions before you now because of my desire that the Commonwealth Prime Ministers should reach agreement as soon as possible on the agenda for their meeting. The sooner agreement is reached and the more specific the agenda, the easier it will be for the various governments to prepare for the discussions.

11. Since India is not now, I assume, interested in the question of the King's title, I do not suggest that this question be put on the agenda. I trust, however, that the meeting of the Prime Ministers in London will provide an opportunity to discuss this question since we desire to have an appropriate title for the King in respect of Canada adopted as soon as possible.[3]

PRIME MINISTERS MEETINGS; COMMONWEALTH SUPPLY BODY

The United Kingdom High Commissioner called on me Christmas Eve with a message from his Prime Minister concerning the forthcoming meetings in London. It concerned a proposal which Mr. Attlee is contemplating to set up some kind of a Commonwealth body to consult on questions of supply of mutual interest.

2. The proposal at this stage seems pretty vague. Clutterbuck said that a paper was being produced and would be available in London; as yet, however, there was nothing in writing available to him.

3. Clutterbuck described the proposed body as one which would provide a forum for discussion of problems of supply. In particular he mentioned raw materials, oil, and shipping. The body would, of course, have no powers, nor apparently is any permanent staff or secretariat contemplated. Clutterbuck said that it was undecided yet whether to propose that it should be at the ministerial level or not; if the former, meetings would be held from time to time but normally officials would represent their Ministers.

4. The High Commissioner said that Mr. Attlee bespoke Mr. St. Laurent's support for the proposal on the ground that Canada and the United Kingdom were "in on" all major discussions and planning. Other members of the Commonwealth (I gather the United Kingdom have in mind Australia) feel "left out", that, not being members of NATO nor involved in OEEC they cannot have the knowledge of plans which would enable them to make their own dispositions most efficiently. At the same time these Commonwealth countries allege that, in the event of war, they will be drawn in immediately. Consequently, they should have a chance to participate in some way in the basic preparations.

5. I gave Clutterbuck no reason to think that the Canadian Government would support any such proposal. I reminded him of our traditional policy in relation to central Commonwealth organs. It seemed to me that the substance of what these other Commonwealth Governments wanted could be better achieved by closer liaison between them and the "better informed" Commonwealth countries. If, on the other hand, they were more interested in the shadow, I supposed that the proposed body might have some appeal. In any event, I promised to pass on to you the U.K. Government's suggestion so as to let Clutterbuck have a reply, if possible, before the Prime Minister leaves for London at the end of this week.

6. I am sending a copy of this memorandum to Mr. St. Laurent. No doubt you will wish to discuss the matter with him so that I may be instructed what reply to give.[4]

PRIME MINISTERS' CONFERENCE

I saw Prime Minister Liaquat at seven this evening. The substance of his conversation was as follows:

(a) On October 27th the Security Council was to consider Kashmir. Pakistan's case was that, as negotiations and mediation had failed and arbitration was refused by India, Security Council should lay down principles for implementation of agreed regulations. Either the United States or the United Kingdom or both were unwilling to support a (resolution?) of that kind.

(b) There was delay and eventually a new resolution was drafted providing for appointment of a distinguished jurist to review the position. Pakistan, though not, repeat not, pleased with this resolution, was willing to accept it.

(c) Zafrulla tried to have Kashmir placed on the Security Council agenda in December. He was informed that the United States and United Kingdom thought it was an inappropriate time. Late January was suggested.

(d) Liaquat was distressed by this decision and informed Grafftey-Smith that he could not, repeat not, go to London unless either the Security Council first discussed Kashmir or Kashmir was placed on the agenda of the Prime Ministers' Conference. Mr. Attlee replied that he was not, repeat not, able to put Kashmir on the agenda but would discuss the question with Liaquat and Nehru. These informal discussions have taken place before and were of no value.

(e) Liaquat therefore replied to Attlee that he considered it would be useless for him to go this week. Just before I saw Liaquat, Grafftey-Smith had given him Attlee's latest message to the effect that Attlee's view was that it is too late to put Kashmir on the agenda as the Prime Ministers were now leaving for London.

2. I then asked Liaquat if these remarks meant he was definitely not going to London. His reply was "I am not, repeat not, going as yet".

3. Liaquat stressed that he could make no contribution to the Conference with Kashmir not solved, as well as his political difficulties here. He ended the interview by saying that he would be very interested in having Mr. St. Laurent's views.

SECRET. IMPORTANT.

Your telegram No. 2549 of December 29.† Meeting of Commonwealth Prime Ministers.

2. Following from the Under-Secretary, Begins: The Prime Minister will not have an opportunity before leaving Ottawa to consider carefully the various suggestions made by United Kingdom officials for conduct of the Prime Ministers' meetings. However, Mr. Pearson has had a word with Mr. St. Laurent this morning and you can speak to Liesching and perhaps Brook, along the lines indicated below.

3. We agree it is desirable to restrict rigidly the number of those attending the sessions, (though we are hardly impressed by the proposed application to themselves of the United Kingdom's "self-denying ordinance.") We suggest that at all sessions there be up to two places at the table for each delegation and up to two seats behind for the principal advisers, (some delegations may not need four seats.) The seats for each delegation would be allocated by each Prime Minister. (We shall need two seats at the table since it is hoped that Mr. Pearson will be able to attend from about January 8 on, if the situation is such that he can leave New York.) The two United Kingdom representatives who would sit at the table would, of course, be in addition to Mr. Attlee who would have a seat as Chairman of the meeting and to Brook who would have a seat as Secretary General. It would not seem necessary for the précis writers to have seats at the table.

4. A related question is the order of seating at the conference table. There would seem to us to be no reason why the order of seating should not be in the alphabetical order of the names of countries represented.

5. At the Colombo meeting a break was made with the old order of speaking under which, on each item of the agenda, the representatives spoke in the old order of precedence of their country. Instead, at Colombo, the order of speaking varied according to the item on the agenda. We would hope that this useful innovation made at Colombo will be given effect to at the London meeting. On some of the items it might be desirable, for example, that Mr. Nehru should speak first.

6. Since Pakistan has asked to have Kashmir discussed at the Conference and Pakistan is a party at interest in the dispute, we feel that their request can hardly be denied. Kashmir has been discussed by Commonwealth countries in public at many meetings of the United Nations. It would therefore be difficult to persuade Pakistan why it should not be discussed in private at a Commonwealth meeting. You may know that Mr. Liaquat Ali has said that he will not attend if Kashmir is not included.

7. We are surprised by the suggestion that a discussion of the Middle East and the defence of Africa would necessarily give rise to a delicate situation for India and Pakistan because their Prime Ministers are committed not to enter into arrangements for defence pacts. Surely the understanding on which all Commonwealth discussions take place is that they do not involve commitments.

8. We do not understand the reference in your paragraph 6 to the "higher direction of the war": does Liesching mean the third world war or the present lukewarm war?

9. Perhaps some of Liesching's worries about the discussions on defence arise out of an assumption that it will be necessary for the Conference to agree on the usual communiqué. The drafting of these communiqués has in the past caused much more trouble than the resulting document was worth. It might be worth exploring whether on this occasion there might be no final communiqué, and in its place there be substituted a final public meeting of the Conference at which each Prime Minister would have an opportunity to make a public statement on what he considered to be the accomplishments of the Conference.

10. Clutterbuck has told us that the United Kingdom are contemplating a proposal to set up some kind of Commonwealth body on defence supply; Mr. Attlee has requested Mr. St. Laurent's support on this which is evidently designed to placate Australia. We have told Clutterbuck that the United Kingdom cannot expect our support for such a proposal. Ends.

Your telegram No. 98 of December 30th. Prime Ministers' Conference.

1. I saw Liaquat at noon today and gave him the substance of Mr. St. Laurent's message. Liaquat asked me to thank St. Laurent, for his helpful message. He said he now has assurances that St. Laurent, Attlee and Menzies are willing to participate in the Kashmir discussions. He is to see Holland tonight.

2. If Holland is also agreeable to Kashmir discussions, would Liaquat then, I asked, decide to go to London. He replied that a Cabinet meeting will be held tomorrow morning when a final decision will be taken. He has provisionally booked passage on January 2nd.

3. Liaquat gave me the impression that he will decide to attend the Conference unless Nehru refuses to participate in Kashmir discussion.

4. I asked Liaquat if St. Laurent's message was as helpful as he expected. First he said yes and then qualified his approval somewhat by saying that the interest of St.

Laurent and the other Prime Ministers in this problem seemed more passive than active. He thinks the Commonwealth Prime Ministers should take the initiative in discussing Kashmir because it is an urgent problem. He has the impression that they are only discussing it because of pressure from Pakistan. He then repeated what he has often said before namely that as long as Kashmir issue is unsolved Pakistan cannot make effective plans for containing Communists and cannot give help if war begins.

5. The newspapers carry reports this morning that Liaquat has postponed his trip to London pending some assurance that Kashmir issue will be discussed.

2. This morning Latif, Acting High Commissioner for Pakistan, called on me to express the serious concern of his government and to emphasize his Prime Minister's determination that the Kashmir issue should be faced in London around a table. The Pakistanis feel that in present circumstances Commonwealth countries all have an almost equal interest in the solution of this problem which cripples the capacity of two members of the Commonwealth to assist in stemming the Communist tide.

3. Latif was concerned at a statement attributed to Mr. St. Laurent in Canadian Press story from London this morning to the effect that "there should never be any attempt to force one particular item on the agenda".[6] I said that I felt sure that anything Mr. St. Laurent had said was not intended to preclude effective discussion of the Kashmir problem in London. Indeed, Mr. St. Laurent had expressed his willingness to participate.

4. I have spoken to Mr. Pearson on the telephone this afternoon. He hopes that it will be possible for the Prime Ministers to discuss Kashmir in such a way as to meet Mr. Liaquat Ali Khan's minimum requirements.

At opening session of Commonwealth Prime Ministers Meeting this morning. Mr. Attlee read a telegram from Liaquat Ali Khan informing him that he was not prepared to come to the meeting since, under present conditions, he could not make any useful contribution. Mr. Attlee said that this was extremely regrettable and that it was a great loss to the meeting.

Later on, Mr. Menzies referred to Mr. Liaquat's absence as a calamity and hoped that some way could be found whereby the meeting could convince the Prime Minister of Pakistan to come. He then suggested that the meeting send a message saying that informal discussions on Kashmir would be held by those countries wishing to participate. On the basis of this suggestion, Gordon Walker prepared draft which was read to the meeting and which was accepted with alterations suggested by Mr. Nehru and Mr. Menzies.

The text† will be sent to you later on. The contents of it are that the meeting regrets the absence of the Prime Minister of Pakistan, endorses the idea that informal discussions be held about Kashmir and that several Prime Ministers, including the Prime Minister of India, have indicated their willingness to take part in such informal discussions.

During the discussion, Mr. St. Laurent pointed out that he was sure all Commonwealth representatives were desirous to do something which would be helpful but, at the same time, that they should avoid giving the impression that any one of them was attempting to exercise some influence in internal problems of one or more of the countries represented at the meeting. He suggested that no impression should be given that a "super-state examination" of the problem of Kashmir would be made by the meeting.

Opening session of Commonwealth Prime Ministers meeting was held this morning.

After having disposed of item referred to in my telegram No. 17, Mr. Attlee referred to the gravity of the world situation and expressed the hope that this meeting would contribute towards the settlement of some of the problems with which the world was faced.

He emphasized the gravity of the situation in the Far East, and in order of probabilities, saw eventual complications arising in Indo-China, Burma, Malaya and Indonesia, which, if they materialized, would engulf the whole area.

He referred at length to his conversations with President Truman in Washington and did not attempt to minimize the differences between United Kingdom and United States policies, particularly as regards to China. He warned his colleagues that there was a danger of being drawn in an all-out war with China and that "this would be disastrous, since it would give a free hand to Russia in Europe". He added that he did not believe in a limited war and that a limited war soon became unlimited. His suggestions were that, at one point, in order to avoid war, one has to negotiate.

In concluding his general remarks, Mr. Attlee said that this conference of Commonwealth Prime Ministers did not supersede the United Nations; it could be but beneficial to it because of the influence and experience of those members gathered in London to discuss world problems.

Mr. Attlee was succeeded by Mr. Nehru, whose opening remarks were to the effect that the Far East was now the real danger from which war could spread. He laid great emphasis on the fact that "Chinese reality" should be recognized by all. China was a great power and those who ignored that reality would suffer in the end. He emphasized the complete change in the balance of power which the resurgence of China as a united State had created. He warned his colleagues that he did not see how this new China could ever be defeated in a war. He added that, as far as he was concerned, the extent of Communist Russia's influence in China except in a philosophical sense made little difference and that China, whether Communist or not, should still be considered a great power.

His conclusion was that China was not and could never become a satellite. To illustrate the influence that his own country had with the Chinese regime at this present time, he read the text of a telegram, he had received from the Indian Ambassador in Peking to whom the Foreign Minister of China had expressed the hope that Mr. Nehru's "deliberations in London will ensure peace in Asia".

Mr. Nehru then made a rather unveiled attack on United States policy in the Far East. He said that his country and all other Far Eastern countries wished to cooperate with the United States but that they realized that the methods the United States were adopting were completely wrong and that this placed the whole of Asia in a most difficult dilemma.

He then turned to the United Nations and said that many of the United Nations' approaches to world problems recently have been more of a warlike than a peace-like nature. More specifically he said that "the moment you named China an aggressor, this would lead you very close to a general war".

Prime Minister Nehru concluded his remarks with his usual theme that, although it might be necessary further to re-arm, the democratic countries should not be led into a position whereby, because of heavy expenditures in armaments, little, if any, social progress could be made. In his view this would defeat the very end for which the democracy would be fighting. He gave as an example the fact that the military expenditures in his own country were being cut by 15 per cent. Although he did not elaborate on this particular point, the whole tenor of his remarks was based on this conception.

Mr. St-Laurent speaking immediately after Mr. Nehru, established a distinction between the two different aspects of what, at times, is considered as the same problem: Communistic expansion and legitimate Nationalist developments in the Far East. He underlined the fact that we should not be looking at those two aspects as if they were one. He pointed out that we all wanted to conserve the best possible relations between East and West based on mutual respect and, as far as the West was concerned, devoid of any military, economic or political imperialism.

Mr. St-Laurent agreed with Mr. Nehru that the emergence of the new China had created an important change in the balance of power in the East and that great importance should be attached to this new development. Within the context, he would welcome the views of Asian members of the Commonwealth.

Indirectly answering Mr. Nehru's attack on the United States, Mr. St-Laurent said that in Canada it was felt that there were new hopes for the United Nations following the decision taken on Korea, that new developments had arisen since which deserved careful consideration and that very careful consideration indeed should be given to the next move to be taken by the United Kingdom. He emphasized the fact that there was aggression in Korea, whether one wished to ignore it or not, and that while he hoped that there would not be an early necessity to brand China as an aggressor, he was sure all his colleagues would realize that it would not be possible ever to brand the United Nations forces in Korea as aggressors. He expressed the wish that negotiations might be possible with those responsible for the war in Korea and that the Commonwealth could give some assistance to the United Nations in this respect.

The last speaker at this morning's meeting was the new Prime Minister of New Zealand, Mr. Holland, whose inexperience at such gatherings was patent from the beginning. After the series of usual references to the "British family" and other remarks in the same vein, Mr. Holland gave the concrete suggestion that the meeting of Prime Ministers should delegate some of its members to the United States on a goodwill tour. He said that, were the meeting to accept his suggestion, he would gladly volunteer to go to the United States himself. Mr. Holland's views leading to this suggestion were a not-too-happy defence of the United States foreign policy. He pointed out that the great danger was that division might come between the "British family of nations" and the United States.

He was the last speaker on the list and it is hoped that he will be the last speaker on his proposal.

2. First question: "Are you still anxious to go to the conference?". He replied, "Yes, I am keen to go".

3. Second question: "What kind of a message from Mr. Attlee would enable you to go?". Following is text of message sent by the Prime Minister to Mr. Johnson in Karachi. Text begins: Your message was communicated to Prime Ministers' meeting this morning. No reply has yet been received from Mr. Liaquat Ali Khan to message which Mr. Attlee sent him yesterday after a full discussion with other Prime Ministers here.

2. It seems to us here that this message fully met Mr. Liaquat Ali Khan's conditions for coming. Mr. Nehru has expressed his readiness to discuss the Kashmir problem informally with Mr. Liaquat Ali Khan and with other Commonwealth Prime Ministers. Mr. Attlee, Mr. Menzies, Mr. Holland and I have all intimated our willingness to take part in such a discussion. Mr. Senanayake said he would be ready to take part if both parties wished him to do so. Mr. Donges of South Africa has not refused to take part provided both parties agreed but has indicated, quite sensibly, that he doubted whether in all the circumstances the presence of a representative of South Africa was likely to improve the chances of agreement being reached between India and Pakistan.

3. No further message will be sent by Mr. Attlee as chairman pending receipt of a reply from Mr. Liaquat Ali Khan but it was felt that if other Commonwealth representatives in Karachi were put in possession of foregoing appreciation of the position as it looks from London they might help to clear up any possible misunderstanding which may be delaying Liaquat's reply.

4. I have no objection to your letting Mr. Liaquat Ali Khan know the substance of this message. Text ends.

1. Before the discussion began at the Prime Ministers meeting, yesterday morning there was a brief review of the question of the attendance of the Prime Minister of Pakistan and some suggestion that a further message might be sent indicating precisely which Prime Ministers would attend any informal discussions about Kashmir. Mr. St. Laurent read a telegram from our High Commissioner indicating that information as to which Prime Ministers would attend would probably decide the issue. It was felt that no further message should go from the meeting but that individual Prime Ministers might send clarifications through their High Commissioners. Mr. St. Laurent accordingly sent a message to Mr. Johnson.[7]

My telegram No. 48.

Yesterday afternoon's meeting was also taken with matters relating to China, i.e. possible settlement in Korea, Formosa and representation of China at United Nations.

The general tenor of discussions was that no precipitate action should be taken in Security Council at this time.

Mr. Menzies suggested that an approach be made to United States Government on behalf of meeting of Commonwealth Prime Ministers to effect that any decision be postponed for the time being so as to give the meeting in London time for further consideration.

M. Liaquat a accepté d'assister à la réunion des premiers ministres le 6 janvier.
Liaquat agreed to attend the Prime Ministers' meeting on January 6.

Mr. St-Laurent agreed that delay was advisable but did not favour idea of joint message to President of United States. He thought it important to avoid any action which might suggest a division of opinion between Commonwealth and United States. Moreover he thought it would be inexpedient to suggest that United Nations action should be held up pending consideration by a meeting of Commonwealth Prime Ministers. He reminded meeting that a Committee of Three was at present formulating a series of principles relating to Korea which were to be put before Security Council as a basis for discussion. He thought it might be advantageous if each of the Commonwealth countries made known, through their own representatives in New York and in Washington, the anxieties which they felt on the possible results of any precipitated action. Mr. Bevin supported this suggestion and recommended that each Commonwealth country invite its representatives in Washington and New York to seek means of postponing the discussion in Security Council.

Representative of South Africa took a similar line to that of Mr. St-Laurent and agreed that each country should separately press for additional time for consideration.

The meeting was about to adjourn rather inconclusively when the "principles" of the Cease-Fire Committee arrived and revived the issue.[8]

The general view of the meeting was that it would be unwise to be committed to those principles without further reflection and comparison between them and the proposals put forward by Mr. Bevin. It was then agreed to instruct Commonwealth representatives in Washington and New York to seek to delay further discussion on Korea by the Security Council for at least a week. I am sending you in my immediately following telegram the proposals put forward by the Foreign Secretary. It should be pointed out that these proposals have not been fully discussed by the meeting nor have they been approved. Concurrently with the "principles" of the Cease-Fire Committee, they are to be studied further at the next meeting on Monday afternoon.

The question of recognition of China was also discussed at great length during the meeting.

Mr. Menzies, on behalf of Australia, said that he was in "a yielding mood".

Dr. Donges said that South Africa could not at the moment agree to the recognition of the Chinese Peoples Government or their representation in the United Nations.

Mr. St-Laurent suggested that apart from any question of rights, it might well be expedient to admit the Chinese Peoples Government to the United Nations if this meant that they would accept the obligations of the Charter to help to preserve world peace.

Mr. Nehru supported this point of view and added that the sooner the admittance was made, and the more gracefully, the better would be the results.

The discussion on Formosa was inconclusive. A further discussion is to be held Monday.

My immediately preceding telegram No. 49.
Following is text of United Kingdom memorandum on Korea and the Far East which was circulated to Commonwealth Prime Ministers, Begins: Memorandum by the United Kingdom Government.

1. Outline of general policy:

(1) Reaffirmation of intention to abide by the principles of the Charter.

(2) Intention to support United Nations action in Korea in resistance to aggression.

(3) Desire to prevent an extension of the conflict outside Korea.

(4) A declaration that Commonwealth Governments are ready to support efforts to bring about a free, unified and independent Korea by means of negotiation.

(5) An outline of a possible basis for negotiation.

2. Amplification of point 1 (5): Possible basis for negotiation:

I. Korea

(a) A cease-fire and agreement to invite China to become a member of the existing United Nations Commission, or, as an alternative, an agreement to set up a new Commission with Chinese representation.

(b) A safety belt between the two armies supervised by military observers appointed by the United Nations Commission.

(c) Simultaneous phased withdrawal of all non-Korean forces (i.e. Chinese on the one side and United Nations forces on the other), thus enlarging the safety belt.

(d) The United Nations Commission to assume responsibility for the interim civil administration of the zone, which would gradually extend to the whole of Korea.

(e) Establishment of an interim Korean civil administration under the Commission and of a Korean police force under police officers appointed by the Commission.

(f) The disarming of North and South Korean forces by the Chinese and United Nations forces as they withdraw and the formation of all-Korean police reserve armed with light weapons to which small contingents of troops would be temporarily attached from other countries although without any large contingent from any one country. This force would be responsible to the United Nations Commission.

(g) Elections supervised by the Commission to establish a unified Government of Korea to whom all powers would be transferred, followed by the withdrawal of non-Korean advisers and contingents.

II. United Nations

Representation of the Chinese Central People's Government in the United Nations.

III. Formosa

Acceptance of the Cairo declaration in principle and agreement to support a United Nations resolution setting up a United Nations Commission to study the problem of Formosa and to make recommendations for a final solution.

3. The United Kingdom Government proposes that, if the Prime Ministers think these suggestions provide a possible basis of settlement, the United Kingdom Foreign Secretary should consult the United States Government over the week-end. In doing so, he would make the following points:

(i) He would make it clear that these were ideas which had been discussed at the meeting, but that they were not necessarily to be taken as representing the considered views and policies of the Governments concerned.

(ii) It was generally felt, however, that new proposals were unlikely to be given serious consideration by the Chinese unless it were known that the United States Government had expressed its general sympathy and concurrence. For this reason, he wished to ascertain the views of the United States Government before discussing this approach further with the Prime Ministers of other Commonwealth countries. Ends.

SECRET. MOST IMMEDIATE.

As indicated in my telegram No. 49, it was agreed at the meeting of Prime Ministers yesterday afternoon that Commonwealth representatives in Washington and New York should be instructed to seek to delay further discussion on Korea by the Security Council for at least a week. This decision was arrived at before the receipt of your telegram No. 45 of January 5th forwarding text of telegram No. 17 from Canadian Permanent Delegate to United Nations.[9]

The text which was agreed upon at the Prime Ministers meeting has already been communicated by the Foreign Office to the United Kingdom delegation in New York and is being repeated to you in my immediately following telegram.†

Since the Prime Minister, together with his colleagues, has agreed that an approach be made to obtain a delay of at least one week in the Security Council, it would not be possible for the Canadian Ambassador in Washington not to take similar action to that being taken by his Commonwealth colleagues. The Canadian Ambassador in Washington should therefore be instructed to approach the State Department and discuss with them advisability of obtaining delay about discussion in Security Council on line of text of my immediately following telegram. Prime Minister suggests that text also be sent to Mr. Pearson or that he be asked to obtain copy of it from United Kingdom delegation at Security Council.

The arguments put forward by Canadian Permanent Delegate in his telegram to you, No. 17, about necessity of immediate action are impressive. From this end, however, any precipitate action would lead to a most serious situation, since there is general agreement that further delay should be given to study the matter here. Both Messrs. Bevin and Menzies hope that at least they will be given until Monday afternoon, January 8th, to study the implications of the documents now submitted for their consideration. You will realize, after having compared the text of the United Kingdom's memorandum sent in my telegram No. 50 and the "principles" of the Cease-Fire Committee, that the divergence in approaches is too great for immediate and easy solution.

Mr. St-Laurent therefore suggests that, unless there are extremely compelling reasons Mr. Pearson be asked to do his utmost to withhold publication of the Cease-Fire Committee "principles". We feel confident that Mr. Nehru will be sending similar, if not stronger instructions, to Sir Benegal Rau. If, however, a situation were reached whereby the United States delegation were forced to withdraw its agreement to support any intermediate stage because of any further delay and would urge that a resolution condemning Communist China as aggressors be taken up immediately, Mr. Pearson, in such circumstances, might not wish to press the point. It should be pointed out, however, that, were this to be the case and were such action taken before the end of the Prime Ministers meetings, whatever good might have come out of these meetings by way of closer cooperation between India and the West would have received a very serious blow.

With particular reference to paragraph 3 of your telegram No. 45, we still very much hope that the United States will not proceed on a resolution condemning the Communist Chinese as aggressors until there has been consultation about the steps which would have to be taken following such a resolution.

It seems to us that nothing should be done which would make it appear that the United States were taking a stand which could not be supported by a large majority and, on the other hand, the United States will not expect support by a large majority unless those who support it know what they will be expected to do as a consequence of having supported a condemnatory resolution and unless they feel they can do what is expected of them following the adoption of such resolution.

The Prime Ministers meeting this afternoon at which Mr. Liaquat Ali Khan was present for the first time continued with a discussion of the Far East.

2. Field Marshal Slim gave a very gloomy appreciation of the military situation in Korea indicating that there was evidence of a lack of will to hold the line and suggesting that evacuation might be expected within two or three months. He said this, of course, was not the American appreciation but that he thought it would be unrealistic to make plans on any other basis.

3. The Foreign Secretary indicated that attempts to postpone action to declare China an aggressor had been badly received in the United States and that Jebb had been advised not to continue to canvass for support.

4. Mr. Bevin indicated further that the United Kingdom proposals of last week should not be further considered and that there seemed nothing left to consider but the principles of the Cease Fire Committee.

5. Mr. Nehru indicated that he had reason to believe that the cease fire principles would not be acceptable in Peking.

6. Everyone was agreed that it would be disastrous to have the United States proposal proceeded with but there was general agreement that every possible effort should be made to avoid bringing Commonwealth countries into opposition to the United States.

7. Mr. St. Laurent urged that the cease fire principles or some modification of them should be brought forward at once to provide an opportunity for representations behind the scene in Washington in the direction of moderation.

8. There seemed to be rather general agreement that Clause 5 of the principles or some modification if it, if the United States would agree, might form the basis of a new approach though no conclusion was reached on this point.

9. Mr. Nehru made it clear that he did not think a cease fire would be accepted in Peking until there was agreement to negotiate on all other subjects. He was however also inclined to think there might be something in the approach on the basis of Clause 5.

10. The discussion was adjourned until tomorrow morning and it was agreed meanwhile that the Foreign Office communicate the general sense of the discussions to Washington as confidentially as possible.

11. Mr. St. Laurent warned of the danger of giving any publicity whatever to the pessimistic military appreciation.

A meeting at which the Asian members of the Commonwealth were not represented was held at Downing Street on Monday morning to consider the higher military direction in the event of war.

The only interesting point which emerged was that the United Kingdom Government apparently considered the possibility of excluding France from the higher strategic direction and confining it to the United Kingdom and the United States. The Prime Minister had to leave before this point was dealt with because of his luncheon with Mr. Nehru but he authorized Mr. Norman Robertson to indicate that we felt it undesirable as well as unrealistic to attempt to exclude any of the three Powers now on the NATO Standing Group and that so long as there was proper liaison, we also felt that it would be undesirable to expand the Standing Group and that it should become the organ of higher strategic direction if that was necessary.

There was also some complaint by the British Chiefs and Commonwealth Liaison Officers not being able to speak freely on so-called military matters. Needless to say, Mr. Robertson completely reserved the Canadian position on this point.

This telegram does not attempt to give a summary of the meeting itself, which will be available from the minutes.†

No report has been sent to you on the meeting of Saturday morning, January 6th, which considered the problems of the Middle East and the defence of Africa, since the minutes† of the meeting will be reaching you very shortly.

It seemed to us that the main purpose of this meeting, from the United Kingdom point of view, was to try and convince Australia, New Zealand and South Africa of the necessity of making further and more immediate contributions to the defence of the Middle East. Two fairly important suggestions were made by Mr. Shinwell in this respect;

(a) The three Commonwealth countries mentioned above might wish to consider the advisability of sending, as early as possible, token forces in the Middle East in peacetime. He thought there would be great moral and psychological advantage to this;

(b) The Defence Ministers and Chiefs of Staff of Commonwealth countries might meet in a month or two to have further discussions on the military aspects of the defence of the East. Mr. Shinwell hoped that Canada would send an observer because of the important contributions which she could make by reason of her industrial potential. You may wish to pass this information on to the Minister of National Defence.

Following for Pearson from Robertson, Begins: At resumed discussion of the Korean problem this afternoon Bevin brought together a number of ideas which had emerged in the course of previous meetings. He suggested if these ideas proved acceptable to the United States they might form the basis of a new approach which could be introduced in the Political Committee on Thursday. A summary of these very provisional and tentative suggestions is going from Bevin to Franks tonight and will be repeated to Jebb who will send you a copy.

2. If this sort of approach appears to be feasible you and your colleagues in the Cease Fire Committee might consider making it your own either by incorporating it in substitution for what has become inappropriate in your draft statement of principles or by putting it in the form of a resolution for introduction in the Political Committee.

3. As you will see when you get Bevin's telegram the whole preoccupation of the Prime Ministers has been to find some basis on which the United States and the Peoples' Government of China might be willing and able to sit down and seek agreement on major Far Eastern issues which are threatening world peace. We realize the United States must find it difficult to accept an Assembly resolution drawn in terms designed to secure a positive and favourable response from Peking. At the same time we all feel here that nothing could be much worse than war at this time and in that place and that a pretty desperate effort to avoid it is justified. On this reading of the world situation the people taking part in these meetings feel they are warranted in asking the United States which is taking the greatest risks for peace and would be the main stay of the free peoples if war should come to think twice about rejecting a procedure which looks more likely than another to lead to the cessation of fighting in the Far East.

4. Bajpai tells me that Nehru who was unwilling to assent to Rau sponsoring the Cease-Fire Committee's draft statement would probably support both in Lake Success and in Peking the kind of policy outlined in Bevin's telegram. In this connection I should explain to you that the Indians attach particular importance to the words "in conformity with existing international obligations and the provisions of the United Nations Charter" which would define the tasks to be given the great powers of seeking a solution of the issues in the Far East which threaten peace. They have as you know maintained all along that there was no hope of getting Peking to discuss the Korean problem except in a context which would also give it an opportunity of settling the question of Formosa. The words "existing international obligations" would presumably include the Cairo declaration and this would they hope make it possible for them to persuade the Chinese to accept such a resolution as that now under consideration. Ends.

TOP SECRET. MOST IMMEDIATE.

Following is the text of the telegram which the Foreign Office is sending to the United Kingdom delegation in New York as a result of the discussion at this afternoon's meeting of Prime Ministers. Foreign Office have been requested to ask Mr. Jebb to pass text to Mr. Pearson in New York. You may wish to repeat it to him as well as to Mr. Wrong in Washington, Begins: This afternoon Prime Ministers continued discussion of Korean and Far Eastern questions. There was unanimous agreement that the objective is to get the United States Government and the Central People's Government of China to a conference table, and that if we are to achieve this the invitation must be so presented as to have the best prospects of securing the attendance of both.

2. We discussed at some length how the approach should be made. In general we consider that we should aim at the adoption of a resolution by the Assembly containing (as its operative part) little more than a strong request to the Governments of the United States of America, United Kingdom, U.S.S.R. and the People's Government of China to meet to consider outstanding questions in the Far East in conformity with existing international obligations and the provisions of the United Nations Charter.

3. The resolution might start by referring to Korea and to the spirit of the Iraqui-Syrian resolution of November 3rd,[10] and go on to urge that in view of the gravity of the present situation in the Far East representatives of these Powers should meet to discuss these problems and to avoid the dangers to world peace.

4. We have not worked out a form of words and are content to leave the drafting to our representatives in New York. They might for example look at the Cease Fire Committee's "principles" with a view to turning the fifth point into a resolution

[10] La résolution de l'Irak et de la Syrie demandait aux représentants des grandes puissances siégeant au Conseil de sécurité de discuter entre eux des problèmes qui risquaient de menacer la paix internationale. Elle a été finalement intégrée à la résolution sur l'union pour la paix.
The Iraqi-Syrian resolution called on representatives of the Great Powers on the Security Council to discuss amongst themselves problems likely to threaten international peace. It eventually became part of the Uniting for Peace resolution.

recommending a meeting of the Powers. Any such meeting would not, repeat not, be held in public.

5. But it is essential that we should know at once whether the United States Government would cooperate in bringing about this result. It will be recalled that in this communiqué the President and the Prime Minister announced their readiness to seek a peaceful solution of existing issues through whatever channels were open.

6. If the United States Government agree to the principles of such a resolution, then we would hope that the Cease Fire Committee could meet at once in New York to work out a draft resolution to table on Thursday when discussion is resumed. We feel that there is considerable advantage in such a resolution being tabled, under the auspices of the Cease Fire Committee though if this is not practicable we would agree to some other group, preferably including non-Commonwealth as well as Commonwealth representatives, functioning as sponsors.

7. It is important that we should know the American response to this as soon as possible. Whilst we are convinced that in the present crisis in the Far East it is imperative that talks should take place between the Powers, we are anxious to avoid making the position of the administration more difficult and are willing to consider any suggestions which they may have to make which would render presentation of these proposals more acceptable to the American public provided that we did not jeopardize the prospects of acceptance by the Peking Government. Ends.

At yesterday's (Tuesday) afternoon's meeting following the discussion about Korea on which Mr. Robertson has already reported, there was a relatively short and desultory discussion on the Middle East in which our Prime Minister took no part and on which there is nothing of interest to report.

2. At this morning's meeting the subject under discussion was raw materials and supply and the Chancellor of the Exchequer outlined the developments which were taking place in Washington[11] as a result of the meeting between Mr. Attlee and Mr. Truman and explained a suggestion put forward in a paper† for some form of Commonwealth supply organization. The proposal was received warmly by Australia but with some reservation by all other Prime Ministers.

3. Mr. St. Laurent put forward the view that we should first look at all the existing arrangements for Commonwealth liaison on economic matters, supply, production, shipping, etc., and see if whether some of these might be expanded to meet any new needs or if any new organization was to be set up, some of these might be wound up.

4. After a good deal of discussion it was decided to have a group of officials explore this matter and make a factual report by Friday. It was suggested by South Africa that a meeting of Supply Ministers or their equivalents might be held to decide whether any further liaison organization was necessary. No decision was reached on this suggestion pending the survey by officials.

2. The United Kingdom draft memorandum, reported in our earlier telegram, was discussed in a preliminary manner at the Prime Ministers' meeting yesterday (Wednesday) morning. Following that discussion a working party of officials met last evening to attempt to draft conclusions for further consideration by the Prime Ministers later today or tomorrow. The text of the draft prepared by the working party is reproduced below. It will be seen that this draft is considerably less ambitious than the original United Kingdom proposal. The Working Party's draft has the merit that it avoids prejudging the precise form or functions of any necessary Commonwealth machinery in this field, at least until after the shape of the commodity bodies in Washington becomes more apparent. The following is the text of the Working Party's draft:

"The meeting agreed to recommend to their governments that the functions of the Commonwealth Liaison Committee which is already charged with consultation on economic matters of mutual interest to Commonwealth countries should be expanded and that their representatives on the committee should be authorized in particular to discuss and report on all questions of common concern having to do with the supply and production of raw materials and manufactured goods including capital equipment."

The meeting of yesterday afternoon, Wednesday, was devoted to a survey of Europe with particular reference to Soviet tactics and intentions and the re-armament of Western Germany.

The whole performance was rather poor and there was no serious discussion on the merit of the case for or against German re-armament. All Commonwealth representatives except Mr. Nehru, who remained on the fence, favoured some degree of German rearmament.

Most of the meeting consisted of a cross-examination of the three Chiefs of Staff by Mr. Nehru, whose main theme was that, if time is to the advantage of the west, it would seem to be folly to pose an act which might lead to open aggression, either in the Far East or in Europe. He gave as his own view that Soviet Russia could not stand idly by while the west was rearming Western Germany (and?) that this might be considered by them as an act of such a provocative nature as to lead them into what they would call a preventive war.

Mr. Bevin's presentation of the case was not too impressive; he discussed, however, the problem of a possible Franco-German rapprochement with some imagination. He thought that, if such a rapprochement were possible, it would lead to an improvement of the morale of all Western Europe. He added that the plans for economic integration with Germany were helping to dispel French fears of Germany.

He praised the leadership given by Messrs. Pleven, Moch and Schuman and ended his round-up by saying that Western Europe was the key to the whole situation "of which the testing time might be during the next two or three years".

The most interesting points of the meeting were made by the Chiefs of Staff when cross-examined by Mr. Nehru. A fair summary of their remarks will be found in the minutes† of the meeting which are being forwarded to you.

The only remarks made by Mr. St-Laurent were to the effect that the aim of the North-Atlantic Treaty powers was to achieve a position of reasonable strength from which it would be possible to work for peace and that Canada was anxious to play her proper part in this effort to deter the Soviet Union from committing aggression.

Our immediate reactions to the discussion can be summarized as follows:

(a) Western Europe, apart from its strategic importance, does not appear to be a subject of much interest for the Commonwealth as a whole;

(b) Whatever interest there is, apart from the primordial interest taken by the United Kingdom and Canada, centers around the necessity of keeping Western Europe in a mood which will make its defence possible and the Commonwealth secure. Little concern, if any, is shown about the survival of Western Europe as a fount of western civilization;

(c) The knowledge of European problems in the Commonwealth, if yesterday's meeting is indicative, is of a scanty and, at times, biased nature.

Reference our telegram No. 89 of January 11th — economic discussions at the Prime Ministers' meetings.

1. The report† of the Working Party was discussed at the Prime Minister's meeting yesterday (Thursday) afternoon. Liesching, as Chairman of the Working Party, presented the report and stated that it represented the maximum upon which agreement could be secured. He indicated definitely that the United Kingdom would have preferred the setting up of a special body to consider supply questions. Menzies of Australia also was of the view that a special body should have been set up for this purpose. Donges of South Africa said that in his opinion the proposal of the Working Party was sufficient for the time being, but that later on a meeting of Supply Ministers should be convened to consider what further steps might be necessary. Nehru indicated that in his view the proposal was sufficient for the time being. This was concurred in by Holland of New Zealand, who added that the machinery might later be improved as circumstances warranted. The Prime Ministers of Ceylon, Pakistan and Southern Rhodesia agreed with the proposals of the Working Party.

2. Mr. St. Laurent in a brief intervention concurred in the proposals and stated that if later on a meeting of Supply Ministers should be convened, arrangements should be made for the ministers to be represented, since with parliament shortly to assemble it would be difficult for the Canadian Minister responsible for supply to attend a meeting in London.

3. Gordon-Walker pointed out that the implementation of the Working Party's proposals depended upon the extent to which the representatives on the Commonwealth Liaison Committee were supported by their governments by adequate instructions and full information regarding the supply position in their respective countries.

4. Mr. Attlee in summing up referred to the proposal for a meeting of Supply Ministers as being a matter for later consideration.

At the Thursday morning's meeting of the Prime Ministers the question of Korea was taken up immediately. Mr. Bevin indicated that there could be no agreement from the United States on any resolution without a cease fire being a condition precedent but that the United States authorities were prepared for the inclusion of the words "in conformity with existing international obligations and the provisions of the United Nations Charter".

2. While the atmosphere was much better than in previous discussions there was still some confusion about what precisely was being approved. This was largely dispelled first by the timely arrival of Mr. Pearson's telegram containing the revised text of paragraph (5) of the cease fire principles[12] and after some question about whether paragraphs (2), (3) and (4) could be dropped and the principles confined to (1) and (5), there seemed to be general agreement to let the Cease Fire Committee proceed with the document as it was.

3. Just as the meeting was about to break up Mr. Nehru however raised the point that had been made in Mr. Pearson's telegram which had not been read to the meeting but had been shown to him that he must specifically authorize Sir Benegal Rau to proceed if the principles were to be taken. When the meeting broke up for the luncheon adjournment it was not clear whether this in fact would be done and Mr. Robertson promptly communicated with Mr. Pearson to this effect.

4. After the main discussion on Korea but before the incident referred to in the last paragraph, Mr. Bevin raised some questions regarding some middle eastern problems and provoked from the Prime Minister of Pakistan a long outburst about Afghanistan and unfriendly propaganda emanating from India.

5. The afternoon session was devoted to a discussion on what might be included either in the final communiqué or a declaration of the Commonwealth principles. The discussion generally supported Mr. St. Laurent's reference to the "elephant" in his speech to the Canada Club and reached no conclusions whatever.[13]

6. The final meeting is to be held this afternoon.

SECRET. IMPORTANT.

My telegram No. 131, January 15th re Kashmir.[14]

1. We had a word tonight with Gardner of Commonwealth Relations Office who added a little background to the communiqué, although admitting that information bearing on the Prime Ministerial discussions of Kashmir was still pretty fragmentary.

2. You will be aware that the Prime Ministers (with exception of Prime Ministers of Southern Rhodesia, Ceylon, and Dr. Donges of South Africa) examined the Kashmir question on January 10th and again on January 12th. Over weekend, Prime Ministers of India, Pakistan and Australia met with Mr. Attlee at Chequers for a "Third round", but as communiqué indicates "agreement has not been reached". From the preliminary information Gardner had obtained, Liaquat had shown himself thoroughly reasonable throughout, but Mr. Nehru had given no signs whatever of a willingness to compromise, and had rejected virtually every suggestion put to him in the course of the meetings. For example, at the first meeting there had been some mention of the organization of a commonwealth force to maintain order in the area in dispute pending the completion of plebiscite arrangements. This had been rejected by Nehru on two grounds (1) that it would provoke the Russians and Chinese Communists, and (2) that the return of British i.e. United Kingdom forces to India would be misinterpreted by Indian public opinion. Nor had Nehru been impressed either by Menzies' alternative suggestion that Australian forces might be made available to do the job, or the subsequent proposal that a joint Indian Pakistan force be formed for this purpose.

3. There had also been some discussion of the nature of a possible plebiscite, and the suggestion had been aired that three simultaneous but separate plebiscites might be held (a) in the vale of Kashmir, and in the areas which are known roughly to lean (b) towards India, and (c) towards Pakistan. Nehru was said to be equally negative on this aspect, and to have taken refuge in arguments about the constitutional position and responsibilities of Sheik Abdullah. Finally there had been difficulties over the question of supervision, where again Nehru had not been prepared to accept the implications of the argument that United Nations machinery would be required in order to ensure conditions which would permit a fair expression of views. In this context too, he stressed the role of the Kashmir Government.

4. In contrast to Nehru's rigid attitude, the impression is that Liaquat had seemed anxious for a solution. Gardner had seen Ikramullah today who had recounted the history of the MacNaughton and Dixon proposals and had claimed that Pakistan had been prepared to accept such proposals, but that India had been intransigent.

5. Gardner said it had been decided that the communiqué would not be on the BBC tonight but would be released tomorrow morning. He added however that both Nehru and Liaquat are planning press conferences tomorrow, and that Liaquat feels he must make a reference to the commonwealth force, if only to demonstrate his own willingness to go along with proposals discussed by the Prime Ministers and to demonstrate that the responsibility for the failure of the present discussions rests with Nehru.

Évaluation de la réunion des premiers ministres du Commonwealth

Appraisal of the Commonwealth Prime Ministers' Meeting

SECRET [Ottawa], January 24, 1951

A meeting of Heads of Divisions and other External Affairs officers concerned was held on January 24 at 4 o'clock in the Conference Room. Mr. N.A. Robertson, Mr. J.W. Pickersgill and Mr. J. Léger spoke on the Meeting of Commonwealth Prime Ministers which took place in London from January 4 - 12, 1951.

INVITATION

When the invitation to hold a meeting was received from London in November 1950, first reaction and feeling in Ottawa was that there were so many demands on ministers' and officials' time that it was rather a burden to attend when no matters of outstanding importance required the calling of such a meeting. It was realized though that the meeting would provide an opportunity for the exchange of views with the new Asian members, and this in itself could make the effort worth while; also new governments were in office in Australia and New Zealand, and the meeting would provide an occasion for meeting Mr. Menzies and Mr. Holland. Mainly for these two reasons the invitation was accepted.

PERSONALITIES

United Kingdom

The United Kingdom group was a little weaker than those at former meetings. Mr. Attlee, Mr. Bevin, Mr. Shinwell and Mr. Gordon Walker attended all of the twelve sessions and Mr. Gaitskell, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, came to only one. It was the first Prime Ministers' meeting in which the Chancellor had not taken a full part. It was obvious that the United Kingdom group felt the loss of Sir Stafford Cripps as Chancellor and also as a close friend of Mr. Nehru. Mr. Attlee was a good chairman, making no Churchillian perorations, which though brilliant, added considerably to the length of meetings. Mr. Bevin was impressive in a massive, serious way, though rather heavy-handed for the company, especially those from Asian countries. Mr. Shinwell was not of great help to the meeting; he was amiable, benevolent and prone to thinking aloud, though his remarks were not always profound nor of great interest.

India

Mr. Nehru was an outstanding personality at the meeting and added something of his own to the weight his country carries in Commonwealth discussions. He is highly articulate, has a charming manner and great intellectual power. As a tactician, he is better than Mr. Liaquat Ali. Sympathy, at outset, was generally with Pakistan over the Kashmir issue, but, at times, Mr. Liaquat Ali spoke in a manner which alienated some sympathy.

Australia

Mr. Menzies' contribution was very impressive. He was adroit and helpful in the Kashmir discussions, taking the initiative in a way which did not antagonize anyone. His contribution to the final Declaration of Principles accepted by the Prime Ministers was something of a personal tour de force.

New Zealand

Mr. Holland was attending his first meeting and his lack of experience made it difficult for him to add much to the discussions.

South Africa

Mr. Donges, the South African Minister of the Interior, played a useful part and was a competent representative, always on the alert to protect South Africa's position which was never menaced in any way. On one point, a curiously common ground emerged between South Africa and India since neither wished to have its intra-Commonwealth disputes taken up at Commonwealth meetings.

Ceylon

Mr. Senanayake did not take an active part in the discussions, though he made clear his opinion of the United Nations, — that the less anyone had to do with it, the better!

Southern Rhodesia

Sir Godfrey Huggins was adequate in holding a watching brief for his country which has an anomalous status at Commonwealth Prime Ministers' meetings.

ORDER OF PRECEDENCE

It was the first Prime Ministers' Meeting when the formal, historical order of precedence in the seating plan around the conference table was not followed, and one reason for doing this was so that Indian, Pakistan and South African representatives would not be cheek by jowl. There was a similar departure from the formal order of discussion. Previously, the Chairman called on Prime Ministers to speak according to the "London" order of precedence, i.e. United Kingdom, Canada, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, etc. At this meeting, Prime Ministers of countries which had a special interest in the subject were called on to speak first.

This resulted in Mr. Holland, Mr. Senanayake and Dr. Donges taking a minor part in the discussions.

TOPICS DISCUSSED

No constitutional problems were raised and there was no discussion about "reviving the Empire"; there was no tension at any time, but a mutual recognition of good faith among all members of the Commonwealth. It is thought that our working relations with India and Australia should be easier because of the meeting.

KOREA

The crisis in Korea was so serious that this subject took precedence over all others, and five of the twelve sessions, as well as parts of other sessions, were devoted to it. The Indian position was the same as at Lake Success, and the United Kingdom position was well-known. Mr. Menzies said that when his party came into office it had taken a strong stand against the recognition of Communist China, but he was now coming to the conclusion that the Chinese People's Government was in fact the Government of China and should be represented in the United Nations. Mr. Holland's and Dr. Donges' positions came closest to the United States thesis, though Mr. Holland was torn between following Mr. Menzies' thinking or adhering to the Truman policy. In the Korean discussions, one fact was plain; no one wanted quick decisions: all urged delay in the United Nations; and there was unanimity in the desire to keep on seeking a peaceful solution of the difficulties with China.

PACIFIC PACT

This subject came up incidentally during discussions of a Japanese Peace Treaty. India was not interested in any idea of a counterpart of an Atlantic Pact. Mr. Holland was more realistic than Mr. Menzies and said he realized that security depended mainly on the position taken by Washington.

COMMONWEALTH SUPPLY COUNCIL

Mr. Gaitskell made an unimpressive case for further Commonwealth consultative machinery to secure closer liaison on problems of production and problems arising from current shortages of raw materials, with the special object of safeguarding those Commonwealth countries which were not members of NATO or OEEC. Apart from the United Kingdom and Australia, there was general agreement that a Commonwealth organization, as such, was unlikely to help solve world supply problems in any significant way. When Mr. St. Laurent produced a list of "stillborn" or inactive Commonwealth committees and councils which could be eliminated, Mr. Gaitskell had to admit that he had never heard of most of them. It was finally agreed that the Prime Ministers would recommend to their respective governments that the existing Commonwealth committee for consultation on economic questions should be strengthened.

The Canadian group had some sympathy for the Australian position on this question. Canada has supply arrangements with the United States, as well as NATO and OEEC, but Australia has none. Ten or fifteen years ago our attitude was the same as Australia's, and we were then pressing for some kind of partnership or council in which we would have a voice. Now our close diplomatic arrangements with the United Kingdom, the United States and France meet our needs, but Australia has not yet worked theirs out.

Defence Questions and the Middle East

In addition to the twelve sessions attended by all Prime Ministers, two other sessions were held, with the United Kingdom Chiefs of Staff present, to discuss the strategic position in the Middle East and the defence of Africa. The representatives of India, Pakistan and Ceylon were not at these sessions. It was not a question of excluding them; they had previously made known their position and excluded themselves. Mr. Nehru had stressed India's essentially neutral position between East and West and his general political philosophy is critical of the NATO defence arrangements, since defending one's position by force, is, he argues, a provocative measure. Mr. Liaquat Ali's position was quite different; he made it known that he could not take part in any defence discussions and Pakistan troops could not be released for defence of the Middle East until the Kashmir question was settled. His was a definite bargaining position which he would not relinquish, to induce other Commonwealth countries to assist in bringing about a solution of the Kashmir dispute. Dr. Donges took an active part in these discussions, and the South African Government under Dr. Malan was prepared to do more in the way of definite defence commitments than General Smuts had ever been allowed to do.

Mr, St. Laurent's Visit to France

The Prime Minister was given a most impressive welcome, and accorded honours equal to those given a head of state. There was a feeling of immediate sympathy and great warmth for him, as though he were one of their own.

In discussions with French Ministers, it was evident that the French attitude towards Germany had been considerably modified recently and that opposition to the creation of a German army now springs at least as much from fear of provoking Russia as from fear of a new German aggression. Mr. Schuman, the French Foreign Minister, believed that given time and peace, a Western European union could be worked out; if the United Kingdom held aloof, such a regional union would take possibly fifteen years but considerably less with the United Kingdom co-operating.

My dear Colleague:

I know that you have continued to feel uneasy about a number of aspects of the Colombo Plan. Since I still believe that a substantial Canadian contribution would be a sensible investment in the stability of an area which in the long run, I think, is important for our own security, I should like to try in this letter, if I may, to remove some of your doubts and misgivings.

But before doing so, let me restate very briefly the reasons for my support of the Colombo Plan. Although we are still in the dark about much of Soviet strategy, its main outlines are now clear enough, I think, for us to see that we must retain some allies in Asia if we are to prevent the whole of the Eurasian land-mass from falling under Communist domination. At present, the Governments in control of India and Pakistan are our firm friends, notwithstanding their very natural efforts to avoid becoming too deeply involved in the struggle with the Soviet Union. But these new Governments are highly precarious. They need external financial assistance if they are to have a chance of making some improvement in the appallingly low standard of living of their people and so of sheltering them from the attractions of Communist propaganda. We must try, I believe, to strengthen the will and the capacity of these countries to assist in the struggle against Communist imperialism; and one of the very few ways we can do so is by showing a practical interest in their economic welfare.

You have raised the point that, although a Canadian contribution would involve real sacrifice on the part of this country, contributions by sterling area countries would have very little meaning. It is true, of course, that the bulk of the United Kingdom contribution will be in the form of releases from the sterling balances; and for that reason, it could be argued that this is not a contribution but merely the repayment of a debt. On the other hand, I think you would agree that these releases will impose very real strains on the economy of the United Kingdom and will necessitate very real economic sacrifices, since they will make possible unrequited exports from the United Kingdom to the countries of South and South-East Asia. The United Kingdom will be exporting goods to these countries without receiving any goods in return. This is, of course, what any international debtor is obliged to do. But would it be fair to regard the accumulated sterling balances — of India, for example — as debts in the ordinary sense? As you know better than I, they were run up during the war in order to pay for military supplies and services purchased by the United Kingdom to support forces in India, the Middle East and Burma. They have, therefore, always been considered, I think, as forming a special category of indebtedness since they represent a debt incurred in the common defence.

The special nature of these debts was explicitly recognized, you will remember, in the Financial Agreement between the United States and the United Kingdom of December 6, 1945, in paragraph 10 of which it was stipulated that the United Kingdom would try to make agreements with holders of the balances whereby part would be immediately released, part would be funded on a long-term basis and part would be "adjusted", i.e., cancelled. In point of fact, of course, the United Kingdom has never been able to fulfil the intention it expressed in that Agreement. On balance, I think that we should be glad that heavy releases have been permitted from the balances since this has contributed powerfully to such stability as has been maintained in South and South-East Asia over the past five years. Nevertheless, the article of the Loan Agreement to which I have referred indicates that the United States at least did not regard the balances in 1945 as a debt in the ordinary sense. So far as I remember the opinion of Canadian financial authorities at that time, they were in full agreement with the efforts of the United States to scale down the balances and to fund much of the residue. This attitude on the part both of our Government and the United States Administration persisted at least as late as the Tripartite Economic Discussions in which you and I participated in September, 1949. You will recall that the communiqué issued after those discussions foreshadowed another attempt to liquidate the problem presented by "the existence of exceptionally large accumulations of sterling which were built up mainly during the war as the result of payments by the United Kingdom for goods and services purchased overseas in furtherance of the common war effort". By its contribution to the Colombo Plan, which is to take the form mainly of releases from the sterling balances, the United Kingdom has indicated its willingness to discharge the whole of its indebtedness and to do so at a rapid rate. In the light of the history of the problem of the sterling balances, this undertaking can properly be considered, it seems to me, as a real contribution to the economic development of South and South-East Asia.

It should also be borne in mind, I think, that although the bulk of the United Kingdom contribution will be in the form of sterling releases, a substantial, although minor, part will take the form of outright gifts to the colonies of Singapore, the Federation of Malaya, North Borneo and Sarawak. The sterling requirements of these colonies over the six-year period will be covered in their entirety by gifts from the United Kingdom. The sum involved is 61 million pounds.

So far as the Australian contribution of not less than 25 million pounds over the six-year period is concerned, it is true that with wool prices at a high level and with Australia's sterling reserves climbing at a rapid rate, the Australians are not going to have to pull in their belts this year in order to meet their contribution to the Colombo Plan. But the time will almost certainly come in the future, as in the past, when Australia will need all her reserves of sterling; and at that time the Australian contribution to the Colombo Plan will have a very real meaning. To put the Australian contribution to the Plan for capital development in its proper perspective, it must also be remembered that Australia has already agreed to contribute 2,800,000 pounds sterling over the next three years for technical assistance in South and South-East Asia.

You have also expressed anxiety that the programme may be too small and, in particular, that the amount of external assistance which is suggested will not be enough either to arrest the gradual fall in the standard of living which is being caused by the pressure of population or to make possible the inception of an upward spiral of economic development. I agree that when set beside the $12 billion of E.C.A. funds which have already been appropriated for economic recovery in Western Europe, the $3 billion of external finance for a programme of economic development in South and South-East Asia over a six-year period seems extremely small. Certainly the programmes of individual countries, with few exceptions, have been pared to the bone.

Nevertheless, I feel that $3 billion may not be far from the proper figure. There are, of course, sharp limitations on the rate at which external capital can be absorbed by countries so poor as India and Pakistan. Indeed, their capacity to absorb outside aid is limited by the very poverty which makes the aid necessary. They have few trained technicians; and they have very limited power to raise the local currency which is necessary to meet the internal costs of the development programme. In some countries, as you will have noticed in the Report, external finance would be used in part to augment the supply of local currency. Some consumer goods, as well as capital goods, would be bought abroad with the foreign exchange provided through loans or grants or sterling releases; and the proceeds from the local sale of these consumer goods would increase the internal finance available for development purposes. If, however, it is agreed — and this is implicit throughout the Report — that the chief responsibility for development in South and South-East Asia must rest with the Governments and peoples of the countries in the area, then those Governments must raise themselves the great bulk of the local currency which will be required, and the scarcity of internal finance must impose a sharp limitation on the rate at which external capital can be absorbed. This important principle has been kept firmly in mind, I think, by the authors of the Report and especially by those who have been responsible for drawing up the country programmes. On the whole, it seems to me, that they have struck a rough, but reasonably realistic, balance between the amount of external assistance which, ideally, they might like and the amount which, in fact, they believe they will be able to make good use of over the next six years.

I feel this particularly strongly in the case of India. My opinion rests in large measure on the confidence I have in Deshmukh, who has impressed me whenever I have met him both with his shrewdness and his honesty and who, I gather, has now firm control over economic policy in India. The amount of external finance which India is seeking was set only after he had personally examined the problem with great thoroughness; and that is an additional reason, I think, for putting considerable trust in the Indian estimate.

It is true, of course, that even if the $3 billion can be provided from external sources and if the programme is implemented in substantially the shape that is now proposed, there will not be any dramatic improvement in standards of living in South and South-East Asia. There will be, for example, an increase of only some 10% in the volume of food grains produced. That is certainly modest enough when the present poverty of the area and the likely increase in population are taken into account. Nevertheless, it will be something. There will be some visible, if slight, improvement in the standard of living. It is estimated, for example, that if the programme is carried through, it will be possible in India to provide in the rationed urban areas for cereal consumption of 16 ounces a day instead of the 12 ounces, which is the present ration.

In addition, of course, by the end of the six-year period the countries in the area will have completed important basic developments in the form of dams, irrigation works, hydro-electric installation and improved transportation systems, all of which could provide the groundwork for further development projects, many financed by private capital. I do not think it is too much to hope that, if finance can be found for the Colombo Plan and if, in spite of all the shortages caused by the heavy rearmament programme in the North Atlantic area, capital goods can be made available, at the end of the six-year period the countries of South and South-East Asia will not only have a somewhat higher standard of living than they have at the present time and so will be at least partially immune from the attractions of Communist propaganda, but will also be in a position from which a much larger programme of economic development could be undertaken without further inter-governmental finance.

On the other hand, I agree that the estimate of the amount of external finance which will be required to make a start on the process of economic development has been cut very fine. One consequence of this is that those countries which may be in a position to help, including Canada, should all do their fair share in order to see that the amount needed is fully subscribed. What our fair share would be is, no doubt, a question on which there can be honest differences of opinion. But I, myself, feel that it should not be less than $25 million per annum.

Yours sincerely,

L.B. PEARSON

SECRET [Ottawa], January 22, 1951

COLOMBO PLAN — FINANCE

During the past few days this matter has been discussed in Washington by Deutsch and Read of the Department of Finance and Plumptre of this Department.

2. When Deutsch and LePan came back from London they were inclined to recommend that the Canadian contribution to the Colombo Plan (in addition to technical assistance) should be about $25 million a year over the six-year period. The United Kingdom had suggested $50 million a year as our share but this was considered unduly large considering the whole size of the Plan and considering possible United States participation. At that time we had formed the impression that the United States might be willing to put up something like $200 million in 1951-52 for assistance in the area covered by the Colombo Plan ($300 million for the whole of South and South-East Asia, Commonwealth and non-Commonwealth).

3. In your memorandum to Cabinet of October 24th the suggestion of the United Kingdom was mentioned and the following sentence appeared:

> "It would appear however that should the United States support the programme to the extent which seems probable the Canadian participation which would be considered appropriate could hardly be less than of the order of $20 million a year."

In the Cabinet meeting of December 28th when the matter was again under discussion I understand that the Prime Minister specifically referred to the relationship that should exist between the contributions of Canada and the United States. Hence the discussions which our officials undertook in Washington during the past few days.

4. The United States attitude may be described as follows:

(a) No financial commitment can possibly be made at this time and none will be discussed at the meeting in Colombo on February 12th. The United States Executive Branch does not even know what figures it will put to Congress for external aid; and Congress is not likely to decide on firm figures for several months.

(b) It seems clear that United States aid in the Colombo Plan area will be a good deal less than the $200 million we had anticipated. However, no senior official in Washington will discuss figures.

(c) It was emphasized that commodity scarcities and not finance will be the limiting factor.

(d) Congress will insist that foreign assistance, even if it is not essentially of a defence character, must be justified in terms of the defence of the free world. This may lead to difficulties with countries that are not willing to "take sides" between the United States and the U.S.S.R.

(e) The difficulties of extending aid to India will be particularly great for obvious political reasons. Yet under the Colombo Plan India is to receive some two-thirds of the total assistance from abroad.

(f) Despite all these difficulties, the United States will be supplying aid to South and Southeast Asia and will take part in the work of the Consultative Committee.

5. The attitude of the United States is bound to have a strong effect on our Department of Finance. We may expect immediate and renewed resistance to making any commitment and above all to making a six-year commitment. They will probably wish to delay all decisions until the outlook clarifies. They will probably emphasize that commodities are now the limiting factors and that we do not yet know either what commodities are needed from Canada under the Colombo Plan or what commodities we would be willing to make available in view of developing short supplies in this country.

6. I think you will therefore be confronted by decisions on four points:

(a) You may consider accepting the position of the Department of Finance and postponing all financial decisions until the commodity position can be clarified. There is some logic in this attitude. On the other hand it would, I think be embarrassing to the Canadian Government in its relations with other Commonwealth Governments; it would certainly be embarrassing to Mr. Johnson, our High Commissioner in Karachi, who has now been told that he will lead the Canadian delegation to the February meeting in Colombo. It would not be consistent with our full membership in the Commonwealth Consultative Committee. On the other hand, if you decide to follow this course, we can argue that all along we have pointed out the relationship between our position and that of the United States.

(b) A second choice would be to go ahead despite the change in circumstances and ask Cabinet immediately to approve a sum of $25 million for 1951/52. (You will recall that Mr. Diefenbaker in a radio broadcast recently suggested $50 million). Both Cabinet and Parliament could be given assurance that this full sum would not be spent if the commodities were not available or if for other reasons it could not be spent wisely.

(c) You might wish to consider a compromise position. You might ask Cabinet to approve a smaller amount, say $10 million for 1951-52, on the understanding that if it were all used up sympathetic consideration would be given to the approval of additional amounts. Johnson would thus be in a position to say that Canada was "open for business" but in view of the radically changed world situation and particularly of the commodity situation the Canadian Government was not sure how much money could in fact be spent. Naturally under present circumstances it would not wish to provide more than was really needed.

(d) Finally there is a question whether Cabinet should be asked even to consider financial commitments beyond 1951-52. The Colombo Plan is of course a long term development plan. On the other hand the future is so uncertain that it seems unrealistic to invite Cabinet to consider contributions so far in advance.

7. If you approve either (b) or (c) above, or something like them, I will prepare the necessary memorandum for Cabinet. However, it would obviously be most desirable if in advance of Cabinet consideration you could reach agreement between the Prime Minister, Mr. Abbott, Mr. Mayhew and yourself.[15]

CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa], January 29, 1951

COLOMBO PLAN

Deutsch has just made a proposal regarding the Canadian contribution which I think may prove most helpful. The central point in it is that Canada should immediately make a gift of wheat to India to meet the acute shortage there.

2. The Indian Government would sell the wheat in India. It could then use the proceeds for capital development under the Colombo Plan.

3. I believe that this procedure would be quite in accordance with the spirit and purposes of the Plan. It has always been recognized that part of the external assistance that India and other countries in the area receive would be spent on consumers' goods. These goods would relieve shortages there and would release men and materials for capital development who might otherwise have to be kept on the production of consumers' goods in India or other countries.

4. I asked Deutsch what figures he had in mind. He said he hoped to be able to provide $10 million to $12 million worth of wheat. This, however, would entirely depend upon the availability in Canada of wheat of suitable milling grades. He has asked Mitchell Sharp to review the position immediately in the Department of Trade and Commerce.

5. Deutsch pointed out certain aspects of the plan which he thought would probably be advantageous from Canada's point of view. He thought that there would probably be political advantages considering the present relationship between Canada and India, and also considering that Congress is in no mood to give immediate assistance to India. (It has "shelved" a recent Indian request for two million tons of grains at cut prices). Another advantage that Deutsch foresaw was in relation to the Canadian political situation. A gift of wheat might be welcomed here in quarters which would look askance at the donation of large sums of money. Further, his plan had substantial administration advantages. Canada would not get into the position of having to approve or supervise any particular plan for capital development put forward by the Government of India. Finally, the gift could be made immediately and without waiting for a Parliamentary vote; the operations of the Wheat Board are apparently sufficiently elastic to make this possible.

6. Deutsch went on to say that he would hope to be able to make some similar arrangement for the supply of Canadian products to Pakistan. It would, however, be most difficult; they are self-sufficient in foodstuffs. Clearly they do not need Canadian wheat.

7. It is just possible that a similar arrangement might be made with Ceylon. However, thanks to high prices of rubber and other factors, Ceylon is in a very comfortable financial position at present and scarcely needs external assistance. If it was considered that Canada's contribution to the Colombo Plan ought to contain something for Ceylon an arrangement might be made that some of the rupees raised by the Indian Government from the sale of Canadian wheat might be transferred to Ceylon. Ceylon has an adverse balance of payments with India and can always use rupees.

8. Deutsch felt that Canada's contribution to the Colombo Plan certainly need not extend to other countries in addition to the three Dominions.

9. I asked Deutsch what he thought the total Canadian contribution might add up to. He replied that it could not be less than $15 million and perhaps might go as high as $25 million.

10. He said that he had put his proposals up to Dr. Clark who was "intrigued" and favourably disposed towards the approach. The matter will not be put up to Mr. Abbott unless a favourable reply is received from Trade and Commerce regarding the availability of wheat, and unless a favourable response comes from this Department particularly in regard to the political implications of the proposals.

11. I told Deutsch that my immediate reaction was very favourable. If Mr. Abbott could come forward with a suggestion along these lines there might be a resolution of difficulties and divergents that had been evident in the past. However, I said that I would have to seek guidance within the Department on the official level.

12. I suggest that we should (a) give warm support to the general proposals and (b) insist that the total amount made available should not be cut below $25 million and (c) insist that, before any arrangement with India is announced, we should at least open up discussions with Pakistan. LePan agrees with these suggestions. Do you agree?[17]

Le ministre des Finances

Minister of Finance
to Secretary of State for External Affairs

SECRET Ottawa, January 30, 1951

My dear Colleague:

I have your secret letter commenting on certain aspects of the Colombo Plan.

It is true that I had some serious doubts as to the merits and soundness of the report made by the group in London but I think it unnecessary to argue the matter in any detail at this time. I have always been prepared to admit its humanitarian aspects and the possibility that in the short run at least it might have some political effect in helping to hold South and South-East Asia out of the Communist camp (although it is not inconceivable that the long run effect might be disappointment and disillusion). Generally speaking, however, I have felt, and I made this quite clear, that we were committed by our participation in the preliminary conferences to some participation in the Plan itself. As to the amount of the participation, I wished to have it determined in connection with the Estimates when Ministers would be in a position to weigh the extent to which they were prepared to reduce expenditures in their own departments and on domestic projects in order to make possible a contribution to the Colombo programme. If my colleagues believe that opinion in Parliament and in the country will support a contribution to this Plan and are prepared to see either a corresponding reduction in their own departmental projects or a corresponding increase in taxation, I will be prepared to support any contribution that may be agreed upon.

I shall make no attempt to reply to the various points you make but will confine myself to one or two comments to clarify my own point of view. My main objection to the report was the way it glossed over the two fundamental difficulties impeding a solution of the social and economic problems of South and South-East Asia:

(1) The problem of population—the fact that during the next twenty years the area in question is expected to add to its population a number at least equal to the present population of the United States (a rate of growth with which the increase in production cannot possibly keep pace, and, if it does not, it will, of course, mean an inevitable decline in the standard of living); and

(2) The Kashmir problem—the fact that the two largest of the recipient countries are spending 60% to 65% of their total budgets in preparations primarily for fighting each other (a total amount about equal to the amount of assistance being asked from other countries).

I fear it is not too much to say that in glossing over these two problems as it does, the report is misleading — not to say dangerous.

In regard to the United Kingdom, I said that its contribution would be merely paying off a debt and carrying out a programme which it would have to carry out, whether or not there was any Colombo Plan. Australia's contribution, moreover, would not come out of its own hide but be made at the expense of the United Kingdom.

I think it is just conceivable that if the aid were on a sufficiently large scale, far larger than the $3 billion contemplated by the Plan, there might be some chance of increasing production and raising the standard of living with sufficient speed to produce a slowing down of the rate of population growth and perhaps drastic changes in ancient traditions, religions, taboos, etc. However, there is no chance of this. It is probably too much to hope that money and supplies will be in sufficient quantity to carry out even the more limited objectives of the Colombo Plan. I cannot, therefore, be as optimistic as you appear to be in regard to the impact of the Plan on living conditions in the area and their reflection in political opinion.

Yours sincerely,

D.C. ABBOTT

SECRET [Ottawa], February 1, 1951

INSTRUCTIONS TO CANADIAN DELEGATION TO MEETING IN COLOMBO, FEBRUARY 12, 1951 OF THE COMMONWEALTH CONSULTATIVE COMMITTEE ON SOUTH AND SOUTHEAST ASIA[19]

I. General Instructions

The Canadian Government has shown a continuing and growing interest in the work of the Consultative Committee. It approves of the general purposes of the Committee and the work it has done so far.

2. The Government has, however, been unwilling to approve the establishment of any elaborate central organization; both technical assistance and capital development funds should be provided and administered as far as possible on a bilateral basis. It is recognized that a certain amount of pooling of information and co-ordination of activities regarding external assistance in South and Southeast Asia is useful. Hence the Government was willing to agree to the establishment of the Technical Co-operation Bureau. Simple arrangements which promote the same purposes in connection with the capital assistance may be supported.

3. The Delegation must, of course, refer back to the Government for consideration all major proposals put forward at the meeting, and all proposals involving financial commitments.

OK L.B.P[earson]. [6 Feb 1951]

II. Organization

4. The following material on organization is put forward for the general guidance of the Delegation.

5. The United Kingdom has proposed (CRO Simplex No. 8, of January 17)† that there should be two meetings of the Consultative Committee every year, one at the ministerial level and the other at the official level. There should be a small Central Secretariat; (the United Kingdom telegram implies incorrectly that there has been final agreement on this point). This Secretariat should prepare annual reports on the progress of the Colombo Plan and on further measures required.

6. These proposals are open to objection:

(a) If ministerial meetings are held too frequently and without clear cause the result will be that the senior Ministers who are responsible will be represented by junior Ministers, Parliamentary Under-Secretaries, etc. The result will be satisfactory to nobody. Ministerial meetings should be held only when really needed.

(b) A new Secretariat should not be set up unless we can be sure that it will help and not hinder the operation of the Plan. The Secretariat would probably have to be located somewhere in South or Southeast Asia. Difficulties that have been experienced in finding a Director for the Technical Assistance Bureau are a warning of what may happen. The countries of South and Southeast Asia have a very limited supply of officials with real initiative, organizing ability and financial responsibility. Such officials are so scarce that they are unlikely to be spared for the Central Secretariat. On the other hand it is quite out of the question for the Secretariat to be dominated by non-Asiatics.

(c) Neither the Consultative Committee nor a central Secretariat established under it is in a good position to assist in the arrangement of all the bilateral agreements that will have to be drawn up covering capital development, or to ensure that there is no overlapping in the agreements between various countries and agencies, or to follow up the way in which such agreements are in fact being implemented. This sort of a job cannot be done effectively from some remote international Secretariat. It must be done on the spot in the country receiving assistance and primarily in the capital of that country. Hence the growing emphasis placed by the ECA in Washington on the need for "coordination at the national level" between the various United States programmes for technical and capital assistance, the various U.N. programmes, and the Commonwealth programmes. In short the initiative and the assistance which the United Kingdom is rightly seeking to provide for in their proposals must be exercised to a considerable extent at the national level and not at the level of the Consultative Committee.

7. The Canadian Delegation should lay emphasis on the need for

(a) pooling of information and

(b) a measure of informal coordination at the national level. How this may best be achieved is a matter for exploration and discussion in Colombo. Individual countries, both giving and receiving, are vitally concerned; so are U.N. agencies; so is the Technical Assistance Bureau in Ceylon (at least insofar as it can be under its present constitution which restricts it fairly closely to technical assistance). Some sort of working arrangements in the capital city of each receiving country need to be worked out; each government or agency directly concerned in programmes in that country should be included in these arrangements. They should provide, if possible, for an annual review or report on capital development achievements and plans in that country. This review or report should be the primary responsibility of the "home country" but representatives of other countries and agencies should be able to help. It will be recalled that in London, in September-October 1950, the plans put forward by various countries to the Consultative Committee were on their own responsibility and other countries never endorsed them; nevertheless the Colombo Plan was, in a real sense, the result of a cooperative effort.

8. The Consultative Committee should meet once a year to consider the annual reviews or reports from the several countries concerned and other matters of interest. September would seem to be a good month; by that time in each year the financial outlook in most of the contributing countries is settled and ministers and officials are under less pressure than in the earlier part of the year.

9. Meetings of the Consultative Committee should normally be at the official level but should be raised to the ministerial level whenever matters of sufficient importance were coming up.

10. No special separate Secretariat should be set up at the present time for the Consultative Committee and the development of an elaborate centralized organization should be resisted. Much of the work which has been envisaged for a central Secretariat could be undertaken in the national capitals along lines suggested in paragraph 3 above. Experience might suggest that at a later date the Technical Assistance Bureau already being established in Ceylon might provide some services. However, decision on this point should be avoided until the Bureau has been set up and its staff appointed.

III. Orientation

11. The Colombo Plan was drawn together in the summer and early autumn of 1950. Since that time there have been important changes, political, economic and military, all around the world. It seems desirable to review the Plan in the light of changed conditions.

12. The countries of the North Atlantic Pact, and others such as Australia and New Zealand which are closely associated with them, have undertaken new defence programmes. These are so heavy as to change their financial and economic capacities to undertake other burdens. Commodity shortages and inflation are dominant problems. If the Colombo Plan is to succeed, in whole or even in part, some adjustments to the new position will have to be made.

13. They will presumably have to be made both by the supplying countries and the receiving countries. The receiving countries will have to realize that the world has changed since the fall of 1950 and that there will be more difficulties and delays to be overcome in achieving their objectives. The supplying countries on the other hand will have to realize that their financial assistance will be completely useless unless it is followed up by priorities or other direct assistance which the receiving countries will need if they are going to get certain types of supplies.

14. Further, with the threat of war far more imminent than a few months ago, perspectives naturally shorten. Programmes that could be carried forward in a relatively leisurely way under different circumstances may now look quite unrealistic. The short-run looms much larger than the long-run.

15. It would seem desirable to invite the receiving countries to review their programmes with these factors in mind. (It is not suggested, of course, that a detailed statistical revision of the Colombo Plan programmes need be undertaken or published). While they can scarcely be expected to welcome the idea that the needs of defence are upsetting their plans, nevertheless they can scarcely object to the suggestion that any economic plan, if it is at all realistic, has to take account of actual or anticipated shortages of materials, foodstuffs, and finished products.

16. There is a danger that the United States representatives at the Consultative Committee may put forward this point of view too vigorously or too bluntly. They will be acutely aware of Congressional difficulties; if money is to be voted by Congress during the forthcoming months the justification will have to be of a short-term nature and will have to be made in some relation to "defence" as opposed to mere long-run "development". Such an attitude will not be welcomed by countries in South and Southeast Asia.

17. This is a situation where the tact and experience of United Kingdom officials, who have had long experience in dealing with countries in South and Southeast Asia, should be very useful. The Canadian representative should raise the question with them at the earliest opportunity. He should seek some re-orientation of the Colombo Plan. He should not, however, unless assured of United Kingdom support, take any open initiative in the matter. He should seek to explore with United Kingdom officials the possibilities of such a re-orientation while at the same time attempting to restrain, if necessary, any undue or precipitate pressure in that direction by the representatives of the United States.

IV. Additional Members of the Consultative Committee

18. Canadian assent has already been indicated to proposals that Indonesia and the Philippines should join the Committee.[20]

19. The question of membership of France and the Netherlands may arise; we have been told by French officials that the United Kingdom will be putting forward the name of France. Both French and Dutch officials have enlisted our support. They have both been told that Canada would be in favour of their membership. On the other hand it is recognized that some of the countries of the Area are likely to oppose the membership of France and the Netherlands; faced with such a situation the Canadian Delegation should not press for their inclusion. It is clear that existing members must be unanimous if additional countries are to join. The United States insisted on unanimity before accepting the Committee's invitation.

COLOMBO PLAN; CANADIAN CONTRIBUTION

14. The Secretary of State for External Affairs, referring to discussion at the meeting of December 28th, 1950, submitted a recommendation concerning the composition of the Canadian delegation to the meeting of the Consultative Committee on Economic Development in South and South-East Asia to take place in Colombo beginning February 12th.

It was necessary to decide on the Canadian contribution to the plan. U.S. officials would be attending the meeting but the requirements for re-armament in the United States together with antagonisms aroused by the differences between the United States and India over the Korean question threw some doubt on the probable extent of U.S. contribution, at least in the first year of the plan. Apart from the great need for economic development, the political situation made it even more imperative than previously for Canada to give a substantial contribution. It was accordingly recommended that $25 million be contributed in the fiscal year 1951-52 in the form of grants under bilateral agreements with the recipient governments and that it be available principally for India and Pakistan with a small amount for Ceylon.

There had been severe damage to Indian crops during the current year and India had recently approached the Wheat Board for 100,000 metric tons of Canadian wheat. It might be desirable to offer on a grant basis $10 to $15 million worth of wheat to India under a bilateral agreement providing that India would use the local currency obtained from the sale of this wheat for the financing of development projects under the Colombo Plan.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated.

(Minister's memorandum, Feb. 1, 1951 — Cab. Doc. 41-51)†

In some earlier discussion on financing, one suggestion by the United Kingdom had been that the United States plus the International Bank should assume 50 per cent of the total cost of £1 billion over the six year period. The suggestion had been that the United Kingdom might then assume £330 million, Australia £60 million, New Zealand £10 million and Canada £100 million. On such a basis, the annual contribution by Canada would amount to about $50 million per year, approximately double what was now recommended. The government of Australia had already committed itself to a contribution of £25 million sterling over six years.

15. The Minister of Fisheries doubted whether it would fit in with the real purposes of the plan if a substantial part of the Canadian contribution took the form of wheat. The recipient countries could not, themselves, provide the capital equipment needed for development and if too large a part of contributions went into consumer goods the purposes of the programme would be frustrated.

16. The Minister of Finance said that a grant of wheat would, in the present circumstances, have an advantage in reducing the pressure that would otherwise be exerted on already short supplies of capital goods. As to the amount, it seemed to be as low as was desirable if Canada was to make some proportionate contribution. It had to be clearly recognized, however, that the amount of the contribution would have to be made up either by curtailment of other government expenditures or by an increase in taxation.

17. The Prime Minister pointed out that, while the difficulties of making a contribution in present circumstances had to be recognized, the Speech from the Throne had indicated that Parliament would be asked to provide an appropriate contribution from Canada to the Plan. This should be limited to the present year and should be made only if it was clear that other member countries would be participating in such a fashion that there was some prospect that the Plan could be carried out along the lines originally intended. If it appeared that there was no prospect that the Plan could be made successful, the matter would have to be reconsidered.

18. The Cabinet, after considerable discussion:

(a) approved the recommendation of the Secretary of State for External Affairs as to the composition of the Canadian delegation to the meeting of the Consultative Committee on Economic Development in South and South-East Asia to be held in Colombo, Ceylon beginning February 12th, 1951; the delegation to be composed as follows:

Delegate:
Mr. David Johnson, High Commissioner for Canada in Pakistan;
Alternate Delegate:
Mr. Paul Sykes, Canadian Trade Commissioner in Colombo;
Advisers:
Mr. Clarence Read, Department of Finance;
Mr. J.H. Thurrott, Department of External Affairs;

(b) agreed that the Canadian delegate at the meeting of the Consultative Committee be authorized to state that the Canadian government was willing to provide $25 million in the fiscal year 1951-52, but that this amount would be made available only if other contributing countries were providing enough to give reasonable hope that the broad objectives of the Plan would be achieved;

(c) agreed that contributions were to be in the form of grants made from time to time under the terms of specific bilateral agreements between each of the recipient governments and the Canadian government; and,

(d) agreed that the Department of External Affairs be authorized to hold discussions as recommended with the Indian authorities on the desirability of providing a grant of $10 to $15 million worth of wheat to India during the fiscal year 1951-52 out of any contribution that might be made by Canada to the Colombo Plan; any such grant of wheat to be made under a bilateral agreement providing that India use an amount in local currency equal to the value of the wheat for the financing of development projects called for by the Colombo Plan.

COLOMBO PLAN; ANNOUNCEMENT OF CANADIAN CONTRIBUTION

5. The Secretary of State for External Affairs, referring to the discussion at the meeting of February 7th, 1951, said that the United States government was sending a delegation to the meeting of the Consultative Committee on Economic Development in South and South-East Asia which was to be held in Colombo beginning February 12th. It was, moreover, now planning to place before Congress a proposal to grant aid to India in the sum of $180 million for the purchase of wheat and other grains to alleviate present famine conditions in India. The U.S. government appeared confident that Congress would approve this proposal. In the circumstances, there might be something to be said for making an immediate announcement in the House of Commons that the Canadian delegation to the meeting of the Consultative Committee would state that the government was willing to seek Parliamentary authority to contribute $25 million to the first year of the Colombo Plan, provided it became clear during the meeting that the other participating countries would be making appropriate contributions so that the broad objectives of the Plan might be realized. It might be well to inform the House at the same time that the government was immediately opening negotiations with India looking to arrangements, as part of the Colombo Plan, to provide some Canadian wheat to India during 1951-52.

(Draft statement, Feb. 9, 1951)†

6. The Minister of Finance suggested that, in any announcement, the language of the Speech from the Throne — "an appropriate Canadian participation" — be used instead of the figure of $25 million.

7. Mr. Pearson considered that it would be advantageous to make public the extent of the proposed Canadian contribution in advance of the announcement of the U.S. $180 million programme. If the Canadian figure were announced after the American figure, it would be more likely to be compared unfavourably with the latter.

8. The Minister of Fisheries expressed some concern that, in tying relief to the Colombo Plan, Canada might be setting an example that would be followed by other contributors to the Plan.

9. The Prime Minister said that the Canadian delegation would be making the proposed Canadian contribution known to the Consultative Committee. During the meeting of the Committee it should become apparent whether the United States and other countries were planning to make contributions of sufficient size to permit the realization of the broad objectives of the Colombo Plan. If they were not, the Canadian contribution would have to be reconsidered. If they were, and if the press reports from Colombo gave insufficient publicity to the proposed Canadian contribution, consideration could be given to making an announcement in the House. An announcement would be easier at that time when it would be realized that Canada was not taking the lead in the matter but was making a contribution in association with several other countries.

10. The Cabinet, after further discussion, noted the remarks of the Secretary of State for External Affairs regarding the question of making an immediate announcement in the House of Commons regarding the proposed Canadian contribution to the Colombo Plan and agreed that no announcement should be made for the present.

Note du sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures pour le secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

Memorandum from Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to Secretary of State for External Affairs

SECRET [Ottawa], February 12, 1951

You asked Plumptre to provide the following papers:

(a) Draft instructions to Mr. Johnson in Colombo.[21]

(b) A brief paper on supplying wheat to India under the Colombo Plan.

I understand that you wish to have them for Cabinet meeting today. They are attached.

2. For your convenience I also attach the following documents:

(a) A recent report from Washington on U.S. aid to South and Southeast Asia (WA-419 of February 2, 1951†).

(b) Personal comments on the Colombo Plan by Mr. Wilgress (Telegram 313 of February 7, 1951†).

(c) A report from our High Commissioner's Office in New Delhi regarding the wheat position including a reference to the Colombo Plan (Air Telegram No. 8 of February 3, 1951†).

3. I have been giving some thought to the way in which discussions with the Indians on the subject of wheat might be opened up. The matter concerns not merely India and ourselves but also other countries in the Colombo Plan. Different countries will have different attitudes.

4. It is essential that the proposed operation should have the general approval of the United Kingdom authorities.[22] They have been responsible for the whole conception and development of the Colombo Plan. They are also most sensitive to

[22] Note marginale :/Marginal note:
Desirable but surely not essential [L.B. Pearson] possible reactions by Asiatic peoples. Therefore I suggest that we should take the matter up with them immediately and confidentially.[23]

5. If they approve, or at any rate if they do not object, I suggest that we should then raise the matter with the Indian authorities. This should probably be done in New Delhi where all angles of the situation could be appraised but we would keep the Acting High Commissioner here fully informed.[24]

6. I do not think it would be necessary or desirable to consult other countries in advance.[25] The United States will largely go its own way in South and Southeast Asia in any case; it will not be greatly interested in what types of aid are included under the Colombo Plan and what are not. The Pakistanis would probably object if they were given the opportunity of doing so. In a letter addressed to the Ottawa Citizen on February 8th an official of the Pakistan High Commissioner's Office here said: "For political reasons India has been deliberately cutting down on her grain production since 1945. She is turning over hundreds of thousands of acres of good grain growing land to jute and cotton. She does so because she wishes to cripple Pakistan's economy ... Pakistan considers that a free gift of food to India by North America would be tantamount to encouraging her in the policy of both economic and political strangulation of her neighbour".

7. I do not think it desirable to open up the whole question in Colombo.[26] The Delegations there are probably not well suited to discuss such a problem. Some of them are not vitally concerned; all would have to seek instructions from their Governments. Our own Delegation would not make any statement on the matter until the necessary concurrence had been obtained both from the United Kingdom and from India and, of course, until it was clear what Canada's contribution to the Colombo Plan this year was going to be.

WHEAT FOR INDIA AND THE COLOMBO PLAN

The Indian development work laid out in the Colombo Plan is partly to be financed by funds raised by the Government of India and partly by funds from abroad. The funds from abroad serve two purposes: they help the Indian budget and they help the Indian foreign exchange position. A gift from abroad of any urgently needed commodity — whether wheat or steel or timber — can serve the same two purposes: the Indian budget and the Indian exchange reserves are relieved of the purchases and Indian rupees and foreign currencies are released for other purposes. When a poor man is sick, a present of food is as useful as a present of medicine; he can spend on medicine the money that he is saved by the gift of food.

2. Thus there is nothing inconsistent with the basic objectives of the Colombo Plan on the one hand and, on the other, the furnishing of wheat to India on a grant basis. India has been importing wheat since the end of the war. This year, owing to drought and other calamities, the Indian grain position has become so serious that the ration has been cut from 12 to 9 ounces (an Indian newspaper story of the reduction of the ration is attached).†

3. A recent telegram from the High Commissioner for Canada in New Delhi (Air No. 8 of February 3†) summarizes the present situation. Our High Commissioner states his earnest hope that "either under the Colombo Plan or bilaterally, Canada may supply as much wheat as possible of any grades India can use — at least during the next twelve months or so."

4. Herbert Hoover's views may be of interest. Mr. Hoover, who strongly attacked so many of the features of the present United States foreign policy, has referred to the providing of wheat to India as being not in the category of politics but in the category of Christianity. The United States, he observed, "has never failed to do its best to aid starving people and shouldn't fail in this case either." The Indian people "are striving for freedom and we can afford to help them to the fullest possible extent."

5. India's balance of payments forecasts for this fiscal year and for the next two fiscal years (which were drawn up six months ago) show no requirement for dollar wheat. A requirement is shown for non-dollar wheat, presumably from Australia, averaging roughly $33 million a year.

6. In 1949 India's imports of foodstuffs and developmental commodities were:

Food—$99.5 million (of which wheat was one-half)

Developmental commodities (steel, lumber, etc.)—$138.6 million

For the next three fiscal years the estimates are:

	(Millions of dollars)
	1950-51	1951-52	1952-53
Food	$ 75.9	103.1	101.6
Developmental commodities	$141.9	165.1	169.0

7. It can plainly be seen that the import of food, including wheat, is essential to India's economic life. In 1949 India had an overall current account deficit of $120 million. There is no reason to expect that this situation will change. In fact, this year, owing to the need to import 6 million tons of grains at a cost of $500—$600 million, India's financial position will be very much worse. Six months ago the estimate of India's foreign exchange resources available to finance all imports this year was $500 million. India's estimated imports, before the disastrous crop development, called for imports of $587 million for this fiscal year. (Actual imports in 1949 were $543 million.) To have an additional strain of roughly $450 million over and above the amount of $76 million originally programmed for food grains will place a strain of major proportions on the Indian economy.

CONTINUING ORGANIZATION

Following from Johnson, Begins: This subject is on the agenda tomorrow morning. I have discussed it informally with leaders of most delegations. United Kingdom, with wide support, is pressing strongly for a small secretariat which would have no power of control over plans but would provide for continuity and act as a clearing house for ideas and experiences and ensure that all members of governments are given a picture of progress of plan. United States representative told me he now has no authority to agree to a central secretariat but he has asked for instructions giving him some discretion. He would not agree to a Secretariat with any supervisory or screening power but if prevailing view here is that there should be some central organization to collect information and make it available to the government, he hopes he can agree.

2. In the informal talks I put forward views given in paragraph 10 your instructions but so far without direct support except from United States. I shall strongly urge them in formal session but if they do not command general support, have I your authority to agree without further reference to you (a) to setting up of a small secretariat either in conjunction with Technical Assistance Bureau or separately, or (b) to agree to such a proposal if United States representative also agrees?

Following from Johnson, Begins: Divergent views were expressed. The United Kingdom supported establishment of small secretariat as outlined in my telegram No. 2 and got support from a number of delegations.

2. I made a statement along the lines of paragraphs 4 to 10 instructions. It got full support from United States and measure of support from Australia.

Following for Johnson from the Minister, Begins: Government has been giving sympathetic consideration to figure mentioned in paragraph 7(1) of my memorandum of February 1st,[27] but before any final agreement or any public announcement, they would like your appraisal of outlook. Do you consider that other contributing countries including U.S.A. are planning, despite changed conditions since last October, to contribute enough to give reasonable hope that the broad objectives of the Plan will be achieved? In reviewing outlook with other delegates you may tell them in confidence the figure now under consideration here.

2. Proposals in paragraphs 8 and 9 of my memorandum are being discussed with U.K. authorities prior to taking up with India. Pending similar U.S. action has, of course, bearing on this matter.

Your telegram No. 3 of February 14th.
Following from Johnson, Begins: I have spoken to the Head of the Delegation, United States, United Kingdom, Australia and New Zealand in sense of your telegram.

2. It is impossible to answer the question you put to me because the United States representative has given no indication in public or in private of amount of United States contribution. He expressed sympathy and interest in the plan but was noncommittal.

3. I also spoke to the Bank representative who thinks that the United States contribution of $200,000,000 for the first year would get the scheme under way.

4. All I can say is that with no indication of United States or Canadian intentions there has been disillusionment here. Announcement of Canadian contribution would do much to create better atmosphere.

2. United Kingdom and Australia with general support of India, Pakistan and Ceylon strongly urge case for small secretariat. United States delegate was not convinced of necessity for secretariat but has in view of strong views expressed informed Washington that he proposes to accept recommendations unless Washington otherwise instructs him.

3. Though also not convinced of necessity for secretariat in view of your telegram No. 4,† I do not propose to object when recommendations come before main committee.

4. Recommendations make no reference to coordination at national level. Though Asian delegates realize there will be informal talks in their capitals they resisted attempts to spell out machinery.

5. There has been developing general impression that this meeting has proved premature and possibly damaging. For this reason most delegations were anxious that recommendations to this meeting should stress importance of work that Consultative Committee has to do and indicate probability that small secretariat will be required. Ends.

1. Consultative Committee shall meet whenever necessary by mutual agreement and at least once a year.

2. It is envisaged that the Committee will publish yearly report and consider such other reports as may be necessary.

It was generally felt that a small secretariat would be required both to serve Consultative Committee and to facilitate exchange of coordinating ideas and experience on problems that would come before it. However it was considered premature to endeavour to determine precise meaning of arrangements until size and scope of external finances available to countries in areas were better known. In the meantime should need for any secretariat assistance arise special arrangements could be made by mutual agreement by governments concerned. Ends.

2. In regard to the provision regarding other countries you may state that the Canadian Government very fully appreciates the constitutional and administrative difficulties of the United States which make it quite impossible for its representative to make a full and binding statement of its position at this time. On the other hand the Canadian Government has from the beginning felt that its own contribution of dollars could not be considered entirely apart from the very much larger supplies of dollars that might come from the United States.

La délégation à la réunion du Comité consultatif au secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

Delegation to Consultative Committee Meeting to Secretary of State for External Affairs

TELEGRAM 14 Colombo, February 20, 1951

Following from Johnson, Begins: Committee concluded this morning with adoption of its report. Following is summary of main points and recommendations.

1. Future organization of continuing consultation. Report states it is considered premature to determine precise arrangements until size and scope of external finances available to countries in areas are better known and follows wording substantially of recommendation of sub-committee contained in my telegram No. 9 of February 15th with additional recommendation that a further meeting of the Consultative Committee should be convened as soon as practicable.

2. Procedure for obtaining financial aid. Report states that views expressed by representatives were necessarily of a preliminary and provisional nature and that all representatives accepted basis that negotiations would be bilateral although this would not exclude possibility of joint action by a number of governments in a particular case.

3. Role of International Bank. Decision as to whether role of Bank already played can be enhanced may take some time since it is not yet known whether special assistance grant will be made available. This is one of factors which influences each country's credit worthiness. Report recommends that Bank should be invited to maintain close and continuous liaison with the Committee.

4. Science and Technical resources execute plan. Report notes that while representatives express appreciation of general objective of United Kingdom proposal for appointment of science liaison officer for Bureau of Technical Co-operation and (group corrupt) scientific conference, they considered it premature to attempt to reach a decision at this meeting.

5. Participation of non Commonwealth Governments. Report states that while submission of comprehensive national plans would greatly contribute to an assessment of the economic needs of the individual countries of the areas as a whole it was not in any way obligatory for membership to Committee that they should be submitted. Contribution of working expenses is a matter for each government to decide what it can offer.

6. Report refers to a proposal made at yesterday's meeting by Ceylon for an exhibition to be held at Colombo early in 1952 in which Colombo Plan countries would be participating. Further communication will be sent regarding this matter by Ceylon through the usual channels.

7. Atmosphere, helped by announcement of Canadian contribution, improved last two days and delegates dispersed in a reasonably hopeful mood.

8. I am leaving [for] Karachi early tomorrow. Ends.

DESPATCH 111 Karachi, February 24, 1951

CONFIDENTIAL

REPORT ON CONSULTATIVE COMMITTEE — COLOMBO MEETING, FEBRUARY 12-20, 1951

PART V. FUTURE ORGANIZATION FOR CONTINUING CONSULTATION

6. This subject occupied the greater part of our time. Three main proposals were put forward, namely the United Kingdom proposal, the Pakistan proposal and the Canadian proposal.

7. You will remember that the United Kingdom sent telegrams on this subject to member governments on December 16 and again on January 17. The United Kingdom also circulated a paper at the meeting. In its view the Colombo Plan envisaged a three-fold approach to the problems facing participating countries, namely (a) the drawing up and implementation of national development programmes; this is done individually and independently by the governments concerned; (b) the provision of assistance by a contributor country to a recipient country. This is done bilaterally by the two governments concerned; and (c) the building up of a common stock of knowledge and experience, the common examination of questions of mutual interest, the common search for experts, the common review of progress made and the common discussion of the general problems still to be tackled. In the view of the United Kingdom this last question is the task of the Consultative Committee. It followed from the above assessment of the task of the Consultative Committee that effective machinery should be established to provide continuity during those periods when the Consultative Committee is not actually meeting. The secretariat would be able to perform the staff work necessary when meetings of the Consultative Committee are to be held. It would also be charged with the duty of keeping member governments constantly informed of developments. The United Kingdom made it clear that the secretariat would have no powers of control in relation to the Plan. It would be very small. Apart from the staff needed on the technical co-operation side, the United Kingdom suggested that the secretary-general should have under him no more than two or three administrative officers.

8. Pakistan's suggestion was that a council of economic development should be set up similar to the Council for Technical Co-operation. Mr. Hasan did not circulate a paper or spell out his ideas very clearly but that is what he had in mind. His fear was that if there is no common discussion of needs and availabilities of finance, the larger and stronger powers, i.e. India, would get more than their share of the benefits.

9. The Canadian plan was outlined in your telegram of February 8 to member governments. I made a statement to the Committee about it along the following lines. The Canadian Government suggested that emphasis should be placed on the need for pooling of information and a measure of informal co-ordination at the national level. The Consultative Committee might explore how this might best be achieved. Arrangements in each capital city would include each government or agency directly concerned in programmes of that country and might also include the preparation of an annual report on progress in that country. Consideration of those reports would be a function of the Consultative Committee.

10. I shall now discuss briefly the fate of each of these proposals. The United Kingdom received strong support from New Zealand and a considerable amount of support from one or two other delegations for the immediate setting up of a small secretariat. The United States and Canada were the two most vocal dissenters. United States opposition surprised the United Kingdom. Close touch had been kept with Mr. Moore, of the United States Embassy in London and, according to Mr. Flett, Mr. Moore said he was in full agreement with the proposals made by the United Kingdom. When it became apparent that the United Kingdom proposals would not be accepted, there was for a time a feeling of discouragement. The line I took was this. What we were all interested in doing was ensuring that effective economic aid would come into this area. It was quite wrong to say that the amount of aid depended upon the amount of organization. In fact, as far as Canada and the United States were concerned, the reverse was probably the case. I also said that if Canada decided upon a contribution, I could not see that the lack of a central organization would keep us from making it available to such countries as we decided needed aid.

11. The Pakistan proposal, which was put forward towards the end of our sessions, was never fully discussed. Australia, New Zealand and a number of non-Commonwealth countries supported it strongly and the United Kingdom indicated equally strong dissent. I did not speak on the merits of the proposal. Before it was my turn to speak Mr. Hasan, realizing there was opposition to it, closed the discussion and merely asked that governments give his proposal further consideration before the next meeting.

12. The Canadian proposal received support from Mr. Kennedy (United States) but even he did not say very much about it when strong opposition came from India. The Indian delegate would not agree to any general recommendation in the report that our proposal should be further considered or in fact to any reference to it in the report at all. At one time there was a suggestion that the United Kingdom, Pakistan and Canadian proposals should be attached as appendices to the report for further consideration. The Indian delegate said that if the Canadian proposal was attached, he would feel obliged to attach an Indian reply. This was considered undesirable and in the end none of the proposals was attached to the report. The Indian delegate never made clear the reasons for his opposition to our proposal. I assume that he feared that any committee set up in a national capital would attempt to exercise some sort of control or supervision over the activities of the national government. India prefers bilateral negotiations, unhampered by any sort of control by other powers and feels strong enough to get a reasonable share of available aid, and to obtain reasonable terms. I should add that the Indian delegate was friendly throughout but he apparently had instructions on this point.

13. The compromise recommendations on a continuing organization are contained in paragraphs 10, 11 and 12 of the report which for convenience I reproduce below:

> "10. A number of proposals for continuing organization were placed before the Committee, but it was considered premature to determine precise arrangements until the size and scope of the external finance available to the countries in the area were better known.
> "11. It is, however, recommended -
> (1) that a further meeting of the Committee should be convened as soon as practicable;
> (2) that the Consultative Committee should meet by mutual agreement whenever necessary, and at least once a year; and
> (3) that the Committee should publish an annual report and such other reports as may be necessary.
> "12. It is considered that a small secretariat will be required, both to serve the Consultative Committee and to facilitate the exchange and co-ordination of ideas and information on the problems that would come before it. Should the need for any secretarial assistance arise before the next meeting of the Committee, special arrangements could be made by mutual agreement by the Governments concerned."

14. A few comments are in order. No attempt was made to determine precise arrangements for a continuing organization but the Committee went on record as saying that "it considered that a small secretariat will be required both to serve the Consultative Committee and to facilitate the exchange of and co-ordination of ideas and information on the problems that would come before it". At first Mr. Kennedy insisted that the word "will" which I have underlined should be "may" but after telegraphing Washington he was able to accept "will". Even the use of "will" does not involve a very serious commitment.

15. The recommendation in paragraph 11(1) of the report is also a compromise. Some delegates wished a recommendation that the Consultative Committee would meet in two or three months. Others preferred to leave the time entirely open. The intention behind the recommendation is that when the size and scope of external aid is known, another meeting would be called if, after a consultation, it is evident that there is some chance of obtaining agreement.

16. You will note that there is no commitment to hold a meeting at the ministerial level once a year. The United States delegate strongly supported our view that no such commitment should be made. He seemed to think it very doubtful that the United States would ever be represented at meetings of the Consultative Committee at the ministerial level.

17. The United Kingdom pressed strongly for the publication of an annual report. I was doubtful about the wisdom of this provision but nearly all the other delegates seemed to think that there was some advantage in publishing an annual report.

18. The recommendations about a continuing organization leave several loose ends. There is no indication of the person or country which should take the initiative in calling meetings or in assembling the material necessary for the annual report. The United Kingdom delegation seemed to think that this task would remain with the United Kingdom as the host country at the last meeting of the Committee at the ministerial level. Others seemed to think that Ceylon as the last host government would carry the responsibility until the next meeting of the Consultative Committee.

19. The report makes no reference to the country in which the next meeting should be held. Several delegations, including the United Kingdom, Australia, New Zealand, India, Pakistan and Ceylon said privately to me that they hoped Canada would be the next host country. On the other hand, Mr. Kennedy (United States) said publicly he hoped that meetings of the Committee would be held in Asia.

PART X. AMOUNT OF CANADIAN CONTRIBUTION

32. I was sorry that I was not able to give a more satisfactory answer to your telegram No. 3 of February 14 asking me if I considered that other contributing countries including the United States are planning to contribute enough to give reasonable hope that the broad objectives of the Plan will be realized. Mr. Kennedy refused in public or in private to give any indication of the amount that Congress might appropriate for the purpose of implementing the Colombo Plan, or even to indicate the amount which the Administration might ask Congress to appropriate. After talking to Mr. Basch, I reported to you that he considered that a United States contribution of 200 million dollars for the first year of the Plan would suffice to get it well under way. (Presumably Mr. Basch's estimate was passed on to the United States Embassy in Ottawa because I was embarrassed when Mr. Kennedy showed me a telegram from Washington reporting that I had said that the Bank representative had expressed this opinion. Mr. Kennedy must have spoken to Mr. Basch about it because at a later stage in the proceedings Mr. Basch remarked that I was very quick in reporting information to Ottawa.)

33. At three p.m. on February 17, I received your telegram No. 5 of February 16 authorizing me to make an announcement of the Canadian contribution. By that time the Committee had adjourned to meet again when a drafting sub-committee had completed the draft of the report. On February 19 the main committee was called to meet at four p.m. I was anxious to make our announcement at that meeting because the Committee was concluding its meeting on the following day and there was more chance of favourable publicity if our announcement appeared before the final press communiqué. When I showed my proposed announcement to Mr. Kennedy, he begged me to replace the words, "very much larger supplies of dollars" by the words, "the aid", so that the sentence would read, "On the other hand the Canadian Government has from the beginning felt that its own contribution of dollars could not be considered entirely apart from the aid that might come from the United States."

34. Mr. Kennedy's request put me in a difficult position. I felt quite sure that you attached considerable importance to the words he wished me to delete. On the other hand he felt he would be embarrassed at the meeting if I used them. It was then too late to ask for fresh instructions. As relations between our two delegations had been close and friendly and as I was anxious that Mr. Kennedy should depart from the meeting in a happy frame of mind and write a favourable report to his government, I thought it would be unreasonable for me to refuse to make any change or even to postpone my announcement for a day while I awaited fresh instructions. I therefore decided to make the change, but at the same time I made it clear to him that I was quite sure that you considered the words to be important and would probably use them in any announcement made in Ottawa.

35. I should add that the Canadian announcement was very favourably received at the meeting. It received wide publicity in the Colombo papers and in some Indian and Pakistan papers. The Bank's representative considered that our announcement had been timely and well worded. I attach as an appendix† the text of my announcement. The full text appeared in the minutes and in the Colombo press. A summary of it is included in our report.

36. During the course of the meeting the United Kingdom delegation received word of the proposed gift of wheat by Canada to India and seemed unhappy about it. All I said to them was that I was aware a transaction of this kind was under consideration in Canada but that I did not have full details of it. I suggested that if they had any observations to make the place to make them was in London or Ottawa.

PART XIV. GENERAL COMMENTS

42. There was a general impression at the opening sessions, which continued until the end of the second day, that the meeting had been called prematurely. The United Kingdom government, which had taken the initiative in calling the meeting, was, it turned out, acting under three inaccurate premises, namely, (a) that the United States was actively interested in holding a meeting at this time, (b) that the United States was prepared to go along with the United Kingdom proposals for a continuing organization, and (c) that in the absence of stated opposition to their memorandum or specific alternative proposals by other countries, the United Kingdom proposals would receive general support.

43. The meeting was thus immediately confronted with widely divergent views on the main item on the agenda. I have discussed how this difficulty was dealt with in Part V of this despatch. Moreover most delegates considered that the form of the continuing organization could only be determined when the amount of external finance became known. At the early sessions I was not able to make any announcement about the size of the Canadian contribution. The United States delegate, Mr. Kennedy, made it quite clear that he could give no indication of the extent of the United States contribution. Delegates quite naturally began to wonder why the meeting had been called.

44. In fact, a certain amount of ill feeling developed between the United Kingdom and the United States delegations as regards the responsibility for holding the meeting. The United Kingdom delegation indicated to other delegations that the meeting had been called because of United States pressure. Mr. Kennedy heard of this and was unhappy about it. It obviously put him in a difficult position. If the United States was anxious to hold a meeting, then obviously other delegates would expect the United States to give a lead to the meeting or at least be able to agree to proposals put forward by other persons. Mr. Kennedy telegraphed the State Department on this point and received a reply which he showed to me indicating that the State Department had never expressed the view that an early meeting of the Committee was desirable. The misunderstanding seems to have arisen in London where talks took place between Mr. Moore of the United States Embassy and United Kingdom Treasury officials. Certainly the United Kingdom Treasury officials were under the impression that the United States believed that an early meeting of the Consultative Committee should be held because it was important "to keep the heat on".

45. As the sessions continued the feeling of disappointment and disillusionment among delegates abated. This was largely due to the role played by Mr. Kennedy after a disappointing beginning. It was also helped by the announcement of the Canadian contribution. Delegates gradually realized the basic purpose of this meeting was primarily to set the stage for full participation by the United States in the work of the Consultative Committee. This task was, I think, accomplished. Mr. Kennedy, though not indicating the amount of possible United States aid, was in his later statements helpful and encouraging. He made it clear that the United States was participating and was glad to be participating in the work of the Committee as a full member. In his final statement to the Committee, Mr. Kennedy said that in his view the results of the meeting were of a favourable character and that he hoped representatives would not leave in a pessimistic mood. He referred to the enthusiasm, interest and cordiality among representatives and to evidence of co-operative effort and self-help that existed. He also referred to the promise of considerable aid that had already been made on the part of the United Kingdom, Australia and Canada and was glad to hear that programmes were already being carried out and that countries were keeping their programmes under review. It was his belief that much could be accomplished with what was on hand and what was in prospect and he said he looked forward to progress being realized in as rapid a manner as possible.

46. I spoke privately to nearly all the delegates at the close of the meeting. Mr. Kennedy stressed to me that he meant every word of what he had said at the final session. Other delegates said that, though at first they had been disappointed, they thought that they had obtained very valuable information and that the meeting was useful and valuable to them. They now understood the position of the United States, Canada and other countries and were hopeful that adequate aid would be forthcoming.

47. You may think that the results of eight days deliberations were meagre. Though I am inclined to agree with you, I think I should say in defence of the delegates present, that considering the divergent views held by the United Kingdom and some other countries on the one hand and the United States and Canada on the other, not much more could have been accomplished.

48. I express the hope that before the next meeting is held, informal talks will take place with the United Kingdom, United States, Canada and one or two other countries on the purposes of the meeting in order that when a meeting is eventually held there may be some hope of reaching an agreement among the more important members of the Committee.

49. I am afraid I have written a pedestrian account of the meetings of the Committee. My able and more imaginative colleagues, Mr. Read of the Department of Finance and Mr. Thurrott of the Department of External Affairs, will shortly be arriving in Ottawa and will no doubt wish to add their comments to the report which I have given.

50 I should like to add a word of thanks to Mr. Paul Sykes for the help he and his staff gave us during the meeting. I should also like to thank them for the many acts of kindness and hospitality shown to all of us.

COLOMBO PLAN — ARRANGEMENTS WITH PAKISTAN

Shortly after midday today Mohammed Ali called on Mr. Heeney to receive a copy of the statement to be made by the Minister in the House of Commons this afternoon. A copy of this statement is attached.[28]

2. Mr. Heeney referred briefly to the contribution of $25 million which the Canadian Government was planning to make to the Colombo Plan in its first year; he emphasized that it was to be made available provided other countries were also contributing so that the broad objectives of the Plan could be attained. Mohammed Ali remarked that the proviso was a prudent one. Nobody would think of donating half the funds needed to build a hospital without a proviso that the money would only be available if other contributors made up the other half.

3. Mr. Heeney went on to say that we now wished to explore with the Pakistan authorities what supplies they might wish to obtain under the Colombo Plan. He warned that many commodities were in very short supply these days. There would have to be discussions with officials of other Departments. Mohammed Ali mentioned that he had recently received a list of commodities which the Pakistanis were having difficulty in getting from Canada. He would send us this list. Discussions could follow. Mr. Heeney said that these discussions should take place in Ottawa.

4. Mr. Heeney went on to say that whatever assistance was provided by Canada would have to be covered by a formal bilateral agreement. He suggested that when this had been drawn up — presumably in Ottawa — it should be signed in Karachi. Mohammed Ali readily agreed that this would give the best sort of publicity to Canadian assistance to Pakistan.

5. We shall keep you informed of developments. You will see from the Minister's statement that wheat is likely to be provided for India in connection with the Colombo Plan. This matter will naturally receive our primary attention.

COLOMBO PLAN — ARRANGEMENTS WITH INDIA

This morning Mr. Banerjee called on Mr. Heeney to receive a copy of the statement to be made this afternoon by the Minister in the House of Commons. A copy of this statement is attached.

2. Mr. Heeney referred briefly to Canada's intention to provide $25 million during the first year of the Colombo Plan and called attention to the provision that other countries should also be contributing so that the broad objectives of the Plan might be reached.

3. Mr. Banerjee was told that the Canadian authorities would wish to explore immediately with the Indian authorities the possibility of supplying wheat to India in connection with the Colombo Plan. Mr. Heeney referred to the use for capital development in India of the "counterpart funds" received from sale of wheat. He also said that whatever aid was to be provided would have to be covered by one or more formal bilateral agreements.

4. Mr. Heeney said that exploratory discussions should take place in Ottawa both regarding the possibility of supplying wheat immediately and also regarding the form and substance of the bilateral agreement. However, when an agreement came to be signed he suggested that this should be done in New Delhi because it would attract public attention to the assistance that Canada was making available. Mr. Banerjee agreed to these suggestions.

5. Exploratory discussions will take place in Ottawa in the near future. We shall keep you informed.

6. Would you please convey the information in this despatch to the other missions in New Delhi concerned with the Colombo Plan: the missions of Commonwealth countries, of the United States and of United Nations agencies? The leader of our delegation at the recent meeting of the Consultative Committee in Colombo pressed strongly for a measure of exchange of information and informal coordination in the national capitals of countries who were to receive assistance under the Colombo Plan. The delegates of some countries, particularly of India, were strongly opposed to anything in the way of formal coordination which they feared would be misinterpreted by the people of their country. Nevertheless it is essential for us to know what economic assistance is being provided to India by other countries so that our own assistance may be the more usefully employed. Would you please send us such information from time to time; conversely we shall expect you to disseminate amongst the other missions concerned such information as we send you regarding our plans and activities here. I should add that at the meeting in Colombo the United States vigorously supported our proposals for exchange of information in national capitals; you should find the United States Embassy particularly cooperative in this matter.

Wheat for India

Wilson reported that of the 300,000 tons of wheat contracted for by India last fall under the International Wheat Agreement, some 4 1/4 million dollars worth is scheduled for shipment in March. This sum, therefore, represents the maximum amount of wheat which it would be possible to debit against the Colombo Plan, in the current fiscal year, if a Colombo Plan appropriation was obtained during the next ten days or two weeks. India pays for the current Wheat Agreement shipments through the means of a revolving fund kept with the Wheat Board in Winnipeg. The Board, in turn, pays its agents against ocean bills of lading.

It seems clear that between now and the end of July there is no possibility of additional wheat, i.e. wheat over and above the 300,000 tons, being shipped to India. There is wheat of the lower grades available in the Prairie Provinces, but there are not transportation facilities to move this wheat to Vancouver until the late summer. The position is that everything is sold that we can move through the ports, regardless of quality. During the months of August, September and October, however, we will be able to move sizable quantities of No. 5 wheat to Vancouver, for shipment abroad.

It was agreed that it would be very desirable to keep the placing and carrying out of all orders under the Colombo Plan on a regular commercial basis. India would pay for a certain part of its wheat purchases from its own resources. It would pay for another part with Colombo Plan funds. (Whether additional purchases by India should be at Wheat Agreement prices or commercial prices is a separate problem to be worked out by the Wheat Board with India.)

As a result of commercial enquiries started a few weeks ago, we are waiting to find out whether the Indian Minister of Food, Mr. Cupta, is interested in purchasing No. 5 wheat. Present signs would suggest he is not too interested in purchasing it. Presumably, it would look more attractive if provided on a grant basis.

Bilateral Agreement

The Department of Finance is drawing up a draft of the type of Bilateral Agreement Canada would enter into with India and Pakistan, under the Colombo Plan, for capital assistance. The Department of Trade and Commerce is drawing up Bilateral Agreements to cover technical assistance programs.

With respect to the Agreements under the Colombo Plan, it was agreed that it would be desirable to take account of the following points:

(a) Unless special steps are taken to separate out our aid, and keep it separate, it is possible that the aid Canada gives may evaporate into the general morass without leaving behind any tangible identifiable evidence of a capital development having been made possible and having been carried out as a result of the Canadian grant under the Colombo Plan;

(b) Without tying down the recipient countries to a long series of formal and detailed legal obligations we should aim to get a clear understanding that the aid Canada extends will be distributed equitably;

(c) An integral part of the Agreement would be the establishment of a counterpart fund, preferably in a special account in the Reserve Bank in India;

(d) We should make a point of seeing that the financial fruits of the aid we extend, should come under the control of Mr. Deshmuck, Indian Minister of Finance, who has taken a key roll in drawing up the Colombo Plan;

(e) Whether we wish to approve the use to which the counterpart funds are put, or merely request to be consulted, is a fairly important point for decision;

(f) Capital items purchased under the Colombo Plan and used on Government account will be in a different category. Unlike consumer goods and other items sold in India, certain capital items will not produce counterpart funds. For capital items of this nature, it would be necessary to have separate Agreements with the recipient countries.

Canadian Personnel in South and South-East Asia

For the next year, our interest, under the Colombo Plan, will be chiefly in India and Pakistan. Ceylon does not need external financial assistance this year and it is not desirable for us to attempt operations in British Colonial territories. In view of the fact that we will be donating very large sums of money to India and Pakistan, it may be desirable to send special personnel to that area to attend to the many problems which will arise. One of our main concerns will be to try to see to it that the Canadian contribution is used in the right places and for the best advantage of both recipient countries and of Canada. The individuals assigned to this task need not have their activities confined to one country.

Organization at the Canadian End

Special arrangements should be made to administer Colombo Plan questions at the Canadian end. One immediate suggestion was the desirability of establishing a focal point in Trade and Commerce where supply and priority problems could be handled. The Pakistan High Commissioner told the Under-Secretary, February 21, that he had been requested to take up, with the Canadian authorities, supply problems which are causing concern to Pakistan.

Our Telegram No. 49 of March 13.†

COLOMBO PLAN

Banerjee has now reported India's reaction to taking No. 5 wheat under the Colombo Plan. India considers the introduction of low grade wheat into the Government operated ration system might "evoke serious public criticism". Although the wheat would be free to the Indian Government, the Indian people would have to pay for this wheat precisely as they pay for regular grades of wheat. The friendly gesture underlying Canada's contribution might well be defeated, something which Banerjee said neither Government would wish to have happen. We agreed that we had no intention to support the Colombo Plan by forcing India to take any commodity.

2. India's grain purchase requirements during the next few months are closely related to the fate of the United States Emergency Assistance Programme. India would prefer to wait until the fall to see if regular grades of wheat could be obtained after our harvest.

3. In the meantime India wishes to obtain some of the following commodities: aluminium, copper wire and bars, zinc, wood pulp, timber and newsprint.

4. Banerjee was told that we could see some objections to furnishing industrial materials under the Colombo Plan. Wheat, which has the advantage of being a government transaction at both ends, has the humanitarian aspect of helping people who are hungry. If we are able to send finished manufactured products, such as farm machinery, or if we contribute to some capital construction project, the relationship of our assistance to the principles of economic development in the Colombo Plan would be tangible and clear. Industrial raw materials, on the other hand, are absorbed and disappear practically on receipt.

COLOMBO PLAN — DIVISION OF THE CANADIAN CONTRIBUTION[29]

At a recent interdepartmental meeting on the Colombo Plan (Heasman and Wilson, Trade and Commerce; Deutsch, Finance; Plumptre and Pick) it was agreed that it would be difficult in the early stages of the first year of the Canadian participation to draw up a firm programme of aid from Canada for the Colombo Plan countries. To divide up the full amount of the proposed Canadian contribution in advance of the Canadian contribution appearing in the estimates or being approved by Parliament might be a mistake.

2. Rather than making a firm division in advance, a preference was expressed for fixing a general target at which to aim. For planning purposes it was suggested that $10 million be earmarked for Pakistan and $15 million for India. In view of the prosperity which Ceylon is enjoying at the present time, there does not appear to be any need to offer assistance to that country. If Ceylon does ask for aid we can then consider whether we should extend a small amount of aid.

3. There has been no suggestion that we should extend assistance to the British colonies in the area. As a general principle, it is to our advantage to see Canadian Colombo Plan expenditures limited to a few countries rather than trying to give a small amount of assistance to all the countries in the area. There is, however, something to be said for considering giving some aid to a non-Commonwealth country in the area. We would not wish to see a pattern emerge in which the United Kingdom, Canada, Australia and New Zealand limit their contributions to Commonwealth countries and the United States becomes the sole benefactor of the non-Commonwealth countries.

4. When Mohammed Ali called on me on March 6, he asked what amount of Colombo aid the Pakistan authorities might expect Canada to allot to Pakistan. He was told that there was no intention, at this time or later, of making a precise division of any Canadian contribution. Rather it was the intention to meet needs in one country or another as they arose. The Colombo Plan was intended to run for a period of six years and the Canadian contribution would be a small part of the total. There would be no point in trying to make any very careful division of the Canadian contribution in the first year. Mohammed Ali fully understood the logic of this position. However, he went on to enquire what sort of a figure the Pakistan authorities might use as a working basis. It was suggested that he might put forward, as his own proposal, the figure of $10 million for the coming year. It was pointed out that such a figure might apply to a single project or a group of projects of different sorts or to part of larger and longer projects; the Canadian authorities did not wish to rule out any possibilities.

5. I should be grateful if you would indicate if you agree with the views outlined above.[30]

CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa], March 27, 1951

COLOMBO PLAN AID TO PAKISTAN AND INDIA

The following points arose at an interdepartmental meeting Thursday, March 22 (Finance, Trade and Commerce, External Affairs):

1. Raw Materials

It was stressed that wherever possible any requirements (nominally under the Plan) for scarce raw materials should be steered away from us and to the I.M.C. in

[30] Note marginale :/Marginal note:
Yes L.B.P[earson]. [March 21, 1951]

Washington. This would avoid the embarrassment of direct rejections of claims here, also drain upon our own domestic supplies. It would allow us, where appropriate, to tell claimants we would support their claims in Washington. Wherever this procedure is not feasible the claimant must be asked to state in detail the purposes for which the raw materials are to be used in order that decisions can be reached as to their validity.

2. Requirements by Pakistan and India

Trade and Commerce submitted the following list of items which, it was suggested, might be used as a basis for discussion on procurement under the Plan with Pakistan and Indian authorities. This list seeks the best compromise between on the one hand the stated needs of the two countries and on the other hand the domestic shortage of certain raw materials. The list follows:

PAKISTAN
Serial No. 12 —	Central Agricultural Engineering Organization, — the supply of agricultural machinery, except crawler type tractors.
Serial No. 33 —	Seed and model experimental farms.
Serial No. 35 —	The providing of small wooden fishing trawlers and tugs.
Serial No. 58 —	The supply of large Douglas Fir timber for the development of the Port of Chittagong.
Serial No. 64 —	Geological Survey (Aerial mapping).
Various Nos. —	Hydro-electric Power Plant.
Various Nos. —	Cement Plant.
Various Nos. —	Pulp and Paper Mill.
Consumer Goods —	Such as polystyrene and possibly small quantity of asbestos, both of which have been requested.
INDIA
1(b) Agr. 1 —	The providing of small wooden fishing trawlers and tugs.
11(b) Transp.3 —	The supply of motor transports (this would depend on date of delivery).
Various Nos. —	Hydro-electric Power Plant.
Various Nos. —	Cement Plant.
Various Nos. —	Pulp and Paper Mill
VI(b) Social Capital 2 —	Establishment of a Western Technical Institute at a cost of 13.2 million rupees, — to be started in 1951 and completed in 1957.

Wheat and other consumer goods, as available.

(The serial numbers and other hieroglyphics in the left hand column are those which appear opposite these items in the Appendices to the Plan.)

It was agreed that these lists should be sent to Karachi and New Delhi for information. The Pakistan list is to be telegraphed to Karachi for transmittal to Said Hasan before he leaves for Ottawa. Because of the shortage of certain raw materials in Canada there was considered to be some advantage in presenting these lists to the two recipient countries before receiving from them a statement of their own requirements which would almost certainly include commodities we would find it embarrassing to provide. The intention is to discuss the lists with the Indian and Pakistan High Commissioners here.

3. Overall Financial Plan

It was agreed that discussion on the overall financial plan would take place in Ottawa. The Department of Finance will prepare a memorandum[31] on the subject which would be available about April 10th.

4. General

It was agreed:

(a) That any project suggested by recipient countries and involving an unduly high content of U.S. materials would have to be ruled out.

(b) That in examining projects suggested by recipient countries, it would be necessary to make a clear distinction between those which would be directly concerned with advancing further economic development (e.g. public utilities such as electric power stations) and those which were ordinary commercial enterprises (e.g. pulp and paper mills). Any suggested projects in the latter category would, if eligible at all, require special financial arrangements.

COLOMBO PLAN AID TO INDIA

1. Yesterday Banerjee called on us to discuss the list of items set forth in the memorandum forwarded to you under my letter No. E566 of March 27. Representatives of the Departments of Trade and Commerce and Finance were also present.

2. Banerjee did not feel qualified to discuss the list in any detail. He merely said he would submit it to New Delhi.

3. He asked what sum would be allocated to India out of the $25 million we have conditionally authorized. We told him that while we wish to maintain maximum flexibility in allocation under the Plan, we thought he could be assured that between $10 and $15 million would be a reasonable assumption as India's share.

[31] Non retrouvée./Not located.

4. We underlined the point made in our memorandum of March 27 that the projects suggested should be divided into two distinct parts, i.e., those which would probably be a purely government to government transaction (for example, public utilities) and those which might involve subsequent sale by the Indian Government to private interests (for example, a pulp and paper mill). The latter would require special financing.

5. He emphasized the value both to India and ourselves of selecting projects which would bear a distinctive Canadian stamp, such as the establishment in its entirety of a Western Technical Institute (see memorandum under reference) rather than items which would quickly lose their identity. We suggested and he agreed that raw materials should be avoided.

6. We said we thought the time was approaching when experts from India, thoroughly well informed on commercial and engineering problems, should come to Ottawa to discuss the actual details of these projects. In this connection we would draw your attention to our E406 in which we stated that exploratory discussions should take place in Ottawa. This statement was intended to apply not only to wheat but also to all other commodities and projects.

7. We should be grateful for your assistance in ensuring that the Indians send us the best qualified people available to discuss this matter. I would suggest that you might take up this matter informally with Sir Chintaman Deshmukh and ask him if he would send one of his own really good officials or someone experienced in international negotiations from the Reserve Bank. Since we are now ready to move forward into the next and more detailed stage, we think you could say that we would welcome the opening of discussions at the earliest date convenient to them.

COLOMBO PLAN AID TO PAKISTAN

Yesterday Mohammed Ali called on us to discuss the list of items set forth in the memorandum forwarded to you under my letter No. E243 of March 27. Representatives of the Departments of Trade and Commerce and Finance were also present.

2. Mohammed Ali made the statement, with which we warmly agreed, that there would be considerable value to both sides in selecting projects which would bear a distinctive Canadian stamp such as the establishment of the proposed Central Agricultural Engineering Organization rather than consumer items which would quickly lose their identity. This did not mean, however, that either side would exclude the latter. We stressed that the acquisition of mere raw materials under the Plan should be avoided and they agreed.

3. We emphasized that there could be no assurance that the Plan would be continued from year to year and that, therefore, it was perhaps desirable that monies allocated this year should be spent either on projects which could be entirely completed or at least on complete stages of longer-term projects.

4. It was agreed that counterpart funds arising from the sale to private interests by the Pakistan Government of items acquired under the Plan should be used for further Colombo Plan expenditure.

5. We underlined the point made in our memorandum of March 27 that the financial projects suggested should be divided into two distinct parts, i.e., those which would be a purely government to government transaction (for example, public utilities) and those which would involve subsequent sale by the Pakistan Government to private interests (for example, pulp and paper mills). The latter would require special financing.

6. Mohammed Ali showed particular interest in the item geological survey (aerial mapping).

7. The next step will be discussion of these and any other items brought up by the Pakistanis with Said Hasan. At that time the over-all financial plan will also be discussed. We shall keep you informed.

FINANCIAL ARRANGEMENTS WITH INDIA AND PAKISTAN FOR COLOMBO PLAN

I attach a copy of our Telegram No. 54 of May 12th to Karachi. I approved this telegram at about 12:30 Saturday morning, having just received a release from Deutsch. Johnson in Karachi wanted the information urgently because Said Hasan, who is coming to Ottawa to discuss Colombo Plan arrangements, was to leave Karachi on Monday or Tuesday. However, in retrospect and despite the Saturday morning pressure, I think I should have checked the telegram with you before it went out.[32]

2. The telegram was in answer to an enquiry from Said Hasan. He wanted to know whether Canadian aid under the Colombo Plan was going to be in the form of grants or loans, whether "counterpart funds" would be set aside under certain circumstances, and what the terms of the loans (if any) would be.

3. Our reply said, in short, that counterpart funds could be expected (our Minister had already said so in the House of Commons) and that Canadian aid would take the form of grants or loans depending on the circumstances. Finally the terms of different loans might vary widely. The point that worries me is that I had no authority within this Department to say that some of the Canadian aid might be in the form of loans. I feel sure that the Minister has been thinking chiefly, if not solely, in terms of grants.[33]

4. I do not think that we should exclude the possibility of loans at this stage. The lists of possible capital developments appended to the Colombo Plan consist for the most part of general public works (roads and experimental farms) and also of public utilities (power plants and irrigation schemes). However they also include purely commercial enterprises (for example pulp and paper mills). It is very questionable to my mind whether the Canadian Government would want to provide India and Pakistan with a pulp and paper mill as a completely free gift. This is why I do not think we should at this stage exclude the possibility of loans. The financing of each individual project will have to be judged on its own merits.

5. In our discussions with the Department of Finance it became clear that in the field of loans they were not thinking of strict commercial terms at current rates of interest. They did feel, however, that some sort of a repayment feature or some sort of a nominal rate of interest might in certain cases act as a healthy break on the use of funds by the receiving countries. Further, it is somewhat questionable whether our pulp and paper industry would like to see the Canadian Government giving competitive equipment away freely to India and Pakistan.

6. I hope, therefore, that you will concur in the message that has been sent to Mr. Johnson. You will see from his reply which I attach (No. 74 of May 15th† from Karachi) that Said Hasan was a little disappointed that Canada was thinking of loans as well as grants. However, I think our position is reasonable.[34]

STATEMENT REGARDING COLOMBO PLAN FINANCING

Following is text of an interdepartmental memorandum on the subject of financial agreement under the Colombo Plan. You may hand a copy of the text of this statement to Ghulan Mohammed or convey the sense of it to him orally. Text begins:

1. It is envisaged that at the outset a master agreement will be signed which will set forth the general objectives and principles governing the provision and use of assistance provided by the Canadian Government, and which will incorporate general financial arrangements and procedures. There may also be special supplementary agreements to cover individual transactions in accordance with the indications contained in paragraphs 3 and 4 below.

2. The nature of the assistance and the programme of goods and services to be made available will take such a form as may be mutually agreed upon from time to time between the two governments.

3. On the financial side, it is the intention that Canada's assistance will be available on either a grant or loan basis, depending on the nature of each form of assistance and the end use to which it is to be put.

4. The terms and conditions of each sort of assistance would be a subject for agreement between the two governments.

(a) Grants. In certain cases, particularly in the case of any consumers goods supplied for direct distribution, it would appear desirable from the point of view of both governments to have counterpart funds set aside to be used for such purposes as may be mutually agreed upon. The procedure for the setting up and operation of counterpart accounts would be established in the master agreement. It is anticipated that the amounts to be credited to the counterpart accounts would be the rupee equivalent of the costs in Canada of goods supplied including any services in connection therewith, paid for from funds appropriated by the Canadian Government for Colombo Plan assistance; the rupee equivalent would be deposited by the recipient government in a special account upon notification of such costs by the Canadian Government.

(b) Loans. The terms and conditions of different loans might differ widely and would be related to the extent to which projects were directly revenue-producing, or of a commercial character, and their effects on the foreign exchange position. Ends.

Dear John [Deutsch]:

COLOMBO PLAN — FINANCIAL ARRANGEMENTS

Last week in your office we were discussing financial arrangements under the Colombo Plan and the officials present agreed that Canadian capital assistance under the Plan might take the form of either grants or loans.

2. Since that time I have been puzzling over the question as to how we should draw the line between the two forms of assistance, particularly having regard to the sensitivities and susceptibilities of the people with whom we are dealing and about whom we really know very little.

3. I was particularly interested therefore to read a discussion of the subject in a U.N. report which has just come out this week and of which I think that you, like myself, have an advance copy: "Measures for the Economic Development of Under-Developed Countries" — Report by a Group of Experts appointed by the Secretary-General of the United Nations.[35] For your convenience I attach a copy of two paragraphs from that report.

4. Paragraph 276 sets out the purposes that "should be considered eligible for grants". However, reading the two paragraphs together, I would gather than under some circumstances the items listed might be financed to a small extent by loans. The line is not hard and fast. For instance while roads are considered eligible for grants they are also considered eligible in some circumstances for a loan on specially favourable terms. In general, however, it is my impression that the authors of the report intend that the items listed in paragraph 276 should be financed completely by grants unless there are special circumstances which make partial financing by loans appropriate.

5. Would you agree that the proposed division would be a useful guide to our actions? Would you further agree that it might be useful to refer to these two paragraphs in the report when discussing the matter with the Indians and Pakistanis?

COLOMBO PLAN FINANCING

I spoke to Ghulam Mohammed on May 20th about the interdepartmental memorandum. His comments were, in substance, as follows:

Beggars cannot be choosers. It is, therefore, not for him to state upon what terms Canadian aid should be given. Speaking personally he said he was disappointed that we were thinking in terms of loans. His impression after the London meeting of the Consultative Committee was that the government aid would be on a grant basis.

Dear Wynne [Plumptre]:

COLOMBO PLAN — FINANCIAL ARRANGEMENTS

I have copy of your note of May 17 to John Deutsch, quoting Paragraph 276 of "Measures for the Economic Development of Under-Developed Countries", and asking for my comments as to whether or not the Paragraph in question might be a useful guide to our own actions in deciding where a grant should be made, or where we might be better advised to suggest a loan.

I have not as yet received a copy of the report in question and I am just not quite clear in my own mind as to why the United Nations would themselves be interested in the making of grants or loans for the economic development of Under-Developed Countries. I have been under the impression that the United Nations and its various agencies were confining themselves largely to what one might term in its broadest sense — technical assistance — and if I am correct in this, capital equipment would not be involved.

However, in trying to develop a set of principles to guide us in the making of grants or loans, I think we should keep constantly in mind that the whole economic development plan for South and South East Asia is supposed to be a cooperative effort. I think we should endeavour to follow some of the methods adopted and aim at the objective set by the Economic Cooperation Administration in Washington. The latter has tried to keep constantly in mind projects that benefit a country economically and in the shortest possible time.

I feel that the success of E.C.A. can be attributed in no small measure to the use of the counterpart funds, and I hope that in carrying out the six-year programme under the Colombo Plan for the Economic Development of the Countries of South and South-East Asia, we will endeavour to see that counterpart funds are established at every opportunity.[36]

In the making of grants, we are in a position to talk counterpart funds, but it is questionable whether in the making of loans we would have much right to insist on the setting up of counterpart funds.

Paragraph 276(a) dealing with research and education covers a very large field where the chief items required are likely to be commodities or services obtainable locally, and which should, therefore, be met by local currency. In other words, many of the items mentioned under research and education might prove suitable for the use of counterpart funds. I question if they are of a kind of project which would require any extensive purchase of capital equipment in Canada. To the extent, however, that capital equipment would be required to equip any of the schools, then, of course, such capital equipment should, in my opinion, be eligible by means of grants rather than obtainable by means of a loan. In fact, I believe one of the suggestions we made to India included assistance in the establishing of experimental farms, or the equipping of an organization to handle agricultural machinery. Incidentally, Paragraph 276(a) also overlaps into the Technical Assistance Programme where it refers to the training of technicians abroad.

Paragraph 276(b) is also very broad in its meaning and I have a feeling that many of the items that might come under this paragraph could be met out of counterpart funds or under the Technical Assistance Plan.

I will leave comments on Paragraph 276(c) to John Deutsch.

Under paragraph 276(d) the projects listed thereunder might very well be the subject of grants, provided, and only to the extent, that capital equipment is purchased in Canada to carry out these projects. I think we should not lose sight of the fact that the Economic Development Plan for South and South-East Asia was supposed to provide a means whereby these under-developed countries could obtain the much desired capital equipment necessary to carry out their programmes, and which they were unable to carry out because they lacked the dollars with which to purchase the necessary machinery.

Some items in 276(d) might easily have the result of relieving a State from a normal current expenditure. I doubt if we would be agreeable to any project that would have the effect of helping a country to meet current costs of running the country.

Answering now your question as to whether or not paragraphs 276 and 277 could serve as a rough guide for us in our conversations with the Indians and Pakistanis, I frankly doubt if they would serve this purpose. I am inclined to the view that each project should be considered on its own merits. There are, after all, not going to be so very many projects, and we will gradually make our own principles as we move along. I think our objective should be in line with that of E.C.A. and that we are on safer ground if we keep in mind the principles which guide that administration in making grants and loans.[37]

Yours faithfully,
G.R. HEASMAN

Your telegrams Nos. 74† and 81 concerning Colombo Plan financing.

While preference of recipient country for grants rather than loans is understandable the following points appear pertinent in connection with reaction reported in your messages to provision in certain cases for loans in interdepartmental memorandum quoted in our telegram No. 54.

(a) In response to general hypothetical questions put forward by Pakistanis, interdepartmental memorandum indicates general approach to Colombo financing. Key to form of Canadian aid will be nature of actual projects undertaken. In absence of such information it cannot be assumed that grants would be automatically forthcoming for all possible projects. As Para. 4(b) indicated the terms and conditions of

[37] Note marginale :/Marginal note:
Mr Wright Could you look through ECA reports or other material and give me a report on the use of loans by ECA? I believe the original intention was to use them extensively, but this never worked out. In the end, what sort of loans were made, and about what proportion of the total? [A.F.W. Plumptre] different loans might differ widely but clearly they would always have to be in harmony with the fundamental purposes of the Colombo Plan.

(b) The form of the aid in the first instance and the terms and conditions of any loans would both be determined by mutual agreement.

(c) The provision of loans as well as grants would definitely appear not inconsistent with Colombo Plan report or minutes of London meetings last Autumn.

(d) Similarly new U.N. report "Measures for the Economic Development of Under-developed Countries" recommends the division of intergovernmental aid into grants and loans according to its purposes.

In view of these considerations which you should explain to the Pakistani authorities, it is our hope that the Government of Pakistan would readily accept and indeed welcome loans in certain circumstances under Colombo Plan.

COLOMBO PLAN FINANCING

I called on Mr. Ghulam Mohammed this morning to discuss the substance of your telegram. He gave me a friendly and cordial hearing. He acknowledged your approach to Colombo plan finance was logical but at the same time though he did not give reason he thought his feeling of disappointment over interdepartmental memorandum was justified.

2. We both agreed that we could not make further progress. The next step would be for Pakistani officials to visit Ottawa. They would be able to tell Canadian officials the project in respect of which Pakistan would like to receive Canadian aid. Our officials would be able to tell them whether aid in respect of a particular project would be on a grant or loan basis. If there was initial disagreement between Pakistan's officials and our officials, Mr. Ghulam Mohammed was hopeful that difficulties be ironed in friendly discussion.

3. The visit of Pakistani officials to Ottawa is delayed because difficulties of getting ready for talks with International Bank in Washington. Mr. Ghulam Mohammed hopes to be able to tell me in a few days when delegation will leave Karachi and when they will reach Ottawa. He said Mr. Said Hasan would probably head delegation.

COLOMBO PLAN FINANCING

Thank you for your telegram under reference reporting on your conversation with Mr. Ghulam Mohammed about the substance of our telegram No. 60 of May 30th.

2. We agree that the forthcoming official discussions in Ottawa will provide the best means of achieving mutual agreement about the form of the Canadian contribution and the selection of individual projects.

3. Mr. Plumptre had a talk with Mr. Mohammed Ali on June 7th about Colombo Plan developments. He said that we had received an enquiry through you from the Pakistan Authorities asking if Canadian aid would be in the form of grants or loans and if the latter, what would be the terms and rate of interest. Mr. Plumptre explained that in reply to this enquiry we had sent you an interdepartmental memorandum (our telegram No. 54 of May 12), a copy of which he handed to Mohammed Ali. Mr. Plumptre pointed out that our reply consisted of hypothetical answers to hypothetical questions. In our view it was difficult to discuss these questions apart from specific projects. For some purposes grants would clearly be made; for others loans would be more appropriate. To take extreme examples, wheat would be supplied on a grant basis, while the construction of a privately owned paper mill would be financed by a loan. Mr. Plumptre emphasized, however, that we had not the slightest intention of trying to drive a hard bargain over the form of Canadian aid. That was not our feeling or attitude at all. The terms and conditions of loans would not be onerous; they would be designed to enable a recipient country to meet interest and capital payments without undue difficulty.

4. Though Mr. Plumptre did not say so to Mohammed Ali, the primary reason for the inclusion of the loan concept in our thinking is to increase the recipient country's share of responsibility in development projects. It is obviously highly important that Colombo Plan funds should be used efficiently for useful and economically sound projects. The extension of loans, in appropriate cases, rather than grants would give the recipient country a heightened interest in ensuring that the projects to be undertaken were economically sound from their own point of view. Some interesting information on U.S. policies and experience in regard to the extension of economic assistance was contained in WA-2499 of June 12,† a copy of which was referred to your Mission.

5. Mr. Plumptre explained the purpose and value of counterpart funds. In this connection I am enclosing an interesting extract on counterpart funds taken from pages 48 and 49 of Mr. Paul Hoffman's book Peace Can Be Won.[38]

6. The forthcoming discussions with officials from India and Pakistan were recently given consideration by the Interdepartmental Committee on External Trade Policy and it was agreed that the form of the Canadian contribution should be

Note du chef de la Direction économique
Memorandum by Head, Economic Division

[Ottawa], June 25, 1951

For Mr. A.J. Pick:

COLOMBO PLAN — POLITICAL PURPOSES OF CANADIAN PARTICIPATION

I had a very interesting talk with Bryce on this subject this morning.[39] He in turn had been talking to Deutsch and Wolfson about it and had rather got the impression that they regarded Canadian participation in the Colombo Plan as an economic enterprise with the emphasis on the actual economic results in India and Pakistan rather than an emphasis on the political advantages to Canada which was putting up the money. I said I thought our Department was aware of the essentially political nature of the operation and believed that Deutsch felt the same, although I was not so sure about Wolfson. In any case our Department, from the Under-Secretary down, was aware of the importance that we should give guidance and leadership.

2. While putting up this defence against Bryce's charges I was nevertheless very interested in some of the specific suggestions he threw out. For instance he asked such questions as the following:

How far were we merely trying to convince the Indian Government, or the Indian bureaucracy, of Canada's interest in them, and how far were we trying to go beyond the Government bureaucracy to persuade (a) Provincial Governments and (b) the public of our interest? Bryce noted the fact that the new Indian High Commissioner had not bothered to sit in on our current meetings, leaving the matter to Banerjee. He thought this was a great mistake (although I explained the circumstances.) Had we thought of increasing our publicity in India? Was our Information Division on the job? Were the Department's increased expenditures on information abroad likely to be channelled in this direction? Was the Film Board going to be used?

3. We might have a talk about these matters some day very soon.[40]

COLOMBO PLAN DISCUSSIONS HELD IN OTTAWA JUNE 21ST TO 28TH

I enclose herewith a copy of a letter and enclosures dated July 23rd to the High Commissioner for India in Ottawa following up the Colombo Plan discussions with Mr. Sundaresan held from June 21st to 28th. The enclosures consist of minutes of the initial and final meetings. Numerous documents relating to the discussions are attached as annexes to the minutes of the June 28th meeting.

2. This documentation gives a fairly detailed picture of what transpired at the meetings. The discussions were cordial and useful but did not really go beyond the exploratory stage. A good deal more information, both general and specific, about individual projects is now needed. Basically we wish to be as sure as possible that any material or equipment supplied for capital development is put to good use within a reasonable period of its receipt. In the present tight supply situation in Canada we cannot afford to produce, say, a generator which might not be used for many months after its arrival in India because the project for which it was designed has fallen behind schedule, or because its whole future is obscure.

3. We, therefore, wish to know the degree of commitment by the Indian Government to any given project, as well as to obtain an assessment of the project's relative importance and urgency. We want to supply first the things which are needed first and which will be put to effective use. To do so we need information, not only on the stage reached in any project and its prospects for completion, but also on whether it is well conceived, sound economically and will, in fact, fulfil the purpose for which it is intended. Section VI of the minutes of June 28th gives additional information about our position in this general connection.

4. As the minutes indicate the hydro-electric power projects proposed in the Indian list emerged as the most promising of the suggestions which were discussed. These projects are shown as Nos. 3, 5, 6, and 7 in the list given in Annex C† to the June 28th minutes. Preliminary examination indicated that the Umtru project is perhaps the most acceptable from our point of view. A list of questions on the Umtru and Hirakund projects is attached as Annex D.† However, additional information along the lines already indicated is required for all these hydro-electric projects.

5. The Indians have undertaken to supply us with some additional information but we also wish to enlist your help in order to obtain the most unbiased and balanced appraisal possible. This will be, of course, a difficult and delicate task. It is also, however, a very important one. It has been agreed here, by the Department of Trade and Commerce and the other Departments concerned, that it might be useful if Mr. R.F. Renwick, our Commercial Secretary at Bombay, could visit those of the projects referred to in paragraph 4 which have already been undertaken in order to obtain, as far as possible, the answers to the questions which we have in mind.

6. Complementary information on the place of each of the four projects in overall plans, its reputation and its significance in the eyes of the Indians, should be obtained in New Delhi. We want, of course, an independent and rounded appraisal. In this connection we assume that different views on the same project may be held in different quarters in the Indian Government. The Indians know that we may be asking you to assist us in obtaining the information required. We wish, of course, to leave it to you to judge how far it is wise to go, in view of all the considerations involved, in attempting to arrive at the most realistic possible appraisal of any given project.

7. The sooner we can obtain this information the better are the chances of using funds during the present fiscal year for development projects, rather than foodstuffs or raw materials. In this general connection we would like to have an appreciation of the significance of the projects under investigation insofar as they may be expected to provide tangible and enduring evidence of Canadian interest in Indian welfare.

8. You will gather from the minutes that the question of loans and grants was discussed fully. The following points are fundamental to our position in this regard:

(a) Whether a specific project is appropriate for loans will depend on the extent to which it is self-financing, on its effects on the foreign exchange position of India, and in a multi-purpose scheme on whether there are, for instance, significant sales of power for non-irrigation purposes. Loans would not be made with any idea of deriving commercial advantage on our part.

(b) Loans would, however, give the recipient a greater share in the responsibility for and the sound management of a project.

(c) We wish to avoid giving grants for the same sort of projects that might be eligible for loans from the International Bank or Export Import Bank.

(d) The recent U.N. report on the economic development of under-developed countries recommended the division of inter-governmental assistance into loans and grants according to the same sort of criteria that we have in mind.

(e) The United States Government has formulated a similar division between grants and loans.

(f) Finally, even with the best of good-will the Canadian Government clearly does not wish to become regarded as a source of free funds for the establishment of even quasi-commercial enterprises in Asia or anywhere else. It is important for the recipient countries to know that it is not easy for the Canadian Government to finance, probably by means of outright grants, the construction of roads, harbours and irrigation systems in Asia, when such undertakings are put off year after year in Canada for lack of funds. When it comes to setting up commercial enterprises which might perhaps produce competitive exports or reduce imports it should be borne in mind that the Government does not make a gift of capital equipment to would-be Canadian manufacturers and exporters.

9. The existence of these factors should not be taken as a reflection on our support for the Colombo Plan. On the contrary we want to make sure so far as Canada is concerned that the Plan moves forward on a realistic and sound basis and that Canadian assistance is used as effectively as possible. The importance of doing so in relation to the prospects for support for the Plan in future years is obvious.

10. Your Mission will have received a copy of a letter from Trade and Commerce to Mr. Renwick advising him that he might be asked to visit some of the projects which were discussed at the meetings here. We would be grateful if you would now make the necessary arrangements with Mr. Renwick so that he may visit those of the hydro-electric projects which you both consider could be usefully investigated on the spot. The coordination and timing of Mr. Renwick's investigation with the general approach to the Indian authorities in New Delhi are matters for your decision. You may, of course, consider it desirable for Mr. Renwick to assist in obtaining the general information about the projects which we hope can be secured in New Delhi.

Le sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures au haut-commissaire de l'Inde

Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to High Commissioner of India

Ottawa, July 23, 1951

Dear Mr. Saksena:

I am enclosing, herewith, three copies of the minutes, in final form of the initial and final Colombo Plan meetings held with Mr. Sundaresan and representatives of your office. Numerous documents relating to the discussions are attached as annexes to the minutes of the June 28th meeting.

The minutes are intended to cover the main features of the discussions with regard to the financial arrangements for the use of Canadian assistance, the specific projects under consideration, and the supply position in Canada. Some parts of the discussion summarizing the position reached at the close of the meetings are referred to below for convenience.

Towards the end of the discussions Mr. Plumptre said that circumstances might be such as to cause this year's programme to consist mainly of foodstuffs and materials and that the balancing item might, therefore, be the purchase, out of the Canadian contribution, of wheat supplied under the International Wheat Agreement or otherwise. The order of priority for Canadian aid should, however, remain — capital development first, then foodstuffs and finally raw materials.

Mr. Plumptre went on to say that it was necessary to determine now (a) the status of specific projects, their nature, progress and prospects, and the urgency of one against another, and (b) the supply position in Canada in relation to what was needed in order to complete or undertake individual projects.

Earlier in the discussion on June 28th Mr. Deutsch mentioned some questions which indicate the sort of information needed about particular projects. What stage had been reached in the project? How far was it from completion? Where did it fit into the over-all plans for development? How urgent was it? How did it compare in urgency with other projects?

Mr. Deutsch said that by and large the Canadian economy was fully employed and a special effort which the Canadian authorities were prepared to make would be necessary to meet development needs under the Colombo Plan. However, the production, for example, of a generator which might not be put to use for two or three years could not be afforded at this time. The things that were needed first should be produced first. When more information on individual projects together with specifications was received it would be possible to determine definitely if and when the requirements could be supplied. This information would also enable us in our examination of these projects to determine where loans are applicable and where grants are appropriate.

The Canadian authorities, Mr. Deutsch continued, were definitely interested in making available the things needed for development projects and were prepared to work with the Indian authorities in order to secure the information required. In this connection assistance could be sought from the Office of the Canadian High Commissioner in New Delhi.

Mr. Sundaresan indicated at the conclusion of the discussions that the Indian authorities would furnish the Canadian authorities with as much information as possible on individual projects. In view of our mutual aim to reach agreement as quickly as possible on development projects to receive Canadian assistance, we are looking forward to receiving the needed information from the Indian authorities as soon as possible. We are, as you know, looking into the matter which you raised on July 11th of supplying railway equipment to India under the Colombo Plan.

Yours sincerely,

Procès-verbal d'une réunion avec les représentants de l'Inde

Minutes of Meeting with Representatives of India

RESTRICTED [Ottawa], June 21, 1951

COLOMBO PLAN

Present:

Mr. A.F.W. Plumptre, Department of External Affairs, (Chairman).
Mr. N. Sundaresan, Deputy Governor of the Reserve Bank of India.
Mr. P.K. Banerjee, Office of the High Commissioner for India.
Mr. G.R. Heasman, Department of Trade and Commerce.
Mr. J.J. Deutsch, Department of Finance.
Mr. H.L. Wolfson, Department of Finance.
Mr. C.L. Read, Department of Finance.
Mr. W.E. Scott, Bank of Canada.
Mr. A.J. Pick, Department of External Affairs.
Mr. H.H. Wright, Department of External Affairs, (Secretary).

1. The Chairman after introducing the Canadian officials and indicating the division of responsibility between the Departments primarily concerned with the Colombo Plan, suggested that the proposed master agreement should be discussed.

2. Mr. Plumptre said that a general plan for financial agreement was outlined in the draft text of the master agreement. Under it individual financial agreements would be concluded for specific projects. The master agreement had been drawn up in reply to an enquiry received from the Pakistanian Authorities asking if Canadian aid would be in the form of grants or loans, if loans were included what the rate of interest would be and if counterpart funds would be required. Provision in the master agreement for loans had not been included with any fixed ideas in regard to rates of interest, repayment or other conditions.

3. Mr. Sundaresan noted that preparation of the draft master agreement had been related to an enquiry from Pakistan. Broadly speaking there did not appear to be objection to the draft agreement which seemed flexible.

II. COUNTERPART FUNDS

4. Mr. Sundaresan said as regards grants, the Indian Authorities had, themselves, intended to set up rupee counterpart funds. The draft agreement raised, however, some important questions of procedure. The Indian Government maintained comprehensive economic controls and did not wish to take any steps which might have inflationary implications. The timing, therefore, of the establishment of counterpart funds was important. The draft master agreement suggested that counterpart funds be set up immediately upon notification being given of Canadian expenditure having been incurred. It might be better to defer setting up a counterpart fund until rupees started to accrue from the sale in India of the goods made available by grants. The Indian Government wished to spend the aid wisely and also avoid increasing inflationary pressures. What exactly was contemplated in the way of counterpart funds? What statements should be prepared; in what form and when should they be submitted?

5. Mr. Deutsch said it was contemplated that where grants were concerned, counterpart rupee accounts would be established in India equivalent in value to the costs in dollars incurred by the Canadian Government. The prices at which such goods are distributed in India would be no concern of the Canadian Government. Whether $5 million worth of wheat is sold in India for the equivalent of say $4 million or $6 million is a matter solely for the Indian Government. In each case the counterpart fund would be credited with the rupee equivalent of the costs to the Canadian Government, in this instance $5 million.

Details regarding the actual establishment of such counterpart funds and the use thereof could be worked out when specific grants are extended. These arrangements could be flexible and take into consideration a problem which Mr. Sundaresan had mentioned, namely the desire of the Indian Government to create the counterpart funds simultaneous with the receipt of the proceeds of such consumer goods as they might have received for sale in India.

The Colombo Plan was designed to assist capital development. If, therefore, external financial aid was used to supply consumer's goods in the first instance, an equivalent amount in local currency must ultimately be reflected in economic development programmes rather than consumption.

6. Mr. Sundaresan said that for the present, he had no comments to offer and expressed the view that it was important that the Master Plan should not be too rigid.

III. LOANS

7. Mr. Sundaresan said the Indians were under the impression that the aid would be in the form of grants and that the introduction of loans under the Colombo Plan would complicate India's external financial arrangements. India was already obligated to the World Bank and might be securing additional outside assistance from the Export-Import Bank. Intergovernmental loans appeared to be outside the ambit of the Colombo Plan. They were unwise politically and might create the wrong impression if they became associated with the Canadian contribution at the beginning of the Colombo Plan.

8. Mr. Deutsch explained that the matter of loans was not approached from any rigid point of view. The connection between possible Colombo Plan loans and India's relations with the International Bank and Export-Import Bank was appreciated. There was no intention whatever of pressing loans on the Indian Government and it had never been contemplated that a predetermined proportion of the Canadian contribution to India would be used for loans. The form of the aid was a matter for mutual agreement and would depend on the nature of the project to be undertaken. Some projects would be eligible for grants and others for loans. To take extreme examples for the sake of illustration; wheat would obviously be made available on a grant basis, whereas a newsprint mill would be eligible for a loan. The form of aid for projects which fall in between the clearly defined extremes would be approached on an individual basis and would be a matter for mutual agreement. If it proved difficult to reach agreement on the method of financing any particular project, then another project could be taken up which provided a better basis for mutual agreement. It was possible that all projects selected would be eligible for grants and that no loans would be extended this year.

9. Mr. Sundaresan asked how much of the total Canadian contribution of $25 million for the first year of the Plan was expected to be used for assistance to India.

Mr. Deutsch replied that the Canadian contribution to India for the fiscal year 1951-52 was expected to be in the order of $15 million.

10. Mr. Sundaresan questioned if both loans and grants could be included in the same vote in parliamentary estimates and asked how long funds voted in either form would remain available to the Government of India.

Mr. Deutsch explained that the vote for the Colombo Plan contribution was worded to cover both grants and loans. It would, therefore, be possible for Parliament to approve of either form of assistance.

As Mr. Sundaresan knew all government expenditures proposed for each fiscal year had to be approved by Parliament. Unused funds automatically lapsed at the end of a fiscal year with the vote appropriating them. In the case of an undertaking such as the Colombo Plan there would, however, be a presumption that unexpended funds ear-marked for a project would be re-voted. But anything might happen and no guarantee could be given that unspent money for grants would be carried over from one fiscal year to the next. This was, however, only true of contributions made as grants. In the case of loans, the funds voted could be set aside in a bank account in the name of the Government of India and would be available on the basis of mutual agreement between the Governments of India and Canada in accordance with the terms and conditions of the loan agreement.

11. Mr. Wolfson pointed out that the inclusion of loans under the master agreement broadened the list of projects which could be undertaken with Canadian aid. One of the criteria for loan financing would be the effect, direct and indirect, of the proposed project on the foreign exchange position of the recipient country. It was intended that the servicing of any loans extended would not be burdensome. Their object was to have a beneficial effect on the economy due regard being had to the country's existing external obligations.

12. The Chairman said that two points should be made clear. First, the inclusion of loans was intended to expand the scope of the possible uses of the Canadian contribution. Secondly, there was no intention of dividing the amount of the Canadian contribution between grants and loans; the Canadian authorities would be quite satisfied if the list of projects agreed for Colombo Plan support from Canada were made up entirely of those which they considered eligible for grants.

13. Mr. Sundaresan asked what types of undertaking would qualify for grants and what would be eligible for loans.

14. Mr. Deutsch replied that the nature of each project would be the deciding factor but that there were certain broad criteria regarding the types of undertakings which would be eligible for each form of assistance.

Consumer goods for direct distribution such as food stuffs and clothing would qualify for grants. General development of a basic character in the fields of health, education, agriculture and construction with little or no revenue producing aspect but which would add to the general productivity and welfare would also qualify for grants.

Projects which in themselves were expected to be financially self-supporting or which had favourable foreign exchange implications would be eligible for loans.

15. Mr. Sundaresan indicated that he would not expect the assistance to be extended other than on a mutually satisfactory basis.

It was agreed that a preamble to the master agreement should be drafted to give expression to the spirit of amity and the will to co-operate which lie behind the Colombo Plan.

COLOMBO PLAN

Present:

Mr. A.F.W. Plumptre, Department of External Affairs, (Chairman).
Mr. N. Sundaresan, Deputy Governor of the Reserve Bank of India.
Mr. D.R. Kawatra, Office of the High Commissioner for India.
Mr. G.R. Heasman, Department of Trade and Commerce.
Mr. J.J. Deutsch, Department of Finance.
Mr. H.L. Wolfson, Department of Finance.
Mr. C.L. Read, Department of Finance.
Mr. W.E. Scott, Bank of Canada.
Mr. A.J. Pick, Department of External Affairs.
Mr. A.G.S. Griffin, Department of External Affairs.
Mr. H.H. Wright, Department of External Affairs, (Secretary).

I. PUBLICITY

The Chairman suggested that similar press releases should be issued in Ottawa and New Delhi at the conclusion of the discussions.

1. It was agreed that a press release would be issued in Ottawa on Friday, June 29th, and that a similar statement would be issued in India. (A copy of the Canadian press release† is attached).

II. DRAFT MASTER AGREEMENT

The Chairman distributed for discussion a redrafted text of the master agreement. (A copy of the text as distributed is attached as Annex A. The final draft as it emerged from the meeting is attached as Annex B.)

2. Mr. Sundaresan enquired about the significance of the words "sold or otherwise distributed by the Indian Government" in the first sentence of paragraph 3(a) which before revision read as follows:

"(a) Grants: In any specific programme under which goods financed by grants from the Canadian Government are sold or otherwise distributed by Indian Government "counterpart funds" will normally be set aside."

3. Mr. Sundaresan asked what the position would be under the wording in respect of counterpart funds if the Indian Government should make a gift to a state government of goods from Canada. In such a case it had appeared from previous discussions that counterpart funds might not be required.

4. Mr. Plumptre said that the word "distributed" was intended to make it clear where grants were concerned that the prices at which goods were distributed on the Indian market was no concern of the Canadian Government.

5. It was agreed after discussion that the phrase in question should be changed to read "sold or otherwise distributed to the Indian public". It was further agreed that the word "public" should be interpreted to include individuals, corporations and municipalities.

6. Mr. Sundaresan enquired if freight charges on goods shipped under the Plan would be paid out of the Canadian contribution.

7. Mr. Deutsch said that freight charges might possibly be paid out of the Canadian contribution. If that were done the funds available for development would, of course, be reduced by the amount of the freight charges. The rupee equivalent of the amount paid out of the contribution for the shipment of goods from a Canadian port to the port of arrival in India would be deposited in the counterpart fund. Canadian foreign exchange controls would bar the use of Canadian dollars to pay freight charges in U.S. dollars.

8. Mr. Sundaresan suggested that the Comptroller and Auditor General of India should supply a certificate from time to time in connection with the counterpart accounts.

9. Accordingly it was agreed that the last sentence of paragraph 3(a) should be split into two sentences to read as follows: "The Government of India will from time to time report to the Government of Canada the position of this account and will supply a certificate from the Comptroller and Auditor General of India in this regard. The two governments will from time to time agree on the economic development projects in India to be financed from this account".

10. It was also agreed that other verbal changes should be made which are incorporated in Annex B.

III. MINUTES OF THE FIRST MEETING

11. The Chairman explained that the minutes of the first meeting were intended to cover only the salient points of the discussion. He invited Mr. Sundaresan to submit any revisions that should be made in the record of his remarks and also asked for other comments on the minutes.

12. Mr. Sundaresan expressed doubts about the impression which would be given by the wording, particularly the expression "commercial character", used in the last sentence of paragraph 14 which before revision read: "Projects of a commercial character which were expected to produce revenue and which had favourable foreign exchange implications would be eligible for loans".

He said that the political objectives of the Colombo Plan should be kept to the forefront and that initial projects should be undertaken on a basis that would avoid the possibility of misunderstanding in India. Economic development made possible by aid should not be held in check by restrictive terms.

13. Mr. Deutsch referring to the wording in question said there might be some cases where the commercial aspect of a project would be incidental to its main purpose. For example, where the dominating purpose of a hydro-electric development was to lift water either for irrigation, flood control or to raise agricultural capacity, there might be an incidental sale of electricity. In such a case the project might qualify for a grant. If, however, the dominating purpose of a hydro-electric development was to produce electricity to be sold commercially, the project would be eligible for a loan rather than a grant.

14. It was agreed after discussion that the wording in question should be changed to read: "Projects which in themselves were expected to be financially self-supporting or which had favourable foreign exchange implications would be eligible for loans".

It was further agreed that the third sentence in paragraph 14 should be amplified to read: "General development of a basic character in the fields of health, education, agriculture and construction with little or no revenue producing aspect but which would add to the general productivity and welfare would also qualify for grants." This sentence originally read as follows: "General development of a basic character in the fields of health, agriculture and construction with no revenue producing aspect but which would add to the general productivity would also qualify for grants."

15. Mr. Sundaresan asked if some of the Canadian dollars from the contribution could be used to make purchases outside Canada in order to complete a development project.

16. Mr. Deutsch replied that it had not been contemplated that Canadian aid under the plan would be spent in other countries. But in certain circumstances, that eventually would not be ruled out. The Canadian Authorities would be prepared to give consideration to the expenditure outside Canada of a relatively small amount from the Canadian contribution in order to complete an essentially Canadian project.

IV. REPORT ON PROJECTS

17. Mr. Plumptre said he would comment very briefly and in general terms on the Canadian attitude with regard to the projects which had been under discussion. They fell into six classes;

(i) Education. It was, of course, for the Indian Authorities to determine the character of future developments in this field but assistance for education headed the list in the Canadian view.

(ii) Irrigation and Power. Proposals in this field were definitely of interest. Additional information on the projects which had been discussed was, however, needed before further progress was possible. This additional information in regard to particular projects should include (a) general progress and prospects (b) specifications and material requirements.

(iii) Pulp and Paper Mill, Madhya Pradesh. Certain misgivings were felt in regard to both the supply and commercial aspects of this project.

(iv) Motor Transport. No Comment. Mr. Heasman would deal with this item.

(v) Food stuffs, and

(vi) Industrial materials.

As between the last two items the Canadian Authorities would prefer to supply food stuffs which would go direct to the people of India.

If items (iii) and (iv) were put at the bottom of the list the classes would appear in order of priority.

18. Mr. Heasman said he would review briefly the position with respect to individual projects. As a result of the discussions the items "small wooden fishing trawlers and tugs" and "cement plant" had definitely been ruled out of the Canadian list and "motor transports" would probably be discarded. The remaining projects in the Canadian list were included in the Indian list and he would comment on that list. (Copies of both lists are attached as Annex C).

Project 1—Western and Eastern Higher Technical Institutes.

Should the Indian Authorities consider at some future date that the time had come to proceed with Western Technical Institute, the project would be of interest. Without specific additional information it was impossible to say whether the needed equipment could be procured in Canada. Among the questions asked by the Canadian technicians were the following: What types of machine tools were required? Had any of the equipment been ordered? What standards were to be adopted, U.S. or U.K.?

Project 2—National Newsprint and Paper Mills, Madhya Pradesh.

Much fuller information was needed on whole position in respect of this project before consideration could be given to the question of assistance. This information should include specifications of the machinery needed and a clear indication of the prospects for the successful completion and operation of the project. As a commercial enterprise this project would not appear to qualify for a grant.

Project 3—Transmission Lines, Tower Testing equipment, transformers and pumping sets for Hirakund Project.
and
Project 6—Hydroelectric Plan for Umtru Hydroelectric Project, Assam.

The attached list (Annex D) of questions concerning these two projects was submitted to Mr. Sundaresan. Of the hydroelectric power developments under discussion the Umtru Project appeared to be of the greatest interest from the Canadian point of view.

Project 4—Laboratory outfit for hydraulic tests for Central Waterpower Irrigation and Navigation Research Station, Poona.

It was difficult to know what might be obtainable in Canada for this project without further details. There was little research work done in Canada in this field and the technicians here were puzzled about the nature and purpose of the project.

19. Mr. Wolfson enquired if the Indian Authorities contemplated developing less advanced training schools and demonstration units in agriculture and mechanics. He expressed the view that educational assistance would be most effective if it were less advanced in character. In agriculture, the widest possible dissemination of skills and methods that could be absorbed at the prevailing level should be given a very high priority among the possible uses for aid.

Project 5—Power Plan for Tungabhadra Power Project, Hyderabad side.
and
Project 7—Mayarakshi Dam Project.

20 Mr. Heasman advised that both these projects are possible on the supply side. Very small units were required. Counterpart funds could be used for the construction of these projects. The questions pertaining to the Hirakund and Umtru projects were also generally applicable in these cases.

Project 8—Godavari North Canal Project.

No foreign exchange was required for this project which could be financed with counterpart funds.

V. MATERIALS AND MOTOR TRANSPORTS

Aluminum—High tension aluminum wire for hydroelectric transmission lines could probably be obtained.

Asbestos—A small quantity of asbestos might be made available. Its availability would depend on the use to which it was going to be put. Asbestos was not being used in Canada to make asbestos cement sheets and it would be difficult to justify supplies for India for that purpose. Asbestos was very scarce and any supplied to India would reduce the allocation to some other user.

Wheat—The position would be considered when the new Canadian crop came in.

Motor Transport—Perkins Diesel engines were required by the Bombay State Government. These were not manufactured in Canada. It was unlikely that the type of chassis required could be supplied. A much larger number of the special chassis than was required by the Bombay State Government would have to be ordered before their manufacture would be economically feasible. Gasoline trucks were, however, available.

VI. GENERAL POSITION

21. Mr. Deutsch said that without more information it was not possible to say what individual projects could be undertaken with Canadian assistance. The following questions indicated the sort of information needed about particular projects: what stage had been reached in the project? How far was it from completion?

Where did it fit into the over-all plans for development? How urgent was it? How did it compare in urgency with other projects?

By and large the Canadian economy was fully employed and a special effort which the Canadian Authorities were prepared to make would be necessary to meet development needs under the Colombo Plan. However, the production, for example, of a generator which might not be put to use for two or three years could not be afforded at this time. The things that were needed first should be produced first. When more information on individual projects together with specifications was received it would be possible to determine definitely if and when the requirements could be supplied.

The Canadian authorities were definitely interested in making available the things needed for development projects and were prepared to work with the Indian authorities in order to secure the information required. In this connection assistance could be sought from the Office of the Canadian High Commissioner in New Delhi.

At this stage two alternative methods of proceeding appeared to be open. Either, immediate action could be taken to secure the necessary bill of particulars, or, consideration could be given to using the contribution for the first year largely for wheat and other consumer goods. In the latter case the resulting counterpart funds would, of course, be available for development projects.

22. Mr. Sundaresan said he recognized the practical difficulties involved. However, he doubted at the rate governments worked, if the bill of particulars would be forthcoming in time to utilize funds from this year's contribution for development projects.

The position should be considered from the political point of view. The public might well fail to understand the reasons for the delay which might create an unfortunate impression.

23. Mr. Plumptre said that a large part of this year's contribution might have to take the form of food stuffs and materials. The objective, however, should be to minimize the amount of aid given in that form. The order of priority for Canadian aid should remain — capital development first, then food stuffs and finally raw materials.

It was necessary now, to determine (a) the status of specific projects, their progress and prospects and the urgency of one against another, and (b) the supply position in Canada in relation to what was needed in order to complete or undertake individual projects. It would, for instance, be useful to know if the Indian Authorities were planning to proceed with a particular project whether or not aid was forthcoming, as that would give an indication of its urgency.

For this year's programme the balancing item might well be wheat. Funds from the contribution which were not used to finance economic development or to supply materials or consumer goods would be available for the purchase of wheat supplied under the International Wheat Agreement or otherwise.

24. Mr. Sundaresan said that as much information as possible on individual projects should at the Indian end be put down on paper. A good deal of preparatory work could probably be done before a technician from India could usefully make the trip to Canada. They would, however, not hesitate to send a technician to Canada at the appropriate time.

25. The Chairman in his concluding remarks said that it had been a great pleasure for the Canadian officials concerned to know and work with Mr. Sundaresan and that they were hoping to have the opportunity of working with him again in the future.

Deuxième projet

Second Draft

[Ottawa], June 27, 1951

COLOMBO PLAN

MASTER AGREEMENT BETWEEN THE GOVERNMENT OF CANADA AND THE GOVERNMENT OF INDIA

Preamble

The Governments of Canada and India, together with other governments, took part in London in 1950 in drawing up the Colombo Plan for Co-operative Economic Development in South and South-East Asia. The Governments of Canada and India now desire to co-operate for their mutual benefit, and in particular for the achievement of the purposes of the Colombo Plan, by promoting the economic development of India. Therefore the Governments of Canada and India are now joining in this agreement which shall govern the general terms under which economic aid from Canada will be provided to India for the purposes of the Colombo Plan, and according to which supplementary agreements may be made to cover specific programmes.

Agreement

The Governments of Canada and India agree as follows:

1. All economic aid supplied under the Colombo Plan shall be subject to specific programmes of goods and services and these specific programmes shall be drawn up and agreed from time to time between the Government of Canada and the Government of India. Similarly, agreement will be reached on the methods of procurement and transfer.

2. In order that Canadian aid may cover various types of projects, various forms of financing may be used; in particular, Canadian aid will be available on either a grant or a loan basis, depending on the nature of each specific programme and the uses to which the goods and services supplied under it are put.

3. The particular terms and conditions of each specific programme will be a matter for agreement between the two governments, subject to the following general provisions:

(a) Grants: In any specific programmes under which goods financed by grants from the Canadian Government are sold or otherwise distributed by the Indian Government "counterpart funds" will normally be set aside. The Indian Government will set up a special account for these funds and will keep separate records of the amounts placed in the account in connection with each specific programme. It will pay into this account the rupee equivalent of the Canadian expenditures on all goods and services supplied under the Plan. The Government of India will from time to time report to the Government of Canada position of this fund and the two governments will agree on the economic development projects in India to be financed from it.

(b) Loans: For the specific programmes which are agreed to be appropriate for financing by means of loans the terms of the loans will be determined by the two governments. These terms will relate primarily to the commercial character of the particular project in question, to its anticipated earnings, and to its anticipated effects on the foreign exchange position of India.

DESPATCH E-532 Ottawa, July 24, 1951

CONFIDENTIAL

Reference: Your Telegram No. 110 dated July 10th.†

COLOMBO PLAN DISCUSSIONS HELD IN OTTAWA JULY 5TH AND 6TH 1951

Thank you for your reference telegram reporting on your conversation with Ikramullah about the Colombo talks here with Mohammed Ali, Said Hasan and Amjad Ali. These discussions held on July 5th and 6th consisted of two meetings of a preliminary and exploratory character and they are to be resumed on August 2nd. By then it is hoped that enough additional information will be available on possible projects and on the supply position in Canada to provide a basis for more definite progress. For convenient reference I am enclosing an additional copy† of the July 6th Press Release on the discussion which you will have already received.

2. The proposed master agreement on financial arrangements for Canadian aid to Pakistan was first discussed. The text of the master agreement which had been tentatively agreed on with the Indians was put forward as a basis for discussion (see Annex B of the enclosed minutes of the June 21st discussion with the Indians). The Pakistanis agreed to submit this text (amended, of course, to apply to Pakistan instead of India) to their Government.

3. As was perhaps to be expected the Pakistani group resisted the idea that any of the projects which might be selected might be financed by loans rather than grants. Our position in this connection is dealt with in a letter dated July 26th to Mohammed Ali following up the discussions, a copy of which is enclosed. This letter is intended to take the place of detailed minutes of these preliminary discussions with the Pakistanis. Additional information on our views on the question of the form of Canadian assistance, which are generally applicable to Pakistan, is contained in the attached documents arising out of the discussions with the Indians (see particularly the minutes of the June 21st discussion and the penultimate paragraph of the enclosed copy of a despatch dated July 23rd to our High Commissioner in New Delhi).

4. The first project put forward by the Pakistanis was the Mianwali hydro-electric project (serial 48 in their development programme). Upon making enquiries, after the discussions, we found that this was one of the Pakistani projects already under consideration by the International Bank. We do not wish our activities under the Colombo Plan to overlap or conflict with the policies or activities of the Bank. For example, we do not wish to finance with a grant the same sort of project for which the Bank might extend a loan. We, therefore, do not expect to give further consideration to the Mianwali project at the forthcoming meetings, although the Pakistanis do not, of course, yet know what position we will be taking in this regard. The discussion at the first meeting about other possible projects is covered in the enclosed notes† prepared by the Department of Trade and Commerce.

5. At the end of the first meeting the Pakistanis submitted the enclosed "List of Priority Items".† The supply position in Canada in regard to the items in this list is dealt with in another set of notes† prepared by the Department of Trade and Commerce, a copy of which is enclosed. These notes were used as the basis for the discussion of these items at the second and final exploratory meeting. It is expected that some of these items and, in addition, projects in the field of agriculture and education will be discussed when the meetings are resumed.

6. The kind of information we wish to obtain about possible projects is indicated quite fully in the enclosed despatch of July 23rd to New Delhi and Section VI of the enclosed minutes of the June 28th discussion with the Indians.

7. At this stage it would appear premature to ask you to carry out investigations like those we have requested our Mission in New Delhi to undertake. However, after the forthcoming meetings with the Pakistanis we may be asking you to obtain information about specific projects. In the meantime any suggestions and comments, or information which you may already have in relation to the recent or forthcoming discussions would, of course be welcomed.

Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

Ottawa, July 26, 1951

Dear Mr. Mohammed Ali:

The purpose of this letter is to confirm in writing the action that it was agreed should be taken, as far as possible, before the resumption in Ottawa on August 2nd of the recent Colombo Plan discussions with you and your colleagues. This letter may perhaps be regarded as a substitute for detailed minutes of the recent meetings.

2. We agree with the view expressed by Mr. Said Hasan that it is desirable for outside assistance under the Plan to be used when possible in a way that will show the people of the under-developed countries that their friends abroad want to help them. In our view assistance for capital development projects should have priority over the supplying of raw materials. However, during the first year, particularly, of the Plan there are certain factors which will inevitably influence the kind of aid which it will be possible to extend. Two main difficulties cannot be overlooked in connection with supplying industrial equipment for development projects.

3. First, there is the physical difficulty of procuring the needed industrial components. The Canadian Government is prepared to ask producers here to make special efforts to meet Colombo Plan orders. However, with the defence programme added to the existing demands on the economy it will undoubtedly be more difficult than previously anticipated to meet Colombo Plan requirements.

4. Secondly, the form of the assistance (grant or loan) for individual projects is a matter for mutual agreement and should, of course, be based on the most thorough possible examination of all the aspects of any particular project. The key to the form of assistance should be the nature of each project, and the question of whether a loan or a grant is appropriate can only be determined definitely on an individual basis.

5. There are, however, certain broad criteria indicating the types of undertakings which should be eligible for each form of assistance. Consumer goods for direct distribution would qualify for grants. General development of a basic character in the fields of health, education, and agriculture, with little or no revenue producing aspect but which would add to the general productivity and welfare, might also qualify for grants. Eligible for loans would be projects which were expected to be financially self-supporting or which had favourable foreign exchange implications. The terms and conditions of such loans might be quite liberal.

6. In accordance with the recent discussions we are looking forward to receiving, as soon as possible, as much additional information as can be supplied on the projects which were under discussion at the meetings. We will review the proposed projects in the light of all the available information and assess the supply situation in preparation for the renewed discussions.

7. In view, however, of present shortages in supply and the question of the appropriate form of assistance for each project, both of which apply particularly to industrial equipment, it appears that it would be useful if consideration were also given to projects in the fields of agriculture and education. In this sphere the supply situation will probably be less difficult and there is also a presumption, subject, of course, to detailed examination of individual projects, that most of the assistance extended could take the form of grants.

8. In regard to educational and agricultural projects there is an additional consideration which concerns counterpart funds. It is intended, as you know, that the establishment and use of counterpart funds should be a matter for discussion and agreement under the broad principles embodied in the master agreement. Their purpose is to ensure that outside assistance is ultimately reflected in economic development rather than consumption. Consequently, if grants in fields of agriculture and education were used for development of a basic character, counterpart funds might well be unnecessary. We would be glad to receive, as soon as possible, information about agricultural and educational projects which might be financed with Canadian assistance.

9. Finally, as you will recall, the remaining alternative suggested for the use of Canadian assistance this year was in the field of current imports. The financing, under the Plan, of part of Pakistan's current import requirements with Canadian assistance might be undertaken only if it were found impracticable to make other arrangements this year. Nevertheless, under this alternative Pakistan could, of course, use the resulting savings in her foreign exchange resources to finance development projects and in addition the accompanying counterpart funds would also be used for economic development.

10. In conclusion I would like to affirm our view that the recent cordial discussions have provided a good start for fruitful cooperation between Canada and Pakistan under the Colombo Plan. The Canadian officials concerned are looking with much pleasure to meeting again with you and your colleague Mr. Said Hasan and Mr. Amjad Ali.

Yours sincerely,
A.D.P. HEENEY

DESPATCH E-565 Ottawa, August 17, 1951

CONFIDENTIAL

COLOMBO PLAN — PAKISTAN

We have already cabled you the news that our talks with the Pakistani representatives, which were resumed on August 9 and 10, were brought to a most satisfactory conclusion. A happy atmosphere prevailed throughout the talks. Complete agreement was reached both on the text of a "Master Agreement" to be recommended to Ministers and a list of economic development projects, totalling $10,000,000 for similar recommendation. It was possible to reach preliminary agreement on methods of administration.

"Master Agreement"

2. We had a few purely verbal changes to suggest in the text that had been discussed and agreed previously. (The Pakistanis had received ministerial approval of it). Since the Pakistanis were here our Legal Division have suggested two purely formal improvements. A copy of the text which is now being recommended to ministers here is attached to this despatch. Will you please get final approval of this text from the Pakistanis. For your convenience I also attach (a) the text† as agreed while the Pakistanis were with us and (b) an agreement† with the United States which our Legal Division used as a model when suggesting their formal improvements.

3. This agreement is to be put into effect by an exchange of Notes in Karachi. I attach a draft Note† for your use in this connection. This is also being submitted to ministers.

4. While the "Master Agreement" provides, on the one hand, for the possibility of counterpart funds and, on the other hand, for the possibility of loans, neither of these provisions will become effective in relation to the list of projects which is now being recommended to ministers. All of these projects were in the end considered to be eligible for grants (although one was marginal) and, since none of the goods to be supplied from Canada are to be sold to the public in Pakistan, the question of counterpart funds does not arise.

Relations with the International Bank

5. Both the Pakistanis and ourselves had been in touch with the International Bank during their visit to North America. In our recent meetings we pointed out Canada did not wish in any way to compete with the International Bank in supplying economic assistance, particularly because of Canada's close association with and support of the Bank since its inception. The Pakistanis reminded us that the Bank's criteria of credit worthiness were not the same as criteria of need. Further, they were attempting to use the funds available from each of the various external sources (Bank, Colombo Plan, etc.) in the most appropriate way, having regard to what could best be bought with the money available. Some things might best be bought in Canada even though the Bank were willing to cover them by a loan. In the end, however, it was agreed that in any case where the Bank was willing to finance a project it was better for all concerned for the Canadian funds available to Pakistan to be conserved for other purposes. In short Canadian aid would be supplementary to whatever might be supplied by the Bank.

Agreed Projects

6. The following projects were agreed for recommendation to ministers to be financed in the current fiscal year:

(a) Equipment for Thal Colonization project (dump trucks, motors, pumps, etc.) $2,500,000

Note: This project would be undertaken in collaboration with the International Bank which is expected to finance a substantially larger portion of it, including tractors of which only certain types are made in Canada. We have nevertheless undertaken to supply to the Pakistani a list of Canadian-made tractors.

(b) Cement Plant for Thal Colonization Project $3,500,000

Note: This was a top priority item with the Pakistanis. Ordinarily a cement plant would certainly only be eligible for a loan but in this case the plant is to be used in connection with urgently needed colonization work and will primarily be used for housing and other basic utilities. Hence we agreed to recommend it for a grant. Trade and Commerce is to employ a firm of consulting engineers; Pakistan engineers will then have to contact this firm so that agreement may be reached on specifications and tenders for construction subsequently called for.

(c) Experimental Live Stock Farm (to be carried out jointly with Australia and New Zealand; Canada to supply chiefly machinery and equipment) $ 200,000

Note: We told the Pakistani that we could not discuss this project with them. We had been invited by the Australians to take part and had agreed but the basis of our participation had not been settled. The figure of $200,000 was our own estimate of the machinery and equipment that might be supplied from Canada.

(d) Power Pumps for Irrigation Project in East Bengal (Colombo Plan Serial No. 22) $ 500,000

Note: We did not have very full information on this project but it was well advanced so that there would be no delays in spending the available funds and the pumps were almost certainly of a type that could be produced in Canada. Mr. Hasan undertook to send additional information from Washington.

(e) Harbour Equipment and Railway and Marine Workshop Equipment $1,000,000

Note: The Pakistanis emphasized the run-down condition of their transportation system and the urgent need for improving it.

(f) Railway ties (subject to further examination) $1,200,000

Note: It was known that Canadian firms had made tenders recently called for by the Pakistan Government for railway ties for this amount. American firms had probably tendered also. However, the Pakistanis felt sure that the Canadian supplies would be taken if financed under the Colombo Plan. This item is listed "subject to further examination" because, since the Pakistanis left, and in connection with our continuing consultations with the International Bank, a question has arisen in our minds whether it might not be better to substitute some other item.

(g) Miscellaneous (probably chiefly electrical equipment and aluminum transmission wire) $1,100,000

Note: The Pakistanis were most anxious that the total of the projects listed should add up to $10,000,000 and none of the specific projects listed below seemed immediately eligible for inclusion in the list. Hence it was agreed to include this "basket" item. The Pakistanis may well buy certain electrical equipment, possibly including radio receiving sets, and they are definitely interested in large quantities of aluminum transmission wire but are not certain as to the exact time when they will need it.

Total $10,000,000

7. We emphasized to the Pakistanis that agreement on a list, and approval by Ministers, would not automatically provide the supplies listed. Many obstacles would have to be confronted and, if possible, overcome: shortage of steel and other materials, differences of view regarding specifications and other practical matters, and possible delays of many sorts.

Other Projects

8. The following projects were discussed in detail but for one reason or another were not included in the present list. It should be emphasized that the present list may well have to be changed as the year moves forward. It may prove impossible to supply certain items; costs may differ widely from preliminary estimates. Both the Pakistanis and ourselves are most anxious to find appropriate projects so that the full sum of about $10,000,000 should be spent, or if not spent at least committed, by the end of the current Canadian fiscal year in March, 1952. Of course if the list is materially changed it would be necessary to submit the changes to ministers.

(a) Mianwali Hydro-Electric Power Development. When the Pakistanis first visited us this was their highest priority and they subsequently supplied us with detailed material relating to it. On their return visit we explained to them that we had some difficulties about it: a review of the supplies needed showed that Canada could not by any means supply all of them; the project was receiving some attention from the International Bank; and finally the project would extend over several years whereas Canadian funds were at present only available for the current fiscal year and, even if committed, could scarcely be carried over beyond the following year. The Pakistanis remained very anxious to get Canadian support, explaining that full up-to-date details had not been submitted to the Bank and suggesting that they might possibly be willing to pay cash in Canada for the necessary supplies if, during later years of the Colombo Plan, sufficient funds were not available from the Canadian Government. It was agreed to leave this item over for further consideration. A new Canadian official is likely to be appointed very soon in connection with the Colombo Plan and he might visit Pakistan soon after his appointment. If so he would certainly want to look into the Mianwali project.

(b) Radio Equipment. The Pakistanis put before us the following list of radio equipment:

(i) Installation of very high frequency radio communication link between Karachi, Rawlapindi and East Pakistan

(ii) One tube rolling machine for Line Stores Workshop

(iii) 13 high frequency radio transmitters

(iv) 35 receivers (dual diversity)

(v) 3 medium wave searchlight stations

(vi) Equipment for broadcasting use, Dacca

(vii) Replacements for existing medium-wave transmitters at Dacca and Lahore

(viii) Short-wave transmitters, including aerials, Lahore and Dacca

(ix) Transmitting studio and receiving centre equipment, including aerials and accessories, at Quetta and Hyderabad

We could probably supply most of this equipment from Canada. On the other hand, as we explained quite frankly, there was another difficulty. While we have been supplying Pakistan with very substantial amounts of arms and ammunition we were most anxious that no trace of such material should appear in the Colombo Plan. While we were quite ready to agree that the equipment they had in mind was for normal peacetime purposes nevertheless there might be people who, from ignorance or from malice, might seize upon these items and describe them as military equipment, thereby bringing the Colombo Plan into disrepute. The Pakistanis appreciated our motives and agreed with them and after discussion decided to withdraw this item from current consideration.

(c) Ships. This was another top priority item with the Pakistanis. Between their two visits we did try to locate some ships for immediate sale but found none that were eligible for Colombo Plan financing. (A couple were discovered under Canadian flag but Greek ownership). We warned the Pakistanis that the same considerations that affected radio equipment might also affect ships. The Canadian Government might be particularly sensitive about ships because of recent difficulties connected with those supplied to the Ming Sung Company.

(d) Mechanized Cultivation in East Bengal (Colombo Plan Serial No. 11). At one point the Pakistanis put forward this project which involved supply of substantial quantities of farm equipment, together with the supply and equipment of training centres. We told them that as far as we were concerned this sort of project would be top priority. However, further investigation proved that the Pakistanis themselves were by no means ready to move forward on this project at present.

(e) Diesel Locomotives. The Pakistanis raised this item with us on their first visit and after investigation it turned out that a Canadian firm would be very glad to look into the possibility of supplying these locomotives. However, the Pakistanis told us that the International Bank was definitely interested in the financing of these items so we did not consider them further. However, we said we hoped that the Pakistanis might think of buying them in Canada even though the funds came from the International Bank.

(f) Rubber Tire and Tube Factory. This was clearly a commercial proposition; the Pakistanis expected it to be quite profitable. While it might be eligible for a loan under the Colombo Plan we strongly recommended that private finance, together with private know how, should be enlisted if at all possible. The Pakistanis agreed with this position.

(g) Polystyrene. The Pakistanis had been very interested in obtaining some polystyrene even before our Colombo Plan discussions began. The Department of Trade and Commerce had enlisted the cooperation of a Canadian producer in the name of the Plan. However, it was agreed that this type of material — which would largely end up in combs and fancy goods — was scarcely appropriate for Colombo Plan finance and it was agreed to drop it out. We hope that the Canadian supplier will nevertheless provide a certain quantity.

Transportation, Administration, etc.

9. It was agreed that the Pakistanis would normally pay ocean freight on Colombo Plan shipments from Canada. Most of the goods would probably be shipped in British bottoms and it would seem wasteful to use up dollars for this purpose.

10. Arrangements are being made here for continuing supervision and guidance of Colombo Plan orders. All such orders will be placed with Canadian producers through the C.C.C. or other Government agency. Directions to the C.C.C. will be given by the existing "technical assistance unit" in the Department of Trade and Commerce which will be suitably expanded and for which an exceptionally well qualified director has been found.

11. The Pakistanis will also set up a supply agency here in connection with the High Commissioner's Office.

12. No doubt there will be many technicians visiting to and fro in connection with Colombo Plan aid and the question of costs may have to be considered. The present intention is that Canada will not pay any costs in connection with Pakistan experts visiting this country. When Canadian technicians visit Pakistan, however, their expenses while in Pakistan will be borne by the Pakistan Government (as under technical assistance arrangements).

13. We expressed the hope that under the technical assistance arrangements Pakistan would send trainees to Canada in connection with projects for which Canada was providing assistance under the Colombo Plan; further, that some of these trainees should be of the rank of "foreman" rather than "management". The Pakistanis agreed with this suggestion although they explained that their own system of ranks within industry was rather different from our own.

Further Steps — Publicity

14. We hope to have ministerial approval for the arrangements described in this despatch. Pending such approval both in Ottawa and Karachi there will be no publicity.

15. Mr. Said Hasan said he very much hoped that the exchange of notes and the publication of the "Master Agreement" would take place in Karachi before September 7. His Minister is leaving for Washington that day. We said we had every hope of meeting this deadline. Will you please proceed tentatively with the necessary arrangements? We shall telegraph you if and when Canadian ministerial approval is forthcoming.

16. We are anxious to get as much publicity as we can both in Pakistan and also in Canada regarding the Colombo Plan and, if possible, it would seem desirable to have some sort of ceremony in connection with the signing of the Notes. We are planning to withhold publicity regarding the list of items available for finance until the exchange of Notes so that there would be additional substance to whatever publicity can be obtained. Please let us have your views on these matters as soon as possible.

Déclaration de principes

Statement of Principles

CONFIDENTIAL August [ ], 1951

COLOMBO PLAN

STATEMENT OF PRINCIPLES AGREED BETWEEN THE GOVERNMENT OF CANADA AND THE GOVERNMENT OF PAKISTAN FOR COOPERATIVE ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT OF PAKISTAN

The Governments of Canada and Pakistan, together with other governments, took part in London in 1950 in drawing up the Colombo Plan for Co-operative Economic Development in South and South-East Asia. The Governments of Canada and Pakistan now desire to co-operate for their mutual benefit, and in particular for the achievement of the purposes of the Colombo Plan, by promoting the economic development of Pakistan. Therefore the Governments of Canada and Pakistan now wish to establish agreed principles under which economic aid from Canada will be provided to Pakistan for the purposes of the Colombo Plan, and according to which supplementary agreements may be made to cover specific programmes.

The Governments of Canada and Pakistan agree to the establishment of the following principles:

1. All economic aid supplied by the Government of Canada to the Government of Pakistan under the Colombo Plan shall consist of goods and services in accordance with specific programmes agreed upon from time to time between the two governments. Similarly, agreement will be reached on the methods of procurement and transfer.

2. In order that Canadian aid may cover different types of projects, different forms of financing may be used; in particular, Canadian aid will be available on either a grant or a loan basis, depending on the nature of each specific programme and the uses to which the goods and services supplied under it are put.

3. The particular terms of each specific programme will be a matter for agreement between the two governments, subject to the following general provisions:

(a) Grants: In any specific programme under which goods financed by grants from the Canadian Government are sold or otherwise distributed to the Pakistan public "counterpart funds" will normally be set aside. The Pakistan Government will set up a special account for these funds and will keep separate records of the amounts placed in the account in connection with each specific programme. It will pay into this account the rupee equivalent of the Canadian expenditures on goods and services supplied under any such programme. The Government of Pakistan will from time to time report to the Government of Canada the position of this account and will supply a certificate from the Auditor General of Pakistan. The two governments will from time to time agree on the economic development projects in Pakistan to be financed from this account.

(b) Loans: For the specific programmes which are agreed to be appropriate for financing by means of loans the terms of the loans will be determined by the two governments. These terms will relate primarily to the commercial character of the particular project in question, to its anticipated earnings, and to its anticipated effects on the foreign exchange position of Pakistan.

Memorandum from Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to Secretary of State for External Affairs

CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa], August 24, 1951

COLOMBO PLAN — PAKISTAN

I understand that when this was discussed in Cabinet yesterday it was decided to defer approval of the proposed list of projects in Pakistan. Apparently there was no general objection either to the financial commitments involved or to the general reasonability of the type of programme put forward. On the other hand various Ministers were worried because a number of comparable projects in Canada had been deferred chiefly for lack of materials (notably steel and cement). Amongst the projects mentioned were the Canso bridge, harbour works in New-Westminster, the ferry from Sydney, N.S., to Point aux Basques, and the Montreal General Hospital.

2. Ministers had two sorts of worry. First, there would be adverse political reaction in certain quarters in Canada if it were learned that projects were being carried forward in Pakistan on the basis of Canadian materials when similar urgent projects were being held up for lack of materials and, second, if the Pakistan projects approved by the Canadian Government were held up for lack of Canadian materials, this would engender disappointment and ill feeling in Pakistan.

3. It is not possible to guarantee that Canadian aid to Pakistan can be made available without any economic sacrifice to this country. Some sacrifice must be involved in a period of short supply. Further the Pakistanis, who do not know the Canadian market and have few direct connections with Canadian suppliers, must be given some informal assistance by the Canadian Government in getting supplies.

4. I understand that some Ministers enquired how much scarce materials would be used up by the proposed Pakistan projects. It is not possible to make any estimate at present. Some of the projects would require substantial quantities of steel. On the other hand this may be less than appears at first sight; for instance the proposed dock and harbour facilities would be constructed of timber, not steel. All one can say (as you have already done) is that officials of the Department of Trade and Commerce, who attended all the meetings with the Pakistanis, thought that there was a reasonable chance of moving forward on the projects listed. Deliveries of supplies would in many cases not take place in the current fiscal year; the immediate need is to start work on the engineering and other problems involved.

5. You can give Ministers assurances on the following points:

(a) It was fully understood throughout our discussions with the Pakistanis that, while informal governmental assistance would be forthcoming, no guarantees could be given regarding availabilities of supplies.

(b) It was also understood that the proposed list of projects might have to be changed in the course of the current year; if one project proved impracticable because of supply problems or technical difficulties and delays other projects would be substituted.

(c) The Pakistanis are in fact reviewing alternative projects which might be substituted in case it is found necessary to drop any of those in the existing list.

(d) Our chief purpose in securing the services of Mr. Nik Cavell has been to ensure that all the projects under the Colombo Plan are practical — practical in terms of useful results in Pakistan and practical in terms of availability of supplies from Canada. He will join the Government Service on September 10 and is planning to go to Pakistan the following month. At that time the Pakistan programme can and will be reviewed.

6. In order to be quite certain that there was no misunderstanding with the Pakistanis on the points listed in the foregoing paragraph, Mr. Plumptre has had a further talk with the Pakistan High Commissioner. You can be sure that no misunderstanding exists.

7. The Pakistan High Commissioner, however, specially wished that two points should be brought to your attention:

(a) Although the list of projects was subject to review at any time, in the light of practical considerations, it was urgently necessary to get the list approved at the present time. Until such approval was given no work of any kind could go forward on any of the projects. Already two months of the Colombo Plan year had gone by; it was high time to get down to practical matters.

(b) He put in a specially urgent plea for the cement plant which is absolutely essential to their refugee colonization programme in the Thal area. The High Commissioner hoped that whatever might happen to other projects this one at least could be kept in the programme.

8. I return to you herewith the papers on this subject which were sent to you for the meeting of Cabinet on August 22. I am putting the item on the agenda again for August 29.

COLOMBO PLAN; CANADIAN AID TO PAKISTAN

20. The Secretary of State for External Affairs, referring to discussion at the meeting of August 22nd, 1951, said it had been fully understood throughout, in discussions with the Pakistani delegation respecting the proposed aid to Pakistan under the Colombo Plan, that, while informal governmental assistance would be forthcoming, no guarantees could be given respecting availabilities of supplies. It was also understood that the proposed list of projects might have to be changed in the course of the current year if one project proved impracticable because of supply problems or technical difficulties and delays. In such cases other projects could be substituted for those now contemplated. The Pakistanis were reviewing alternative projects which might be substituted in case it was found necessary to drop any of those on the existing list. Mr. R.G. Nik Cavell was being appointed to the government service for the express purpose of ensuring that all projects under the Colombo Plan were practical in terms of useful results in the recipient country and in terms of availability of supplies from Canada. The whole project would be reviewed with this in mind within the next few weeks.

(Memorandum, Under-Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs, Aug. 24, 1951)

21. The Cabinet, after discussion:

(a) approved the statement of principles agreed between the government of Canada and the government of Pakistan for co-operative economic development in Pakistan (as given in appendix to Cab. Doc. 211-51[42]); and,

(b) approved the list of Colombo Plan projects for Pakistan as recommended by the Secretary of State for External Affairs on August 22nd and agreed that assistance for these projects be provided in the form of grants, on the understanding that it might not be possible to carry out some of the projects recommended because of non-availability of supplies and that, in such cases, it might be desirable to substitute alternative projects.

COLOMBO PLAN; INDIA

15. The Secretary of State for External Affairs, referring to discussion at the meeting of February 7th, 1951, said that discussions had taken place with Indian authorities respecting the possible uses of Canadian economic aid under the Colombo Plan. A number of development projects similar to those proposed for Pakistan had been considered but discussions were still in a preliminary stage and Indian authorities had now indicated that they would like to accept substantial quantities of Canadian wheat. They had agreed to set up "counterpart funds" equivalent to the value of Canadian wheat supplied and to use these for development projects in India. Such projects would be subject to the agreement of Canadian authorities. The amount approved by Parliament for economic aid under the Colombo Plan in the current fiscal year was $25 million. Some $10 million had already been tentatively allocated for projects in Pakistan. This left $15 million for India unless Ceylon applied, which seemed unlikely and which would involve, at most, a token amount. It appeared desirable to provide that the whole of this sum might be spent for wheat, allowing, however, for the possibility that some of it might be used instead, with Cabinet approval, for desirable and acceptable development projects if these materialized during the course of the fiscal year.

An explanatory note was circulated.

(Minister's memorandum, Sept. 10, 1951 — Cab. Doc. 239-51)†

16. The Minister of Trade and Commerce was of opinion that the offer of Canadian consumer goods to India instead of capital goods or assistance would not be within the true spirit of the Colombo Plan. There was at present no prospect of famine in India and, furthermore, as far as could be ascertained India had ample funds to purchase capital goods. The only problem seemed one of availability of machinery and other equipment required. It did not seem impossible, however, that Canada could make available to India certain materials required for Indian industrial development.

17. The Minister of Fisheries pointed out that the Colombo Plan did make provision for the use of consumer goods in conjunction with the establishment of "counterpart funds". When the plan had been adopted each Asiatic country had submitted a list of projects. If it were agreed that Canada should now supply certain quantities of wheat to India under the plan, it would be a relatively simple matter to ascertain that the "counterpart funds" established in India were, in fact, used to further approved projects.

18. The Prime Minister was of opinion that, if it could be made clear that the "counterpart funds" to be established would be in rupees and that Canada would remain in a position to supervise the use to which such funds were being put, there would not seem to be any real objection to the proposal that Canadian wheat be sent to India under the plan, provided it were ascertained that this was the most practical course of action which could be followed at the present time.

19. The Cabinet, after discussion, agreed that:

(a) expenditures not to exceed $15 million be approved for the supply of wheat to India under the Colombo Plan during 1951-52;

(b) the government of India be requested to set up "counterpart funds", equal in value to whatever wheat may be provided, and to use these funds for development projects in India in consultation with Canadian officials;

(c) Canadian officials continue to explore with Indian officials the possibility of Canadian economic aid being supplied directly (rather than through wheat and "counterpart funds") for development projects in India; and,

(d) all arrangements for supplying wheat to India under (a) be subject to the approval of the Ministers of Trade and Commerce, Finance, and External Affairs.

Note du sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures pour le secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

Memorandum from Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to Secretary of State for External Affairs

[Ottawa], September 28, 1951

COLOMBO PLAN — CEYLON

At the last meeting of the Commonwealth Consultative Committee, the Ceylonese indicated that while they would not be submitting requirements for Colombo Plan aid in the first Colombo Plan year, they would be putting forward projects for consideration in subsequent years of the Plan. Accordingly we made no provision for the allocation of any funds to Ceylon out of the total appropriation of $25 million.

2. As you know we have recently had a visit from Mr. R. Coomaraswamy of the Ceylon Ministry of Finance. Coomaraswamy has submitted a scheme for rural development in Ceylon. Very briefly this scheme provides for an expansion of the village economy of that country whereby a State-Village partnership will distribute tools, materials and technical assistance to bring the unused labour which is a feature of the village economy into production. This labour would be used for village projects such as roads, wells, irrigation channels, storehouses, etc.

3. Officials of the Department of Trade and Commerce, Finance and External Affairs have examined this plan and while there are a few gaps in the detailed presentation, the conclusion is that there is a good deal to be said for it. It appears to be a thoroughly practical "grassroots" approach to economic development and has the advantage that it can be implemented in stages, that is, village by village, as funds become available. From the point of view of public opinion in Canada, the plan would seem to have considerable appeal because it would involve supply of such things as axes, ploughs, fencing, hand tools, etc., which generally convey to the public a more comprehensible picture than massive turbo-generators and other capital equipment on the grander scale.

4. Against these favourable factors should be set the fact that Ceylon is one of the less depressed areas of South-East Asia and certainly does not require support to the same extent as either India or Pakistan. On the other hand, Ceylon is a member of the Commonwealth Consultative Committee and it is clearly envisaged that aid should be provided for her under the terms of the original Report.

5. In our discussions with the Indians and Pakistanis, while we did indicate approximate allocations of $15 million and $10 million respectively, there was no suggestion that these amounts were firm to the last cent. Indeed, it was frequently stated that some difficulty would be experienced in estimating exact costs of projects. We think, therefore, that it would be quite possible to find, say $1 million for Ceylon out of the Indian and Pakistan allocations and that there could be no objection by these countries to our doing so.

6. Any allocation of Colombo Plan funds to Ceylon should, it is considered, be handled in a slightly different manner than is contemplated for consumer goods in the cases of India and Pakistan. We would not for Ceylon envisage the setting up of counterpart funds as such. The hand tools and other items made available would be supplied to and distributed by government agencies in Ceylon. These agencies would sell the items at reduced or subsidized prices. We think that the funds arising from the sale of the tools could be ploughed back into the same scheme and the Ceylonese be asked to give us an accounting of the expenditures.

7. I must add that this question has recently been complicated by receipt of a request from the Ceylon Government through Sykes, our Trade Commissioner there, for a Colombo Plan gift of 20,000 tons of flour. This request which is parallel to a similar request to the U.S. Government for 70,000 tons comes entirely separately from Coomaraswamy's rural development scheme and, as far as we can judge, without his knowledge. Since Ceylon has no famine problem, officials are not inclined to view this request with much favour. Mr. Howe may, however, see some long-term commercial advantage in such a gift and his view is being obtained separately.

8. I recommend:

(a) that $1 million be provided out of this year's Colombo Plan appropriation of $25 million. This sum to be made up approximately 1/3 out of the $10 million tentatively allocated to Pakistan and 2/3 out of the $15 million tentatively allocated to India:

(b) that officials be authorized to develop with the Ceylonese authorities financial arrangements whereby funds arising out of the sale of projects supplied by Canada be ploughed back into the scheme.

9. If you agree in principle with the foregoing, a formal submission to Cabinet will be prepared after we have received from the other officials concerned the reaction of Messrs. Howe and Abbott to this proposal.[43]

Memorandum from Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to Secretary of State for External Affairs

[Ottawa], October 11, 1951

Since sending you my memorandum of September 28th (attached for reference) on the subject of Ceylon's two requests for assistance, namely, the Rural Development Scheme and a gift of flour, we have had some second thoughts about the former.

2. It appears that the International Bank is shortly sending a mission to Ceylon for the purpose of helping the Ceylonese to produce a programme for economic development. We have, as you know, always made a point of moving in close concert with the Bank and ensuring that we do not duplicate any of their activities. Officials of this and other departments interested in Colombo Plan affairs feel now that it might be advisable to defer reaching a firm decision on this scheme until the Bank have got on the ground and have come up with a report.

3. There is another reason why we think that caution is indicated in getting into this scheme. A general election is in the offing for Ceylon and it is quite possible that the Rural Development Scheme, which on its merits we still feel is a good one, and certainly the request for flour are both eleventh hour efforts to obtain some form of assistance during this Colombo Plan year with a view to alluring the electorate. The U.K. Deputy High Commissioner here whose advice, in view of his wide experience in this subject and in South East Asia we have always sought, is inclined to believe we would do well to postpone any action for this year.

4. I should report that both the Rural Development Scheme and the flour scheme have recently been put before Mr. Howe by his officials. Mr. Howe, as was expected, has rejected the flour suggestion and has approved the Rural Development Scheme but has expressed some doubt about our ability to get Pakistan and India to agree to proportionate reductions in the amounts of their allocations. He has said, however, that he is willing to support the proposal in Cabinet if it should be introduced.

5. In the case of the Department of Finance, since our recent reconsideration occurred before officials had an opportunity to present the two schemes to Mr. Abbott, no action there has been taken.

6. In view of the foregoing, I would now recommend that further consideration of the Rural Development Scheme be postponed for this year and that the Ceylonese be informed that since our total Colombo Plan appropriation for this year has been allocated and that since no proposal for external assistance was submitted at the last meeting of the Consultative Committee there are no funds available.[44]

Procès-verbal d'une réunion

Minutes of a Meeting

CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa], December 18, 1951

Colombo Group Meeting — 11 a.m. December 12, Mr. Deutsch's office, Confederation Building.

Present:

Mr. Plumptre (Chairman) External Affairs
Mr. Deutsch—Finance
Mr. Heasman—Trade and Commerce
Mr. Cavell—Trade and Commerce (International Economic and Technical Cooperation Division)

Also Present:

Miss Meagher, Messrs. McInnes, Rau, Thurrott, Rosenthal Read, Wright, Col. Thorne.

Minutes of Meetings

1. The meeting agreed that it would be desirable, from now on, to keep minutes of the Colombo Group meetings, not only for the use of members of the Group, but also to provide the interested Canadian Missions abroad with a record of the discussions to serve as background information on various aspects of Canadian participation in the Plan.

[44] Note marginale :/Marginal note:

Consultative Committee

2. A memorandum circulated to the Group reviewed the situation in regard to the time and place of the next Consultative Committee meeting. It was apparent that although some member governments had previously favoured a meeting in London to tie in with the meeting of the Commonwealth Finance Ministers in January, the majority was now in favour of having the Consultative Committee meet later in South-East Asia. The most recent information received just before the Colombo Group meeting, from the U.K. High Commissioner's Office, was that the United Kingdom Government, because of pressure of other matters, favoured a postponement of the Consultative Committee meeting until March 24. From information at present available, it appears that Karachi is the most likely place for the meeting.

3. The question was raised whether this new suggestion for a postponement until March 24 would interfere with Mr. Cavell's plans for his forthcoming visit to the Colombo Plan area. He explained that this later date would suit him better since it would allow him to visit India and Pakistan, and possibly Ceylon, in advance of the Consultative Committee meeting.

4. It was agreed that Canada should make no further effort to gain support for a London meeting, but should accept the wishes of the majority of member governments to hold the meeting in the Colombo Plan area.

5. The meeting then discussed the question of the Report. Canadian views on the form of the Report have already been submitted in writing and orally, and there was reason to believe that our representations have had some impact on U.K. thinking. The Commonwealth Relations Office will soon be circulating a revised draft of the Report and it was agreed that we should take no further action until we have seen the new draft, when we might wish to make further comments.

Canadian Contribution—1951-53

6. It seemed likely that most, if not all, of the 1951-52 contribution of $25 million would be spent or committed before the end of this fiscal year. It was thought best, therefore, to tackle the question of a second contribution quite separately from the problem of any balance which might remain out of the first $25 million vote. Any such unspent balance would require a re-vote and necessary action will be considered later in the fiscal year when the situation is clearer.

7. It was suggested that a submission should be put to Cabinet by External Affairs in the near future, recommending an appropriation of $25 million as the Canadian contribution to the Colombo Plan for 1952-53. The memorandum, which would be cleared in advance with Finance and Trade and Commerce, would inform the Cabinet of the progress made to date in implementing the Colombo Plan and would include an account of what other countries, particularly the United States, have done and are committed to do in the area.

8. There followed some discussion on the question of the possible provision of wheat to India next year with the consequent setting up of counterpart funds. The general consensus of the meeting was that it was greatly preferable to use our

Colombo Plan appropriation for direct capital assistance rather than for the provision of foodstuffs, which should normally be a commercial transaction. It was also pointed out that by supplying wheat we defeat to that extent one objective of Canadian participation in the Colombo Plan, namely the provision of Canadian equipment to South-East Asian countries. It was true that certain essential materials for such equipment were in short supply, but it was expected that by next year it would be easier to make some of these materials available.

9. It was agreed that every effort should be made to spend the 1952-53 contribution, if approved, on direct capital assistance for suitable development projects, but that the possibility of using part of the contribution for wheat should not be entirely ruled out provided: (a) that India wanted the wheat, and (b) that India would be prepared to use the counterpart funds from the sale of the wheat for desirable development projects. This would, however, be considered as a last resort and would only be approved if it were found impossible to arrange for the full appropriation to be used for direct aid.

India—Progress Report

10. The Indians propose to use the counterpart funds resulting from the provision of wheat ($10 million) for further work on the Mayurakshi project. From reports received on this project, it appears to be suitable for Canadian assistance under the Colombo Plan, but so far we have not given formal approval to the Indian Government. It was thought that before doing so the Indian High Commissioner should be asked to obtain more specific information from his Government on the particular parts of the project which will be undertaken with the counterpart funds for Canadian wheat. It was agreed that the Department of Finance should first look over the information on Mayurakshi which is now available and let the Department of External Affairs know what additional information is required. Meanwhile External Affairs would communicate with Mr. Saksena telling him that Canada approves the project in principle, that we will be requiring certain particulars before final approval can be given, and that we will get in touch with him in the near future to let him know exactly what further information he should obtain from his Government.

11. The meeting then discussed the problem of the disposal of the balance of $5 million remaining out of the total of $15 million for India. Mr. Saksena had informed External Affairs, on instructions from his Government, that India would like to have the $5 million used to provide equipment from Canada for the Hirakud and Mayurakshi projects and for the Eastern Technical Institute. The meeting agreed that in the light of the reports received, the Hirakud project was unsuitable and that no Canadian funds should be used in connection with it. Saksena should be told this and at the same time informed that no requirements or specifications had been submitted to the Canadian Government for Mayurakshi or the Eastern Technical Institute and that while we approved both these projects in principle, subject to a favourable report from the International Bank Mission, we would be unable to take any decision on providing equipment for them until we knew exactly what was needed and could determine whether the materials for the equipment were available in Canada.

12. The question of the possible provision of chassis for trucks or buses to the Bombay Transportation Commission was then discussed. Materials for these chassis are available and it would be feasible to undertake to provide them up to the full total of the $5 million balance. There are, however, two obstacles to be overcome. The first is that the request has not come from the Central Government and the meeting was unanimous in its opinion that we could not deal with state or municipal governments. It would be necessary therefore, that the request come through the Central Government. The second difficulty arose from the fact that a transportation system is revenue-making and is therefore hardly eligible for a grant. On the other hand, the Bombay Transportation Commission apparently has no capital, needs buses and trucks, and is not in a financial position to carry a loan. It was suggested that, in these circumstances, arrangements might be made for Canada to give the chassis to the Central Government and for the Central Government in turn to hand them over on a loan basis to the Bombay Transportation Commission, with the return from the loan to be used by the Central Government to set up counterpart funds. The repayment of the loan and the consequent establishment of counterpart funds might be spread over a period of five or six years.

13. The meeting agreed that the Department of External Affairs should tell Mr. Saksena that before the Canadian Government could consider the provision of chassis, the request would have to be received from the Central Government. No commitment would be made to Mr. Saksena, but if the request were in fact received from the Government of India the question would be reconsidered and the possibility of a loan, or a grant with counterpart funds, would be explored.

14. The meeting also agreed to explore further the Indian request for aluminium wire which can probably be made available without difficulty.

Hirakud Project—Aluminium Mill

15. The Commercial Counsellor in New Delhi had been interviewed by a representative of an Indian aluminium company which was interested in establishing an aluminium mill in connection with the Hirakud project and inquired whether Canadian assistance under the Colombo Plan might be made available. The meeting decided that since this request had come from a private enterprise and since furthermore Canada was not interested in participating in any way in the Hirakud project, the Department of Trade and Commerce should inform New Delhi that there would be no possibility of Canadian Colombo Plan aid for this proposed aluminium mill.

Pakistan—Progress Report

16. The Pakistan Government recently submitted an enormous catalogue of requirements for various projects which they had in mind in connection with their development programme. Mr. Cavell's Division, in consultation with the commodity experts of the Department of Trade and Commerce, had examined these requirements and was convinced that such an extensive list of detailed items and specifications covering a very wide field of development projects, did not constitute a practicable approach to the problem of utilizing the $10 million Pakistan allocation during the remainder of this fiscal year. The meeting agreed that we should not attempt to select a large number of miscellaneous items but rather, that we should try to choose one or two major projects which Canada could usefully assist and on which we could proceed without delay. It was suggested that a good part of the allocation, perhaps $5 or $6 million, might be devoted to the manufacture and provision of diesel locomotives for West Pakistan. These locomotives can be manufactured in Montreal; they are 93% Canadian made and they would represent an important contribution of the solution of Pakistan's transportation problems. The Pakistan Government is anxious to obtain diesel locomotives and the order would be of considerable assistance to the Canadian manufacturer. It was agreed that Mr. Heasman would raise the matter with his Minister and would then communicate with Mr. Deutsch, who would in turn consult Mr. Abbott. The proposal would also be cleared with Mr. Pearson and if all three Ministers agreed, would be submitted to the Cabinet. Here again, the question of counterpart funds against depreciation would have to be gone into.

17. The remainder of the $10 million allocation should if possible be used for projects which would benefit East Pakistan. The Pakistan Government is anxious to obtain equipment in connection with its development of the Port of Chittagong and has also asked whether trawlers and other equipment might be made available for a fishing centre in East Bengal. The Pakistan High Commissioner has already been asked to obtain from his Government particulars and technical data of the equipment required for the fishing centre, and the requirements for the property at Chittagong are being investigated by Trade and Commerce. It was agreed that both these projects were worth exploring further and that if the equipment could be made available in Canada they would be suitable for Canadian assistance.

18. It is now clear that there is no possibility of providing this year the cement plant requested by Pakistan in connection with the Thal project. It may be feasible to carry out this project next year if a second Canadian contribution is authorized and the meeting agreed that Mr. Cavell should go ahead immediately to locate a good consulting engineer who would be prepared to go to Pakistan for the purpose of doing the preliminary engineering job. It was made clear that the provision of a consulting engineer, as requested by the Pakistan Government, would in no way commit the Canadian Government to make funds available next year for the construction of the plant, but was merely the first step which would be necessary regardless of when the plant is built, whether the Canadian Government finances it next year or later or whether it is financed from some other source.

19. One project to which Canada is committed but on which no action to date has been taken is the experimental livestock farm which Australia, New Zealand and Canada have jointly offered to establish in the Thal area. Canada's share of this project is to be the provision of certain equipment to the value of $200,000. No specification have been received from the Pakistan Government in regard to the experimental farm and it was agreed that the Pakistan High Commissioner should be asked to obtain these specifications from his Government.

Transportation Charges

20. Two aspects of this question were considered by the meeting, ocean freight and inland transportation in Canada. There has been a certain amount of interest in Canadian shipping circles in the question of carrying Colombo Plan goods in Canadian bottoms. The meeting was generally of the opinion that no pressure should be brought to bear on the recipient governments to use Canadian ships and that no formal agreement should be sought. If these governments intended to use sterling shipping, Canada ought not to compete. It was agreed, however, that if U.S. shipping were contemplated, it would be desirable to let the Indians and the Pakistanis know, on an informal basis, that they would do well to use Canadian shipping if possible. As regards inland transport, there should not be much of a problem, since it was likely that all Canadian goods destined to India or Pakistan under the Colombo Plan would be delivered at Canadian ports of exit. It was, however, agreed that it was only reasonable that transport and insurance business within Canada should be given to Canadian firms and that Mr. Cavell should do what he could to ensure this.

Allocation to Ceylon

21. A fairly recent communication received from Mr. Sykes reaffirmed his view that an allocation, which need only be a small one, should be made to Ceylon. The meeting agreed that a letter should be sent to Mr. Sykes expressing our concurrence with his views in principle, explaining that because of our commitments to India and Pakistan and because of the earlier indication from Ceylon that they would not be ready to participate in the Plan this year, it had not been possible to cut Ceylon in on the 1951-52 appropriation and assuring him that, provided a second contribution was authorized, it was our intention to include Ceylon in the Canadian programme for 1952-53.

TOP SECRET Ottawa, May 17, 1951

My dear Colleague:

I attach a copy of a letter of May 10† from the United Kingdom High Commissioner, together with the provisional agenda referred to therein concerning the proposed Commonwealth Defence Conference on the Middle East, which it is now suggested should meet in Malta on June 21.

You will recall the discussion in Cabinet Defence Committee on March 20 regarding Canadian representation at the proposed conference on the defence of the Middle East. The Committee agreed that on receipt of an invitation it could be indicated that Canada would be represented by "one or two observers, to consist of a political and/or a military representative from the Canadian mission in London".

It had been assumed when we considered this matter previously that the conference would meet in London. As it is to deal primarily with the Middle East there is, however, some merit in holding it outside London and Malta may well be a suitable place. In any event, a meeting in Malta makes it, I consider, easier for us to be represented only by observers. Although the provisional draft agenda includes several items, expressed in brief and general terms which may have wider implications, I think it is clear from Clutterbuck's covering letter that the main purpose is to examine the defence problems of the Middle East.

In the circumstances, it seems to me that our representatives might be an experienced senior military officer and an appropriate official of this Department. In view of the likelihood that some NATO questions (e.g., Mediterranean Command, NATO relations with Greece and Turkey and infrastructure) may come up at the Conference, I venture to suggest that it would be a great advantage if General Clark could be made available. As to the political officer we are thinking of Crean, our Chargé d'Affaires in Yugoslavia.

It is, I think, important that our representatives should be instructed to confine themselves strictly to the "observer" role. For this reason I do not think it is appropriate that we should make any suggestions regarding the date, place and agenda of the meeting, unless there is something that we are very anxious to change. The proposed form of liaison with the United States seems to be reasonable.

When replying to Clutterbuck and informing him that Canada will be represented by observers I think it may be sufficient for me to give, as our reason, that Canada's defence contribution is being concentrated elsewhere than in the Middle East. I do not know whether you would like me to add something to the effect that the demands of the Parliamentary Session will prevent you from attending.

May we have your views?

Yours sincerely,
L.B. PEARSON

Minister of National Defence

TOP SECRET Ottawa, May 17, 1951

My dear Colleague:

Thank you for your letter of May 17 with reference to the proposed Commonwealth Defence Conference on the Middle East.

I received various communications at the service level in connection with this conference which resulted in my speaking to the Prime Minister about it again today.

This was before the receipt of your letter but the general line you have taken coincided very closely with what I suggested to him.

It is possible that because of other engagements Major General Clark might not be available to attend the proposed conference in Malta. Subject to this, however, I agree that he should attend. If, because of some meeting of the Deputies or some other meeting of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, he cannot attend, another officer of somewhat similar rank should be appointed.

With regard to political representation, it may be that the Government may consider it desirable to be represented by somebody of cabinet rank or, failing this, of some political representative such as for example, Mr. Campney.

If, however, it is considered that this is not desirable, our representative on the non-service side might well be one of our heads of missions or others in the Department of External Affairs coming from their posts in Europe or from the Department here.

In this connection I mentioned the names of Mr. Jean Désy our Ambassador at Rome; Mr. George L. Magann, our Ambassador at Athens; and as you suggested our Chargé d'Affaires in Yugoslavia G.G. Crean.

Future developments may indicate more clearly the type of participation that we should adopt. While matters not yet before us might point to the desirability of having ministerial representation, if not by myself by some other minister, my personal inclination is to agree entirely with your suggestion, subject to the qualification that it might be desirable to have there a political representative in the person of Mr. Campney or somebody else in a similar position.

Whether or not our representation should be in the category of "observers" or participants may depend on conditions not yet before us. My personal inclination would be not to categorize our participants as merely in the category of "observers". In view of the participation of other Commonwealth countries, this might be made to appear as a sign of non-participation which might have unfortunate repercussions.

The cables so far before me do not indicate that it is intended that India or Pakistan will participate. If India and Pakistan are not invited, and if the United States is also not represented, it would seem that the calling of the Conference before the Conference of Foreign Ministers has ended and probably just before the meeting of the Council of NATO is to be held, might prove to be unfortunate. The answer as to whether we should participate and in what form may well depend on consideration beyond those of our own immediate self-interest.

As for your final enquiry as to whether the demands of the parliamentary session would prevent my attending in person, one estimate is as good as another. Almost certainly parliament will still be in session. Almost certainly the situation in Korea will not have been resolved. Moreover, we are, as you know, faced from day to day with difficult problems in connection with our defence objectives of building up the defence of Canada, maintaining the force in Korea, and providing for a force in Europe. Under the circumstances, I would hope that it would not be found necessary for me to go to Malta at this time.

Yours sincerely
BROOKE CLAXTON

COMMONWEALTH CONFERENCE ON DEFENCE QUESTIONS; PRESS RELEASE

1. The Secretary of State for External Affairs, referring to the discussion in Cabinet on March 8th, 1951, and subsequently in Cabinet Defence Committee on March 20th, 1951, stated that the U.K. government had submitted for consideration a draft announcement on the forthcoming Commonwealth conference on defence questions for release by countries concerned. This draft stated, inter alia, that it had been agreed to hold a conference of defence ministers of certain Commonwealth countries, including Canada; the ministers had decided that Malta would be a convenient meeting place; and the conference would consider certain defence problems arising in regions of common concern to these countries, including the Middle East and the Pacific, and also consequential questions regarding equipment and training of mutual interest.

It appeared desirable to suggest to the United Kingdom a revised text which would omit the references to the Minister of National Defence, to the Middle East and to the Pacific, and would conclude with an additional sentence indicating that Canada would be represented by an observer.

2. The Cabinet, after discussion, noted the report of the Secretary of State for External Affairs regarding a draft press release† on the forthcoming Commonwealth conference on defence questions, which had been submitted by the U.K. government, and agreed that, if satisfactory to the Minister of National Defence, Mr. Pearson would propose to the United Kingdom a revised draft, omitting the references to Mr. Claxton, to the Middle East and to the Pacific, and concluding with an indication that Canada would be represented by an observer.

COMMONWEALTH CONFERENCE ON DEFENCE QUESTIONS

34. The Secretary of State for External Affairs referring to the discussions at the meeting of May 22nd, 1951, said that the U.K. government had just now agreed to the Canadian suggestions on the forthcoming Commonwealth conference on defence questions. As a result, the conference would be held in London rather than Malta, and the proposed press release would make clear the relationship of Canada to the conference and would include no reference to the Pacific as an area for discussion. The announcement would indicate that a conference of the defence ministers of the United Kingdom, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa and Southern Rhodesia would begin in London on June 21st; that it would deal with defence problems arising in regions of common concern to those countries, including the Middle East, and also consequential questions of equipment and training of mutual interest to them; and that Canada would have observer representation. In the circumstances, the Cabinet Defence Committee, at its meeting yesterday, had reaffirmed its decision of March 20th, 1951, that Canada be represented by civilian and military observers drawn from the mission in London.

35. The Cabinet noted with approval the report of the Secretary of State for External Affairs regarding plans for the forthcoming Commonwealth conference on defence questions.[45]

COMMONWEALTH DEFENCE CONFERENCE

Following for Heeney, Begins: We shall be sending a full report† on the discussions at the opening sessions of the Commonwealth Defence Minister's Meeting, which took place in the Cabinet Office this morning and this afternoon, following the usual picture-taking ceremony in the garden at No. 10. Mr. Shinwell presided over the meeting, and after the usual exchange of courtesies I thought it appropriate to make a brief statement of the Canadian position with respect to the conference. The text of this statement is contained in my immediately following telegram.

2. The morning's session was devoted to a combined review, in which Field-Marshal Slim gave a most comprehensive and valuable summary of the principal points contained in MDM(51)2, the United Kingdom Chiefs of Staff memorandum on defence policy and global strategy, and MDM(51)3, the Chiefs of Staff memorandum on the defence of the Middle East.

3. A number of questions were raised by the visiting ministers in the course of this presentation, which will be reported separately in greater detail. The immediate purpose of this telegram is to indicate to you that I do not think there are any grounds for apprehension on our part that the agenda of the conference will be widened to include any detailed discussion of Pacific defences. It is clear from today's sessions that, for example, in the case of Australia, the question of what the Australian Government can contribute in the way of forces to the defence of the Middle East is necessarily linked with the defence picture in the Pacific, and particularly in South East Asia. For example, in the course of Field-Marshal Slim's presentation this morning he indicated that in the event of war there was no intention to abandon Malaya, and this point was quickly picked up by the Australian Defence Minister, who emphasized that further information on the position in South East Asia would greatly help his government in coming to final decisions on the contribution that might be made to the Middle East defence. It is also clear that a number of the ministers, who in nearly every case are accompanied by a large group of service advisers, are anxious to use the present meeting to elicit information particularly from the CIGS and while the questions they wish to raise may cover a wider field than the Middle East, there seems at this stage to be no reason to suppose that the conference as such will be required to come to decisions on the defence problems in other areas.

4. I think that there is full understanding of our own position in this matter, and feel that the arrangements we have made for representation are wholly adequate. It seems quite clear from a series of questions which Mr. Shinwell threw out at the end of this afternoon's meeting that the central purpose of the conference from the point of view of the United Kingdom Government is to ascertain more definitely the size and nature of contributions which other Commonwealth Governments interested in the Middle East area can make to the defence of that region, the timing of such contributions, including the possibility of their sending token forces in peace-time, and the assistance which would be required from the United Kingdom Government.

5. Any other topics which may be dealt with outside the Middle East area will only be for the purpose of clarifying the position in relation to the Middle East. Ends.

MEETING OF DEFENCE MINISTERS

Following for Heeney, Begins: Following is text of statement referred to in paragraph 1.

QUOTE:

The Canadian Government welcomes the opportunity which has been afforded by the present meeting of Defence Ministers from the United Kingdom, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa and Southern Rhodesia to consider defence problems arising in the Middle East. It will be recalled that the present conference was first discussed at a meeting of Commonwealth Prime Ministers held in London last January.[46] It was then the feeling of a number of Commonwealth governments that a meeting of Defence Ministers would be valuable to examine problems arising in regions of special concern to them, including the Middle East. On that occasion it was made clear by our Prime Minister that Canada's special and direct responsibilities centred in the North Atlantic area, and that for this reason, and since our interests in the Middle East are less direct than those of other Commonwealth countries, it would be appropriate for the Canadian Government to be represented at this conference by an official observer.

I need hardly say that this decision reflects the immediate objectives and commitments of the Canadian national defence effort and arises in no way from any under-estimation of the strategic significance of the Middle East area, and the vital importance this area has for our partners in the Commonwealth.

The central objectives of Canadian defence policy relate to the immediate defence of Canada and, in co-operation with the United States, of North America from direct attack, and the implementation of undertakings made by Canada under the United Nations charter and under the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. The North Atlantic Treaty Organization, in which two Commonwealth countries now participate, is a collective effort to build up strength in the Western European area — an area which the memorandum on defence policy and global strategy prepared by the United Kingdom Chiefs of Staff, which is before us, describes as "the main theatre". Since the signature of the North Atlantic Treaty, the planning of the Canadian defence effort has proceeded within the regional framework of the North

Atlantic Treaty Organization. The decision taken by the United Nations in June 1950, to resist aggression in Korea has brought Canadian forces into action alongside the forces of other Commonwealth countries.

The aggression in Korea has made it abundantly clear, however, that the threat with which the free world is faced is a global one, and we share the view expressed in the United Kingdom Chiefs of Staff appreciation that there is an urgent requirement for the establishment of machinery to work out and implement strategy and defence plans on a world-wide basis. In the development of this global strategy the Middle East area is clearly one of very great importance, and we welcome this opportunity of sitting in with you and following the course of the deliberations of this conference in the study of the important issues before the meeting. The Canadian Government is anxious to receive as full reports as possible of these discussions which clearly represent an important step forward in developing adequate collective measures for the preservation of peace. CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa], October 16, 1951

RE COMMONWEALTH SUPPLY MINISTERS' CONFERENCE

The Commonwealth Supply Ministers' Conference, which was first suggested by Mr. Gordon-Walker at the Commonwealth Prime Ministers' Meeting last January, was held in London from September 19 to 27. Officials who assisted Mr. Howe were: Mr. T.N. Beaupré, Mr. R.P. Bower, and at times Mr. F. Hewett and Mr. A.E. Ritchie.

The agenda consisted of the following items:

(1) General raw materials position — review of prospects for production, consumption and prices of raw materials in relation to world economic trends and the effects of a shortage of raw materials on supplies of manufactured goods.

(2) Consideration of the position reached in the International Materials Conference.

(3) Consideration of individual raw materials, including: copper, cotton, lead, manganese, nickel, rubber, sulphur and pyrites, tin, tungsten and molybdenum, wool and zinc. The addition of newsprint to the agenda was defeated in the first meeting.

(4) Consideration of manufactured and semi-manufactured goods.

You will recall that when the question of Canadian participation arose, we could foresee little real usefulness in such a meeting, but agreed to attend, as one official put it, in order that Canada would not appear in a "one against the world" position more often than is necessary.

Generally speaking, the Conference served a very useful purpose in disseminating information on supply problems which, while available to the U.K. and Canada because of their prominent positions in IMC and the North Atlantic community, was not known in as great detail by the other governments represented. Also, for the first time the various colonies had a voice in the discussions. As seen from a purely Canadian point of view, the success of the Conference was mainly negative, as follows:

(1) The Conference was content to merely underline the long-term supply difficulties which faced the Commonwealth without making plans for entering into any general agreement on policy or entering into any commitments.

(2) The proposal that a rigid price stabilization structure should be set up within IMC was dropped. IMC is commencing to discuss the regulation of prices of raw materials, but only in certain commodities, such as tungsten, where regulation appears to serve a useful purpose at this stage.

(3) No agreement was reached on establishing a system of agreed principles of priority for the allocation by the U.K. of steel and other goods under short supply, but the problem was referred to the Commonwealth High Commissioners. It is extremely doubtful whether they will be able to discover a solution to so complex a problem.

The Conference revealed that Canada was incomparably better off than any other Commonwealth country in virtually all the fields covered, including the supplies of steel and semi-manufactured and finished goods which we have been getting from the U.K. In the past we have done better at obtaining these supplies than other Commonwealth countries for two reasons — first, the need of the U.K. to earn dollars, and second, our direct lines to the Board of Trade and the Ministry of Supply. This preferred position may be a little more difficult to maintain in future. Certain Commonwealth countries have built up formidable sterling balances and are pressing for the conversion of these into either goods or dollars, and it is probably that the U.K. will have to yield somewhat to this pressure, but not to an extent which would be harmful to our position. Cuts in our allocation of steel are already forecast by the Commercial Counsellor for the last quarter of 1951 and for 1952.

The work of each of the IMC committees was reviewed at length. Mr. Howe declared that he was not convinced that the IMC should be expected, as some delegates suggested, to develop long-term detailed and overall allocations, since such planning must not only cut across normal commercial practices and have a degree of artificiality which is not realistic in international trade, but furthermore imposes a rigidity in trade which we should not welcome.

Discussion on this subject revealed the underlying cleavage of interest which exists between the under-developed countries and the others. The former, who are not very well acquainted with the work of IMC, were sceptical of the effort to introduce price stabilization into that organization, since they were averse to seeing the price of raw materials stabilized by an organization which has no control over stabilization of the price of capital equipment. They also claimed that higher living standards in backward areas were a more positive anti-Communist contribution than a re-armament drive in the industrialized countries and more deserving of a large share in the supply of scarce materials, particularly capital equipment. In this connection it was pointed out that if steel were diverted from Canada to, say, Malaya, in the form of capital equipment which could increase the output of rubber, this increased yield would bring into the sterling area far more dollars than the steel which was diverted.

Reverting to raw materials, Mr. Howe mentioned that countries which seemed most interested in obtaining our supplies are still maintaining import controls against them, and the presence of such controls, while not impeding seriously the movement of our strategic raw materials today, serves to remind our producers that if there is any easing of the supply position the machinery for discrimination against our exports is readily available. Plans for further investment for expansion of production must take cognizance of these restrictions.

It is expected that the United Kingdom Government will raise the question of a scheme for the allocation of U.K. steel, etc. with our High Commissioner some time in the near future, at which time we will ascertain the extent to which the modification of the U.K. export policy to dollar areas will be detrimental to Canada.

CABINET DOCUMENT NO. 25-51 Ottawa, January 23, 1951

IMMIGRATION FROM INDIA, PAKISTAN AND CEYLON

1. At its Meeting on December 21, 1950 the Cabinet agreed that the Department of External Affairs should investigate the possibility of entering into a treaty or agreement with the Government of India and possibly the Governments of Pakistan and Ceylon concerning immigration to Canada.

2. Discussions were accordingly begun with the Government of India on January 5, 1951 when Officers of the Department of External Affairs proposed to the Acting Indian High Commissioner the conclusion of an agreement which would provide for the admission per annum to Canada of a stated number of citizens of India in addition to the first degree relatives already admissible under the law.

3. The Government of India warmly welcomed the Canadian initiative and asked for a draft agreement. This was handed to the Acting High Commissioner for India on January 18, 1951. The draft agreement which takes the form of an exchange of notes is now before the Government of India, who have expressed some anxiety to complete the matter by the anniversary of Indian Independence which is January 26, next.

4. The terms of the proposed exchange of notes are:

"(1) In the twelve month period commencing on the 1st day of January 1951, and in each succeeding twelve months period thereafter, the admission to Canada for permanent residence of one hundred and fifty citizens of India, including both sexes and all ages, shall be authorized provided the immigrants comply with the provisions of the Canadian Immigration Act.

(2) In addition to the citizens of India whose entry to Canada for permanent residence is authorized in accordance with paragraph (1) above, a citizen of India who can otherwise comply with the provisions of the Canadian Immigration Act may be admitted to Canada for permanent residence if he or she is the husband, wife or unmarried child under twenty-one years of age of any Canadian citizen legally admitted to and resident in Canada and if the settlement arrangements in Canada are shown to the Canadian authorities to be satisfactory.

(3) The provisions of Canadian Order-in-Council P.C. 2115, dated the 16th day of September, 1930, as amended by Order-in-Council P.C. 6229 of the 28th day of December, 1950, shall not apply to citizens of India.

(4) The admission to Canada as non-immigrants of citizens of India shall not be affected by the preceding paragraphs."

The Government of India has stated that the above terms are acceptable.

5. The High Commissioners in Pakistan and the United Kingdom have been requested to make similar proposals to the Governments of Pakistan and Ceylon. The only variation from the proposal made to India is that whereas it is proposed to admit 150 persons from India the figures for Pakistan and Ceylon are 100 persons and 50 persons respectively.

6. With the concurrence of the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, I recommend that an exchange of notes as set out in paragraph 4 above be concluded with the Government of India and agreements along similar lines with the Governments of Pakistan and Ceylon.[47]

SECRET Ottawa, September 19, 1951

EXPORT OF ARMS TO INDIA AND PAKISTAN

Considering that the state of tension between India and Pakistan has recently increased, it has been thought advisable to review our policy on the export of arms to these two countries. We have obtained the views of those concerned here in Ottawa and have asked the United Kingdom and the United States if there has been, or if there is contemplated, any change in their policies.

2. Since the end of July, decisions on export permit applications submitted by both India and Pakistan have been deferred pending this review of policy. Up to that time all applications from either country were approved, if the material was available.

3. We have under consideration applications for the export to India and Pakistan of parts for tanks and military-type vehicles to a value of about $151,000 and $194,000, respectively. In addition the Canadian Commercial Corporation has received requests for quotations on the supply of various quantities of British-type ammunition to a value of 15 million dollars from India and 38 million dollars from Pakistan.

4. Before examining the practicability of using Canadian production facilities to manufacture these different types of ammunition, it is considered desirable that thought be given to whether or not export permits would be granted for the supplies requested. The quantities are estimated as reasonable for the requirements of the two countries, but their size is no doubt partly due to the serious deterioration that has taken place in their relations.

Approved by Cabinet, January 24, 1951. See Canada, Treaty Series, 1951, Nos. 1, 21, and 28 for India, Pakistan and Ceylon respectively.

5. The tension which has existed in varying degrees since partition has reached a serious point and the possibility of open warfare can not be ruled out although both Governments consistently profess peaceful intentions. It is generally expected that the crisis will reach its most serious stage within the next two or three months.

6. The Joint Intelligence Bureau of the Department of National Defence has provided the following appreciation on the advisability of providing arms to India and Pakistan:

> "The requirements for arms and equipment by both India and Pakistan are not related solely to the state of tension between them. In both countries they are required to maintain internal security and to provide for defence, both currency against minor border incidents with Afghanistan and Burma, and potentially against major threats to both countries from the USSR and Red China through Afghanistan, Tibet and Burma.
> Reducing the sale of arms and equipment to either country would be ineffective militarily unless all other exporting countries did likewise and furthermore India or Pakistan might turn to the Soviet Block or to illegal arms traffic to obtain arms and equipment. Such courses of action are highly undesirable and any action on our part which might precipitate them should be taken only if it is reasonably certain that the arms and equipment will be used by the one country against the other.
> It is considered that the likelihood of war between India and Pakistan will not be altered significantly by the sale of small quantities of arms and equipment to both countries on request, as such sales will not significantly alter the balance of their military capabilities ..."

7. The United Kingdom authorities have informed us that no decision in principle, based on the present situation, has been made or seems likely to be made to stop or reduce the export of arms to India or Pakistan. However, due to the many demands on United Kingdom supplies and competing claims for priorities, only small quantities of arms are being sold to the two countries.

8. The United States Government is temporarily holding up applications for the export of military equipment to either country pending further review of the situation in about a month's time. A shortage of supply from commercial sources and a lack of priority for allocations through MDAP channels have limited the quantity of arms that these countries can obtain in the United States.

9. India and Pakistan, by virtue of their geographical position and political sympathies, are potentially the democratic world's best insurance against further Communist expansion in South or South East Asia. In view of this consideration, it would seem that Canada and other friendly nations which may be able to supply modern military equipment should attempt to make available to them the quantities of arms required to assist them in their defences against possible future Communist aggression. Although India has some limited capacity for the production of arms, Pakistan's production of war materials is almost negligible. A ban on the export of arms to both countries would, therefore, more seriously affect Pakistan and would unquestionably favour India. In my opinion it is important that there be no suspicion of discrimination in our dealings with either country.

10. In the light of the above I believe that it would be difficult, and inadvisable, to refuse reasonable orders for arms from India and Pakistan until such time as it is considered that hostilities are imminent or have actually broken out. Outstanding permits and orders would be cancelled at any time when it was considered advisable to do so. The High Commissioners could be warned of this possibility.

11. I would recommend, therefore, that there be no change in our present policy on the export of arms to India and Pakistan and that the Canadian Commercial Corporation be informed that, when accepting orders from either of the two countries, it should be governed by the possibility that the contracts may have to be cancelled. This should be taken into account particularly for orders involving cancellation costs. I further recommend that the pending export permit applications be approved and that the Canadian Commercial Corporation be authorized to give quotations on the supply of the various types of ammunition requested, should it be considered advisable and practicable to do so after an examination of Canadian production facilities and our other commitments.[48]

PROPOSAL FOR NEW OFFER OF WHEAT TO INDIA

As you know, when we offered wheat to India under the Colombo Plan last February the offer was turned down on the ground that it would "evoke serious public criticism" if low-grade wheat — all we had readily available at the time — were introduced into the Government-operated ration system.[49] The Indian Government's very tardy and guarded answer to our offer appeared to reflect domestic political difficulties which they could expect either in accepting low-grade wheat which would have to be sold to the Indian people through the ration system or in finding themselves in the position of rejecting any offer of foodgrains at a time when extreme famine threatened.

[48] Approuvé par le Cabinet, le 26 septembre 1951./Approved by Cabinet, September 26, 1951.

2. There seems to be no doubt, on reviewing what took place earlier in the year, that the Indians have handled this question with ineptitude. Nevertheless, in the light of mounting world concern over India's famine, particulars of which will be summarized below, and for important political reasons I propose that consideration be given to opening negotiations for diversion of some wheat of a type acceptable to India for immediate delivery.

3. No wheat is readily available at present, even of a low grade; all that we can supply and ship before October is contracted for by other countries. To make an offer of the sort suggested would involve an approach to the Minister of Trade and Commerce suggesting, in effect, that one or more of our good wheat customers be temporarily displaced in favour of a doubtful one. I think you could certainly expect resistance to this suggestion. To meet it I outline below four points which might be made.

4. The first is that there is a great deal of evidence to show that the famine conditions into which India has now entered are really appalling. Our High Commissioner in New Delhi states that he is profoundly concerned over the seriousness of India's position and feels very strongly that we should do everything in our power "to supply as much wheat as possible of any grades India can use". The Economist, in a most forceful article in its April 21st issue, states that "the suffering, which is only just beginning, will certainly match the horror of five million deaths in the Bengal famine of 1943, and may considerably exceed it."

5. Central food reserves, in recent years inadequate in any case, are apparently down to zero; the famine areas are now literally living from "ship to mouth". The ration is only nine ounces of grain a day (total food per person) and, since April ushered in the period when domestic production seasonally slackens, the maintenance of this scale of ration in the famine areas now depends entirely on imports. Natural disasters have struck with abnormal frequency; there has been a failure of the monsoon for three consecutive years in the principal food-growing provinces and earthquakes, floods, drought and locusts have taken an unusually heavy toll this year. James Thomson, Deputy High Commissioner for the United Kingdom in Ottawa, who knows a good deal about India, says privately that the crisis is so formidable it is not unlikely that a censorship of famine reports might be imposed by the government before long to avoid panic.

6. The second point is that there has been a large volume of press comment both in Canada and the United States on these conditions. In the United States the responsible press have been almost unanimously critical of Congressional delays in passing the India Emergency Assistance Bill. Full page advertisements have appeared in the New York Times; editorials in the Times, Herald Tribune, Washington Post, Christian Science Monitor, Saturday Review and many others have urged action upon Congress and have pointed to the dangers of delay as well as (in the words of the Washington Post) to the denial of American tradition "when a stricken person asks for food, in demanding to know first how he voted in the last election".

7. In Canada, while there has not been much press comment on India's failure to take up our offer of wheat under the Colombo Plan, there has been some severe criticism (principally in the Montreal Star and Ottawa Citizen) arising out of an impression that we offered only No. 5 wheat which was unacceptable to the Indians and because we associated our offer with the Colombo Plan.

8. On the other hand opinion on the Colombo Plan itself manifested not only a surprising volume of editorial comment but a remarkable degree of enthusiasm for a Canadian contribution. A press survey made in the Department earlier this year disclosed that seventeen newspapers representing every province had commented editorially and it is noteworthy that the humanitarian aspect was predominant. As you are aware, there has been a fair volume of correspondence from Canadian citizens and organizations on wheat for India. I mention these factors because they would seem to indicate that the domestic political climate is generally favourable to measures for Indian famine relief.

9. The third point I think you could make is the favourable political effect of another offer of wheat throughout the world and specifically in the United States. The question of Indian famine relief is so much to the fore in the United States at present that I believe if it were possible to make this suggested diversion it would yield highly satisfactory political results.

10. The fourth point is that an offer of wheat to India for immediate delivery would undoubtedly exercise a most salutary effect on our relations not only with India but with all of South and South-East Asia. India has been negotiating with Peiping and Moscow for food-grains but apparently conditions have been imposed which may not be acceptable and in any case the good faith of the offers is in some doubt.[50] Nevertheless, it is by no means certain that in desperation India will not be forced to accept proposals from these sources. In the absence of any acceptable offers from the West, it is disturbing to consider what the political effects of a "deal" with China or Russia might be.

11. If these points can be successfully made, there remain difficulties in financing and transportation. Although Cabinet has already agreed to offer wheat to India under the Colombo Plan, you may now feel like asking for further funds to finance a wheat gift separately. There is a lot to be said, we think, for treating long-term development projects in South and South-East Asia on a different financial basis from emergency famine relief. The Government's offer under the Colombo Plan, while entirely defensible, has caused some misunderstanding of its motives and some resulting criticism.

12. The question of transportation raises two problems. One is ocean shipping and the other box-cars. Both are in short supply. I would suggest that with respect to the former, we might explore the possibility of enlisting support from the United Kingdom. The problem of box-cars would have to be dealt with by the Department of Trade and Commerce in collaboration with the Department of Transport.

[50] Note marginale :/Marginal note:
This is now outdated; acc[ording] to reports in [the] press, India is to get wheat from [the] USSR. This is "milo" from China. Not a gift; a commercial transaction. [A.D.P. Heeney]

13. Perhaps the greatest difficulty of all will be to explain why the Indians did not come forward to take No. 5 wheat when it was available. As you know, our grain experts do not regard No. 5 wheat as technically unmillable for Indian purposes as has been alleged in some quarters and as implied by Banerjee's public statement at the time No. 5 wheat was declined. Nevertheless, in view of its rejection I think we must conclude that, in effect, No. 5 wheat is unsuitable for India's use. The unsuitability factor may well be bound up with the extreme national sensitivity of the Indian people. It may even be that they feel "too proud to eat" if it means accepting grain which Western people are accustomed to feeding to their animals. Thomson admits that this is a valid point. In any event, it would now be very difficult for the Indians to reverse their position and say that No. 5 wheat is acceptable.

14. I should emphasize in conclusion that if you think there is merit in this suggestion, action would have to be initiated at once. The peak of the famine is the period April to late July or August. There would thus be no purpose in making arrangements which would not have the effect of delivering wheat to India until after this period, when stocks will rise normally. In order to achieve concrete results it would be necessary to divert wheat that is actually moving at present.

15. Mr. Howe, I know, likes to handle wheat questions through his own Department. But, if he agrees to diversions, he might prefer that the diplomatic missions should be used in approaching wheat customers from whom these diversions would have to be made if this proposal were accepted.

16. To summarize, there are three measures of help we can give to India:

(a) "Diversion" of wheat, box-cars and ocean shipping. We can only offer these at the expense of other customers holding firm commitments.

(b) Financial assistance in the purchase of wheat under the Colombo Plan. This offer has already been made but it has become confused with the low-grade wheat issue. We might make the offer again.

(c) Financial assistance separate from the Colombo Plan.

17. If you approve of this plan, the first step would be to discuss the question of diversion with Mr. Howe. If he is agreeable, the form of the financing (b or c above) could subsequently be considered.[51]

INDIA; CANADIAN CONTRIBUTION TO ALLEVIATE FAMINE

4. The Secretary of State for External Affairs, referring to the discussion at the meeting of February 9th, 1951, said that it was anticipated that the current famine in India would be as serious as that which had occurred in 1946, when more than 5 million deaths had occurred.

It would be recalled that India had not accepted a recent Canadian offer of No. 5 wheat. However, in view of the growing shortage of food in India, it was suggested that an outright Canadian grant might be made to India, on the understanding that the money so advanced could be used for the purchase of any Canadian foodstuffs thought suitable by the Indian government. Such a grant-in-aid might be made out of Canada's $25 million contribution to the Colombo Plan, since it was anticipated that only a small portion of this contribution would be used during the current year.

5. The Prime Minister was of the view that the major problem in India was not so much one of money as of supplies.

6. The Minister of Trade and Commerce pointed out that the only surplus food Canada could contribute at this time was No. 6 wheat. Although this grade was of poor quality, its nutrition value was high and it could probably be used to advantage in the famine areas of India.

7. The Cabinet, after further discussion, deferred decision on a possible Canadian contribution towards alleviation of famine conditions in India pending further consideration by the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Secretary of State for External Affairs in consultation.

CONFIDENTIAL. IMPORTANT

Banerjee called on me May 18th regarding food from Canada to meet Indian famine. I told him we were reviewing possibilities urgently. I asked whether No. 5 wheat would be usable (although warning him that Canadian supplies of this as well as other wheat were now contracted for). He expressed the personal opinion that No. 5 would be useful if shipped as Canadian gift direct to famine areas instead of routed through central rationing system. He also mentioned dried milk, rolled oats, and vitamin capsules as possible welcome gifts. I asked him to explore the situation with his authorities.

2. This morning he came again and saw the Under-Secretary with rather fulsome message of thanks to me from his Prime Minister. Despite Banerjee's reassurances I am still worried lest Indian authorities might believe that Canada has already made, or is on the brink of making, a large new food offer. Please tell Bajpai that our present investigations are highly exploratory, that no governmental decisions have been made, and that any publicity might be embarrassing or even harmful.

3. Banerjee expects to tell us in a few days whether No. 5 wheat would be useful. He led us to believe that if United States supplied wheat and if current discussions with Burma regarding rice were successful, additional Canadian low-grade wheat would not be needed.

INDIA; CANADIAN CONTRIBUTION TO ALLEVIATE FAMINE

13. The Secretary of State for External Affairs reported that, following the decision at the meeting of May 15th, 1951, the Departments of Trade and Commerce and External Affairs had been giving further consideration to the question of a contribution towards famine relief in India. As there was public pressure for such a contribution, an early decision as to Canadian policy seemed desirable. Trade and Commerce would shortly be providing a report on the supply position in Canada respecting various products required by India, including dried milk and eggs, rolled oats and vitamin capsules, which appeared to be available in reasonable quantities. It was thought that it might be appropriate to ship a quantity of No. 5 wheat, as a gift, direct to one of the famine areas. It appeared, however, that, even though better grades were not available, India might, as earlier in the year, refuse to accept No. 5 wheat even as a gift. Should this be confirmed, it would help to relieve the pressure for Canadian contributions if it were made known that the government had made an offer of wheat which had not been accepted. In the meantime, it might be desirable to consider whether a token sum of money should be appropriated to cover purchase of such supplies as it might prove practicable to ship to India.

14. The Minister of Agriculture thought that there was considerable misunderstanding of the question of aid for India on the part of the public and that the facts should be made known with a view to reducing the pressure for Canadian contributions. Shipment of No. 5 wheat would be a poor advertisement for Canada even though this grade had approximately the same nutritional value as higher grades. Good grades would again be available in about three months. While it might be desirable to make some gesture to India, elements of the public appeared to believe that Canada, despite its limited population, was in some way in a position to put an end to the succession of famines in India. As there were many wealthy individuals in India, and the Soviet Union was being paid for its wheat shipments, it appeared unnecessary for Canada to provide needed supplies without charge.

15. The Minister of Fisheries felt that even a modest Canadian contribution would have advantages although it might be preferable to send a good type of wheat later rather than a poor grade now. It was perhaps inappropriate for a producer of agricultural products like Canada to offer vitamin capsules.

16. The Minister of Justice suggested that the Indian government's attitude to No. 5 wheat was probably due to a feeling that it would be awkward to explain to the Indian public that a Commonwealth country had been the supplier of such wheat.

17. The Prime Minister believed that India's problem was more one of supplies than money and than an offer of funds might be criticized on that ground.

18. Mr. Pearson said that India was both important and vulnerable in the struggle with Communism, and that western aid would strengthen the country's position. Such aid would, for instance, help to offset the publicity that the Soviet Union had given to its wheat sales to India which, during the present year, had been only one-sixth as large as those of Canada. If Canada were to make some token contribution and to give it publicity, the United States, where Congress was making slow progress in considering a sizeable gift, as well as several other countries, might well take similar action. The cumulative effect of a Canadian gesture should, therefore, have beneficial results in India. The question of a Canadian contribution might usefully be considered again when a full report was available on the supply situation in Canada.

19. Mr. St-Laurent considered that, in due course, the Indian government should be given an indication of the supplies available for purchase and informed that, if there was any problem in payment, the Canadian government would be prepared to give consideration to accepting payment in kind or to finding some other solution.

20. The Cabinet, after considerable further discussion, noted the report of the Secretary of State for External Affairs on the question of a Canadian contribution towards famine relief in India, and agreed, tentatively, that the Indian government should in due course be informed of the supplies available in Canada for purchase, with an indication that, should there be difficulty in paying for any such supplies, the Canadian government would be prepared to give consideration to accepting payment in kind or to finding some other solution; the question of Canadian policy in the matter to be considered further when a comprehensive report on the supply situation in Canada was available.

CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa], May 29, 1951

FOOD FOR INDIA

Mr. Banerjee has been in touch with the Department on the points which he discussed with you and me at our meeting on Thursday morning, May 17.

I. Refusal to Take No. 5 Wheat

2. He said that the Indian Government did not wish to receive No. 5 wheat as a gift at this stage for free distribution in the famine areas. (In our conversation we had not, of course, been able to specify any quantity and had warned him that even No. 5 was now contracted for). The reasons he gave were that it was hoped that a rice agreement concluded with Burma a few days ago would supply the food urgently required for the famine areas in Madras State, which is a rice-eating area, and that India is now more confident of receiving wheat from the United States before very long.

3. Under the new rice agreement Burma has undertaken to supply an additional 120,000 tons of rice during 1951. (The transport of this will, of course, be relatively quick and easy). Each of the two houses of the United States Congress has now passed separate bills to provide 2,000,000 tons of wheat to India on a loan basis. The two bills have yet to be reconciled on some points, but the prospects are good for early United States action. A new agreement with China was signed in Peking on May 22 under which China will supply 400,000 tons of milo (a small grain similar to millet), with shipments to be completed within five months. These developments appear to have eased the situation considerably. Our New Delhi Office reports that the "authorities seem to think food imports will meet minimum requirements until August."

4. We were told some time ago by the New Delhi Mission, when it was a question of No. 5 under Colombo Plan financing, that the Indian authorities did not favour this grade because it was dark in colour and produced a dark flour when ground into atta (a 98% extraction, normally made by the consumer himself). Banerjee has also given the same explanation and has added that atta made from No. 5 would not roll and handle readily for making chapatis, the Indian unleavened bread. Thus, while No. 5 was admitted to have nutritional value, it was considered unsuitable for sale through the Government rationing system, and it was feared an attempt to do this would cause administrative and political difficulties and perhaps reflect badly on Canada.

5. Some of these objections might even apply to the free distribution of No. 5 to the most destitute persons, though they are not likely to be convincing to Canadians. In any case, the Indian authorities are apparently endeavouring to restrict the issue of dole food as much as possible.

6. There are limited ocean shipping, Indian storage and inland transportation facilities, and these might not be put to the best possible use if No. 5 were also sent to India. There is also the further difficulty that the famine areas are often supplied from stocks in other areas which are later replenished by overseas shipments. Naturally, No. 5 would not be very acceptable as a substitute or replacement in non-famine areas.

II. Diversion of Higher Grades of Wheat

7. We have also been considering the possibility of diverting higher grades of wheat to India from some of our customers who have already made contracts for it. The Department of Trade and Commerce has looked into the destinations of wheat currently moving and reports that a total of 19 million bushels are committed for May, June and July. Destinations are as follows:

12 million bushels – United Kingdom
5 million bushels – Japan
2 million bushels – divided between South Africa, Italy, Switzerland, Norway.

It should be noted that the Japanese commitment consists largely of No. 5 wheat.

8. If the prospects for supplies of food grains for India during the next few months have improved as much as would appear to be the case (see paragraph 3 above), we may be reluctant to approach some of our regular customers with the suggestion that they forego shipments to which they are entitled under contract. It ought to be noted here that India obtained a loan of wheat from the United Kingdom last autumn of 2,220,000 bushels and the United Kingdom might be rather reluctant to make a further loan now. However, if diversion is contemplated, as proposed below, probably the United Kingdom should be approached first. On the other hand, it might be added that in a telegram of May 24 the New Delhi Office stated that as far as they could learn "the Indian authorities are not expecting a large new food offer from Canada".

III. Gift of Other Foods

9. At the interview you said to Banerjee that we were looking into the possibility of sending other foodstuffs. He suggested that such things as rolled oats, powdered eggs, dried milk and vitamin capsules might be included as gifts. You asked him to explore the situation with his authorities. He reported to the department a few days ago that he had been informed that special foodstuffs and medicines to fight malnutrition, for free distribution to poor people, would be appreciated.

10. This answer was so general and vague that we sought a confirmation from our New Delhi mission. It reported on May 28 that the Indian Government "would welcome a gift of vitamin A capsules, multi-vitamin tablets, powdered milk, and multi-purpose food (a soya bean extract) if available". The first three are more urgently needed than the fourth. Rolled oats and powdered eggs are not desired. This list was compiled by the Health Ministry at the request of the Food Ministry and approved by the latter. The mission understands the food will be distributed through hospitals in the affected areas to as many needy individuals as possible. The Department of Trade and Commerce have informed us that powdered milk and vitamin capsules are available in Canada in reasonable quantities.

11. There are certain objections to the gift of such special foods which should be mentioned. The first objection, which applies as much to wheat as to other foods, is that Canada is in constant danger nowadays of being expected to relieve famine (in Yugoslavia, India or elsewhere) merely because we are large food producers; this leads away from "ability-to-pay" on a national income basis, which is now the normal basis for United Nations appeals and which, broadly speaking, is the most equitable. The second objection, which applies to foods from Canada other than wheat, is that wheat is the only staple foodstuff that is produced in Canada in large quantities, that can be shipped readily to tropical areas, and that forms the basic diet of the masses of the population in certain areas of India. Any other food that we sent would scarcely touch the fringes of famine. Thus, our emphasis now should perhaps be shifted from general foodstuffs as such and towards "specific health foods and medicines". Here, again, we must be careful because we cannot undertake to raise levels of nutrition all over the world. Whatever is done must be tied closely to the relief of the exceptional famine conditions in India. Otherwise we might receive similar requests from other Asian countries which we would not be prepared to meet.

12. Nevertheless, it may still be desirable to make such a gift, partly to meet the increasing Canadian public opinion favouring government action on the Indian food crisis. I think you have had in mind a gift of special foods quite apart from our contribution to the Colombo Plan. They would not readily lend themselves to the creation of counterpart funds, since they would normally be handed out rather than sold, which would be the main justification for tying in such a gift with the Colombo scheme. Furthermore, there might be a variety of small items being sent to meet a temporary emergency. This means that a special appropriation would have to be sought for this purpose.

IV. Recommendations

13. Recommendation A.

As India's famine is essentially a grain crisis and as assured supplies from other sources can, at best, only help to maintain an extremely low ration, I suggest that Canada might endeavour to divert some higher grade wheat to India. The United Kingdom might be approached in the first instance to see if it would forego some early deliveries. The proposal could be put to the United Kingdom authorities in such a way that it would be entirely up to them to decide whether they could agree to some diversion. A few months ago the United Kingdom did agree to divert to India some wheat purchased in Australia and perhaps further diversion would not be possible at this time.

14. It is assumed that if higher grade wheat is diverted, it will be financed out of our contribution to the Colombo Plan. The Indian authorities have already told us that they would be prepared to accept better grade wheat from the next crop in this way, and presumably they would also accept it sooner on the same basis. The Australian Government, incidentally, is proposing to make its allocation to India under the first year of the Colombo Plan in the form of wheat.

15. You will no doubt wish to consult your Cabinet colleagues on this.

16. Recommendation B.

As an alternative to A, or quite independently of what comes of this recommendation, it is suggested that a special gift of health foods and medicines might be made. We doubt whether the Canadian Government should attempt to select the special foods or medicines for shipment to India. It might be better to give a sum of money to the Indian Government to enable it to purchase itself such requirements from Canadian sources. It would then have the responsibility for deciding what was most needed, arranging purchasing and shipping, and eventual utilization in India. Such a gift would meet the demand made in Canada for an urgent, concrete contribution to the relief of the Indian famine.

17. I think you have had in mind a sum of $1,000,000 for such a purpose. This you will also want to discuss with your colleagues. If you wish, a memorandum for the Cabinet will be prepared on it. It should be added that there is no certainty that a sum as large as $1,000,000 could be spent immediately in Canada on a limited variety of special items such as vitamins and dried milk. The supply position cannot be accurately assessed unless the exact form in which such things are desired is known. The simplest solution would be to give the money without requiring that it be spent in Canada.

18. Recommendation C.

Until some definite decisions are taken on A and B it does not seem advisable to say anything specific to the Canadian public on the action that may be contemplated by the Government. It is suggested therefore that the non-committal answers prepared for your signature to letters you have received, which are now in your office, might be sent out in their present form and that no statement in Parliament should be made for the time being.

INDIA; CANADIAN CONTRIBUTION TO ALLEVIATE FAMINE

19. The Prime Minister, referring to the discussion at the meeting of May 24th, 1951, recalled that in reply to questions in the House of Commons on May 30th, the Secretary of State for External Affairs had indicated that the government was exploring the possibility of diverting to India some of the current Canadian shipments of the better grades of wheat, and the availability of other kinds of items — particularly health foods — for Indian famine relief, and that it would be glad to help in so far as it could with respect to private gifts for such relief.

Diversion of wheat to India had not proved possible. It was, however, understood that India had now arranged sufficient imports of grain to meet shortages until the end of the year, and that the rate of importation would be limited only by the capacity of Indian ports, which were already overtaxed. It had been suggested that a special appropriation might be sought to permit a gift to India of up to $1 million to be spent immediately, in Canada if possible, on a limited variety of special items, such as vitamins and dried milk. Also, as a request had now been received for the government to help pay the cost of transporting a private relief gift to India, it had been suggested that the special appropriation might include provision for defraying ocean freight charges on private gifts.

Finally it had been suggested that, if further questions were asked on these points in the House, it might be indicated that India was now receiving all the wheat it could handle and that a special appropriation was being sought for the two purposes mentioned.

(Memorandum to the Prime Minister from the Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs, June 23rd, 1951)†

20. The Cabinet, after discussion, noted the report of the Prime Minister regarding relief for India and agreed that:

(a) if necessary, it would be indicated in the House of Commons, prior to adjournment, that India was now understood to be receiving all the grain its ports could handle, and that the government did not consider India's financial position to be such as to make it necessary to seek a special appropriation to permit it to buy special items, such as vitamins and dried milk, in Canada, or to defray ocean freight charges for private Canadian relief donations;

(b) it should be indicated to those requesting government assistance in meeting the costs of ocean transportation to India of private relief gifts that they should make their own arrangements with shipping companies in conjunction with such bodies as the Canadian Red Cross Society and the organization known as C.A.R.E.

6. The Prime Minister, referring to discussion at the meeting of June 13th, 1950, said he had been informed by Canadian Pacific Steamships that the Company were considering an offer recently made by a Greek shipping company to purchase the steamship Aorangi now used on the Canada-Australia-New Zealand route.

It would be recalled that the Company had requested a three-way Canadian, Australian and New Zealand annual subsidy of $400,000 to continue the ship in operation. Under subsidy arrangements in effect prior to World War II, Canada had provided 2/3 and Australia and New Zealand jointly 1/3 of the subsidy then granted. It was to be noted in this connection that this ship could not make more than five or six round trips per annum and her life expectancy did not exceed seven or eight years. Passenger traffic represented 90 per cent and freight only 10 per cent of total revenues. The Company were not anxious to continue the service and wished to accept the offer of the Greek shipping company provided the federal government did not object.

During his recent visit to Ottawa, the Premier of New Zealand had made strong representations for the continuation of the service provided by the Aorangi.

7. The Minister of Transport pointed out that, although the pre-war subsidy arrangements were on a 2/3 Canadian and 1/3 Australia-New Zealand participation, the recent proposals would imply annual payments of $59,000 by Australia, $29,000 by New Zealand and the residual $331,000 by Canada. This would represent a much larger proportionate Canadian payment than those previously in effect.

It was further to be noted that the subsidy requested was based on an estimate of the income required to permit stockholders in the company to receive 5 1/2 per cent returns on their investment.

8. The Minister of Fisheries pointed out that the Aorangi had been operating in recent months at full passenger capacity in both directions. As he had mentioned when the subject was discussed previously, this was the only passenger shipping link between Canada, Australia and New Zealand. If the service were to be discontinued, a major proportion of the traffic normally moving over this line would be diverted to the United States with consequent loss not only to Canadian ships, but also to Canadian railways.

9. The Secretary of State for External Affairs suggested, in view of the fact that New Zealand had shown the greatest interest in maintaining this service, that Mr. Holland might be asked to approach the Australian government with a view to reaching agreement between them to provide 1/3 of the annual subsidy required. If this were done, Canada might consider providing the remaining 2/3 of the subsidy.

10. Mr. St-Laurent felt that from the purely practical point of view continuation of this service did not appear to be sound business. However, there were other important considerations to be kept in mind such as the maintenance and strengthening of links between the free nations of the world, possible changes in the direction of world trade, and so on.

In communicating with New Zealand authorities in this matter, the Secretary of State for External Affairs should probably make it clear that if Australia and New Zealand agreed to assume responsibility for 1/3 of the subsidy, Canada would attempt to negotiate a new agreement for one year at an annual subsidy not in excess and if possible below $400,000.

11. The Cabinet, after considerable further discussion, agreed that:

(a) the Secretary of State for External Affairs communicate immediately with New Zealand authorities with a view to ascertaining whether Australia and New Zealand jointly would be prepared to assume responsibility for 1/3 of the annual subsidy required to continue the steamship Aorangi in service;

(b) if and when Australia and New Zealand agreed to such an arrangement Canada would attempt to prevail upon Canadian Pacific Steamships to continue operating the Aorangi for another year at a subsidy not in excess of and preferably below $400,000; and,

(c) pending conclusion of an agreement along these lines, Canadian Pacific Steamships be requested to postpone the contemplated sale of the steamship.

The Australian share would be approximately $100,000 and the New Zealand $33,000. The total subsidy involved would be approximately $400,000.

Memorandum from Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to Prime Minister

[Ottawa], April 20, 1951

THE IMPORTATION OF NEW ZEALAND BUTTER INTO CANADA

During the last 20 years the annual production of butter in Canada has very nearly equalled annual consumption. Generally, it has been necessary to import only marginal quantities to bridge the gap between the time when the previous year's stocks of Canadian butter have been depleted and the beginning of new production in the Spring. The object of Canadian butter policy has been to seek an arrangement whereby butter is imported only when Canadian supply is depleted and to prevent such butter from entering the Canadian market and depressing prices when Canadian supplies are adequate.

History of Canada-New Zealand "Butter" Relations

2. Under the Canada-New Zealand Trade Agreement of May 24th, 1932, New Zealand was accorded a rate of 5 cents per pound on butter.[53] This rate is still in effect. (Other rates are: preferential, 8 cents; intermediate, 12 cents; general, 14 cents). Section IV of the Agreement provided that Section 6 of the Canadian Customs Act might, upon one month's notice to the New Zealand Government, be applied to goods if their importation would seriously affect the producers of similar goods in Canada. At the time of the Agreement, Section 6 of the Customs Act provided for a dumping duty:

(1) When the export price is less than the domestic price in country of origin;

(2) When a "fair market value" has been established, under Section 43 of the Customs Act, for goods the entry of which is prejudicial to Canadian producers;

(3) In the case of goods from countries of depreciated currencies, when the Governor in Council has, for customs purposes, fixed a rate of exchange higher than the current rate.

3. The second provision for "arbitrary valuation" was withdrawn in respect to Empire Preference countries on November 25th, 1932 by amendment of the Customs Act. The third provision for "exchange dumping duties" was withdrawn in 1948, following Canada's adherence to G.A.T.T. The first provision is the only one valid at present.

4. On March 13th, 1933, formal notice was given by Canada under Section IV. When New Zealand replied that remedial measures could not be taken, an "exchange dumping duty" was applied. On August 19th, 1933, at a meeting between The Hon. Mr. Forbes and The Hon. H.H. Stevens, it was agreed to place before the respective Governments a proposal that Canada should waive dumping duties on New Zealand butter if New Zealand would export only with the prior consent of the Canadian Government and sell at a price not less than a minimum set by Canada. This did not lead to a lasting arrangement. By December, 1933, New Zealand exporters were accepting orders for butter without the New Zealand Government having obtained prior permission from Canada and it was necessary, after an exchange of notes in January, 1934, to reinvoke Section IV.

5. At first it proved sufficient to impound the butter and release it within the thirty day period as and where it could be absorbed by the market. In March, 1934, however, and for the following three years, dumping duties were applied when necessary.

6. In 1937 the New Zealand Government, dissatisfied with the quantity of butter which Canada was taking, asked for removal of dumping duties and admission of a specified minimum quantity. In September, 1937, Canada offered to cancel the dumping duty if New Zealand would return to the 1933 arrangement whereby butter would be shipped only when Canada indicated a need and only to the extent of that need. New Zealand rejected the proposal, fearing the loss of even the small trade she then enjoyed.

7. In 1938 the question of entry without dumping duty was again raised by New Zealand. In a note of July 29th, 1938, the Canadian Government offered to abolish exchange dumping duties on butter "if or when, in the opinion of the Canadian Government, shipments of butter threatened the interests of Canadian producers, the New Zealand Government would restrict shipments of butter to Canada to reasonable and satisfactory proportions".

8. In a telegram of August 8th, 1938, the New Zealand Prime Minister replied:

"Although your telegram of July 6th contained no reference to possible restrictions of butter as condition to abolition of exchange dumping duty, my Government appreciates the desire of your Government to afford reasonable safeguards to the interest of Canadian producers. Accordingly, my Government are prepared to take all possible steps to meet any reasonable requests from the Canadian Government regarding the limitation of shipments from New Zealand, but trust that no such measures will be necessary. It will be understood that should any difficulty arise in giving effect to any such requests, the matter may form the subject of consultation with the view to arriving at mutually satisfactory arrangements."

9. The introduction of wartime controls had the effect of suspending this arrangement, but it was never formally terminated as the method of procedure for normal times. P.C. 2138 of May 23rd, 1940, established the Dairy Products Board with authority to prohibit the importation of butter into Canada without a permit. In May, 1947, the Dairy Products Board was withdrawn from the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act and was established under the Agricultural Products Act, 1947.

GATT: The Present Position

10. On January 1st Canada and New Zealand provisionally implemented the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade. The General Agreement established principles of commercial behavior judged to be in the best interests of all the Contracting Parties. The General Agreement permits the application of dumping duties, for example, when the selling price of butter in New Zealand is higher than the price at which it is being offered for export to Canada. This is not the case at the present time. Arbitrary valuation for duty and exchange dumping duties are forbidden under GATT.

11. Canada has legislative authority under the Export and Import Permits Act (1947) to prohibit import of limited classes of goods. However, the provisions of GATT impose the following limitations on the use of this power:

(a) Import controls of this kind may be exercised only when the commodity concerned qualifies as an exception under Article XIX "Emergency Action on Imports of Particular Products" or Article XX "General Exceptions". Article XIX 1(a) provides for the suspension of obligations incurred in the Agreement "if any product is being imported into the territory of that Contracting Party in such increased quantities and under such conditions as to cause or threaten serious injury to domestic producers in that territory of like or competitive products".

(b) Before such restrictive action is taken, however, prior consultation with the country affected is normally required. If this is not possible, there must be consultation immediately after taking such action. Further, if the affected country considers the action injurious to it, retaliatory action may be taken.

Recent Discussions with New Zealand

12. On December 29th, 1950, the Minister of Agriculture informed Cabinet that private Canadian importers had contracted for a large shipment of New Zealand butter which was en route to Canada. He stated that if such a shipment were placed indiscriminately on the Canadian market, it might endanger our price support program. He felt that it was essential that this butter be delivered to the Agricultural Prices Support Board and, if this could be done only by applying import controls, it was desirable that these should be applied and made effective for butter already under contract.

13. The Minister of Agriculture was able to make informal arrangements with the importers to deliver the New Zealand butter to the APSB. To prevent further situations of this sort, the Minister asked and received Cabinet approval on January 15th, 1951, for import control of butter. An enabling Order-in-Council was passed on January 24th.

14. Meanwhile, the New Zealand High Commissioner, in a letter of January 22nd,† having heard of the discussions, asked that no formal steps be taken until his Government had been given a chance to express its views. In a further letter of January 26th,† he drew attention to the exchange of telegrams in July-August, 1938, and stated, on instructions from his Government, that the understanding then reached was considered to be still in operation and that, if the Canadian Government were concerned about importation of New Zealand butter, the way was open for consultations.

15. In view of this understanding which had apparently been overlooked in Ottawa, Cabinet, on January 26th, rescinded the Order-in-Council placing butter under import control. Later, informal discussions were held with the New Zealand Prime Minister when he visited Ottawa in February.

The Present Controversy

16. Although the Minister of Agriculture is apparently prepared to continue the 1938 understanding, he is anxious to extend its terms and has asked this Department to obtain the agreement of the New Zealand Government not to export butter to Canada without first advising the Canadian Government of the prospective quantity available for such movement and without obtaining the prior agreement of the Canadian Government. The Canadian Government would then reserve the right to:

(a) allow importation of the butter through the normal channels of trade;

(b) request that the butter be sold only to the Canadian Government for their own account and distribution;

(c) ask that the movement of butter to Canada be deferred.

17. Before an approach was made to the New Zealand Government, their High Commissioner in Ottawa wrote to the Prime Minister asking for confirmation of the Canadian Government that it is our understanding "that the 1938 texts contained no mention of formal advice to the Canadian Government of proposals to sell butter — nor of obtaining the approval of the Canadian Government before proceeding with negotiations with importers".

18. This is where the matter now stands. The question arises: how far can we insist that the New Zealand Government accept our request for prior notification without retreating from our commitments under GATT? There are two points I might suggest in this regard.

(1) It is perfectly in order to request the New Zealand Government for prior notification and request that they obtain prior consent before shipping. If New Zealand would voluntarily agree to this proposal it would be our understanding that she would be giving tacit agreement not to question the implementation of such commitments at the Sessions of the Contracting Parties to GATT. Thus the arrangement would be a bilateral one entirely apart from any commitment which either they or we may have under GATT.

(2) If New Zealand does not agree with our proposal, and if we wish to insist that our requirements be met, we shall be faced with a difficult situation under GATT. Our proposals are clearly not in accordance with GATT principles; none of the escape clauses cover the case exactly. Since we have taken a leading part in GATT and have constantly pressed for a strict construction of the General Agreement, we should find ourselves in an extremely embarrassing position at future Sessions of the Contracting Parties. In addition, such action would remove the basis for future Canadian complaints against other GATT countries (e.g., our annual potato problem with the United States).

19. Our conclusion is that it would be worthwhile asking the New Zealand Government to agree to our proposals, but if they refuse, it would be most unwise to insist. The New Zealand Government has been cooperative in the past and apparently appreciates the Canadian situation. Therefore, it would seem preferable to make use of informal devices to meet difficult situations.

20. In addition, while GATT does not give adequate year in-year out protection, it does provide adequately for situations which cause hardship to Canadian producers — as does the 1938 agreement. The relief may be applied only after the first symptoms appear, but it would seem preferable to take this risk than to jeopardize our integrity as a member of GATT.

NEW ZEALAND BUTTER

The Prime Minister has now received the views of Mr. Howe and Mr. Gardiner concerning the reply that should be sent to Mr. Hislop's letter of April 4 about the interpretation of the agreement with New Zealand on butter. Mr. Howe simply expressed the view that the terms of the agreement of 1938 were adequate without any new understanding concerning prior agreement for importation. A copy of Mr. Gardiner's letter† is attached hereto. Mr. Pickersgill has sent me a memorandum concerning the correspondence, the essential portion of which is as follows:

[54] Ce document a aussi été parafé par L.B.P[earson].
This document was also initialled by L.B.P[earson].

"I gather that Mr. St. Laurent's impression was that, rather than reply to Mr. Hislop himself, it would be preferable to have Mr. Pearson deal with him either by letter or interview. I am not sure whether the Cabinet conclusions will show what reply Mr. Pearson should make to Mr. Hislop. I presume he will wish in any case to consult the Ministers of Agriculture, Finance and Trade and Commerce before doing so".

Since the above exchanges of view, Mr. Gardiner has made his statement of April 27 about the floor price for butter in the next two years.[55] In the course of it, he said:

"The government has asked the dairy products board to make a survey of the carryover as of December 1 in each year, and, if it is found that there is not sufficient butter to carry the consumers through to April 1 with a normal carryover, that the board negotiate with those countries whose butter is admitted to Canada on arrangement at a preferred duty for any amount required to be distributed through the trade on the same price arrangement as Canadian butter".

My understanding and that of Mr. Sharp of Trade and Commerce, to whom I have spoken, is that the plan is to have all butter imports by the Dairy Products Board and none by the trade. The best way of doing this would be to have butter placed under import control on the basis that permits would be issued only to the Board. If this is done, it means that the question as to the interpretation of the 1938 agreement is academic for two years at least. I do not think that such a policy would be any surprise to the New Zealand government. Mr. Perry of the High Commissioner's office spoke to Gordon Robertson about the matter the other day and on being told that the above was likely to be the way in which the policy would be carried out he said that it was what they themselves had assumed after reading Mr. Gardiner's statement.

As the matter has not been definitely cleared up in the Cabinet, the best course might be for you to raise it there on the basis that you have to send some reply to the High Commissioner. If a policy of import control for two years is definitely decided on perhaps Mr. Hislop could simply be informed of the position and told that it puts the previous discussion out of date.

BUTTER; IMPORT CONTROL

12. The Minister of Agriculture, referring to discussion at the meeting of May 16th, 1951, suggested that a decision on import control policy for butter was desirable. There were indications that private traders were interested in importing butter at the present time.

Production figures showed that, while output was lower in the early months of 1951 than in the same period of 1950, it had turned up since the second week in May. At the same time consumption from February to May showed a decrease of 6.5 percent from 1950. Storage stocks of butter as of June 1st were 16,109,000 pounds. This was about 16 million pounds below the same date in 1950 but only 5,500,000 pounds below the past 5-year average from that date. In the circumstances, there appeared a reasonable likelihood that sufficient butter would be produced in 1951 to meet domestic demand. If it seemed, however, that a deficiency was likely to develop, the government could review the situation at December 1st and arrange for any needed imports. It was recommended that the proposed Agricultural Products Board be established as the exclusive importer of butter into Canada and that this be done by designating butter as subject to import control under the Export and Import Act with the understanding that import licences would be issued only to the board.

An explanatory memorandum was circulated.

(Minister's memorandum, June 25, 1951 — Cab. Doc. 182-51)†

13. The Prime Minister said it seemed clear that an import policy was necessary along the lines suggested. It was important to ensure, however, that a situation should not develop in which the board would not have sufficient butter to supply consumers at the floor price plus carrying charges. In order that the matter might be kept under constant review, it would be desirable to have weekly statistical reports on butter production and stocks sent to the Secretary to the Cabinet for distribution to ministers.

14. The Cabinet, after discussion:

(a) approved the recommendation of the Minister of Agriculture and agreed that butter be designated as subject to import control under the Export and Import Act with the understanding that, subject to the establishment of the Agricultural Products Board as recommended, import licences would be issued only to the board; and,

(b) agreed that weekly statistical reports on butter production and on stocks in hand in Canada be provided by the Department of Agriculture to the Secretary to the Cabinet for the information of ministers.

PROPOSED AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS BOARD; POLICY ON IMPORTATION OF BUTTER

16. The Prime Minister, referring to discussion at the meeting of June 26th, 1951, said consideration had now been given by representatives of the Departments of Agriculture, Finance and Trade and Commerce, to the proposal to establish an Agricultural Products Board and to the policy on importation of butter.

There were felt to be objections to acting under the Emergency Powers Act to establish the Board, although it might be unavoidable in the circumstances. As no funds had been appropriated either for the Board or for the importation of butter, the proposal to place butter under control with permits to be issued only to the board would amount to a prohibition on imports for the time being. It was also pointed out that it would be necessary for the Cabinet to take decisions as to the quantity of butter that should be imported and that there would be complex price problems in connection with government sales.

It was recommended that the Department of Agriculture investigate with the New Zealand authorities the possibility of making arrangements for the importation of up to 10 million pounds of butter during the next winter and that no definite decisions about the Board or import policy be taken until the supply situation was somewhat clearer about the end of July. At that time, an Order under the Emergency Powers Act might be thought desirable, possibly to take effect September 1st. If it were passed, certain modifications would be necessary in the proposed Board Regulations.

An explanatory memorandum was circulated.

(Memorandum, Secretary to the Cabinet, July 4, and attached revised Agricultural Products Board Regulations — Cab. Doc. 188-51)†

17. Mr. St-Laurent pointed out that, if it were later decided to have the Board established by Order under the Emergency Powers Act, it should be on the understanding that specific legislation for the purpose would be substituted for the Order at the next session of Parliament at the same time as an appropriation was sought for funds to finance the operations of the Board and to cover imports of butter.

18. The Cabinet, after discussion, noted with approval the report of the Prime Minister and agreed that:

(a) action be deferred on the establishment of the Agricultural Products Board and the designation of butter under the Export and Import Permits Act;

(b) the Department of Agriculture discuss with New Zealand representatives tentative arrangements for the importation of up to 10 million pounds of butter for delivery during the winter of 1951-52; and,

(c) the domestic supply situation be considered further, along with the results of the discussions with New Zealand representatives, at the end of July to determine whether action should be taken to establish the Agricultural Products Board and to place butter under import control, on the understanding that any action so taken involving the Emergency Powers Act would be only for an interim period until specific legislation could be passed and appropriation sought at the next session of Parliament.

L'adjoint spécial du secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures au secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

Special Assistant to Secretary of State for External Affairs to Secretary of State for External Affairs

SECRET AND PERSONAL Ottawa, July 25, 1951

Dear Mr. Pearson:

I thought that before returning you would like to know some of the details about the butter problem, which I gather, has been engaging more of the Prime Minister's attention than any other subject for the past few weeks.

You will remember that in the spring there was a good deal of anxiety over the possibility that declining butter production might lead to much higher prices. At a Cabinet meeting in June after you left this anxiety led to a proposal that the Government should set up a board to buy butter abroad and that the new organization should be authorized to make purchases at once. Mr. Gardiner resisted this proposal, arguing that, in fact, an upswing in butter production was already noticeable. With that facility in juggling figures at which he is so adept, he forecast that there would be a 5% increase this year in butter production over last year's figures and that this would be accompanied by a 5% decrease in total Canadian requirements. Under those circumstances no imports would be necessary. As a result of this special pleading, the Cabinet decided to defer any purchases abroad until the trend of domestic production could be ascertained more clearly.

Mr. Gardiner's optimistic production forecasts were resoundingly falsified very shortly after he made them. Earlier this month it became known that the figures for May and June showed a still further drop in Canadian butter production; and the figures for the first two weeks of July have been even more disappointing. About the middle of the month the head of the New Zealand Dairy Products Board was in Ottawa and advantage was taken of his visit to explore the New Zealand supply position. When it was learned that virtually all of New Zealand's exportable surplus had already been committed to other countries, there was great consternation.

It seems that this year, by exception, even countries such as Ireland and Switzerland, which normally export butter, have been in the market for it. At the present time New Zealand has only some 20 million tons for sale. Even if we could obtain all that remains, that would only cover Canadian requirements for some three weeks.

At its meeting a week ago on the 18th July Cabinet, therefore, decided (in Mr. Gardiner's absence) that the Canadian Commercial Corporation should buy immediately 10 million tons of New Zealand butter and should take an option on 5 million additional tons. When Mr. Gardiner learned of this decision he hit the roof. He got in touch with Mr. Howe and protested so vigorously that Mr. Howe decided not to carry out the Cabinet decision, at least for the time being. I gather that the Prime Minister and Mr. Howe both felt that the purchases should be made but yielded reluctantly to Mr. Gardiner's pressure.

Mr. Gardiner is returning to Ottawa next week and a meeting of Cabinet to consider this question has been called for the 1st August. It seems likely that the decision made on the 18th July will be confirmed. Even so, it is by no means certain that the quantities of New Zealand butter which are required can now be procured. The world supply situation is so tight that New Zealand availabilities are being rapidly whittled down. In addition, of course, New Zealand will be in a very strong position to set a stiff price.

You know so well the symbolic importance of butter in Canadian politics and its effect on political fortunes in many constituencies that I don't need to elaborate the importance of this issue. However, you might perhaps want to be reminded of the way in which butter prices affect consumers as well as producers. Inability to buy abroad and consequent shortages in Canada will inevitably lead to higher prices; and a rise in butter prices is reflected very markedly in the cost-of-living index. For example, an increase of 9 cents in butter prices produces a rise of one point in the cost-of-living index.

There is no reason at all why you should trouble yourself over this issue while you are away. But I thought that you would like to know about it before you got back.

With all best wishes.

Yours sincerely,

DOUG [LEPAN]

BUTTER; IMPORTATION; DOMESTIC PRICE POLICY

1. The Minister of Agriculture, referring to discussion at the meeting of July 24th, 1951, submitted a memorandum concerning the butter position in Canada.

Copies were circulated.

(Minister's memorandum, July 31, 1951 — Cab. Doc. 200-51)†

2. Mr. Gardiner pointed out that butter stocks on May 1st, 1951, were 10.2 million pounds. This was close to the normal situation for the years from 1939 - 1951 when quantities in storage on that date had averaged 9.6 million pounds. Records suggested that the government should not be setting up conditions that would leave a surplus of more than there was on hand on May 1st, 1951. However, leaving the exceptional purchases of 1948-49 out of account, there was nothing either wrong or unusual about a storage of 32.1 million pounds on July 1st, 1951.

Discussions with New Zealand representatives indicated that their Co-operative Board had sold the United Kingdom 85 per cent of the N.Z. exportable surplus, estimated at 215 - 225 million pounds, at a price of approximately 39 cents Canadian funds f.o.b. New Zealand ports. This would be at the rate of 41 1/4 cents a pound laid down at Halifax. It appeared that New Zealand was prepared to sell Canada 10 million or more pounds of butter at 58 cents a pound. The duty paid cost would be 63 cents a pound. This price appeared to be too high in relation to the price paid by the United Kingdom.

If it was thought that some butter should be purchased from New Zealand, it should not be more than 10 million pounds. There should also be an announcement that, for three or four months at least, the government would pay an incentive price to Canadian producers which was slightly higher than the trade had paid to date. This, together with purchases from New Zealand, would put more butter on the market in Canada than was required. If a plan along these lines were to be followed, the Agricultural Products Board, the establishment of which had been recommended previously, should be given authority to purchase all imported butter under a system of permits.

3. The Minister of Trade and Commerce thought that, as all purchases at present were well above the floor price of 58 cents, it would be undesirable to raise the floor. Account had to be taken of the effect of butter prices on the cost of living. An announcement would be made shortly that the index for June had gone up by 3.5 points. From January to July the increase was 15 points, of which food made up 9.1 points. Butter alone was responsible for .6 of a point of increase. He was of the opinion that it was not desirable for the government to remain in the position of determining the amount of butter to be imported. The best course might be to announce that importations would not be restricted and to allow the trade to bring in whatever butter it could secure at such prices as might be available.

4. The Prime Minister believed that, if the importation of butter was thrown entirely open to the trade, there might be a feeling by producers that this would cause them substantial injury. At the same time, it was not desired, particularly, to increase domestic production of butter if farmers had satisfactory alternative outlets. The only government obligation was to enable the domestic producer to rely on the Canadian market to whatever extent it was profitable for him to do so, having regard to other types of production and sources of income.

In assessing the present supply position, it did not appear to be valid to base conclusions on the situation that had prevailed several years back when conditions were very different. On May 1st, 1950, there had been 28 million pounds in stock. In the spring of 1951, although there were still 10 million pounds on hand, this did not prevent a serious jump in prices. It seemed clear that under present marketing conditions a carry-over of 10 million pounds could not be regarded as adequate.

It appeared from the 1950-51 experience that it was necessary for the government to have substantial stocks of butter under its own control if prices were not to get out of hand in the spring. In the circumstances, a possible course might be to purchase 10 million pounds of butter from New Zealand at the offered price of 58 cents per pound c.i.f. Halifax which, with duty, would result in a price of 63 cents. In addition, an option might be taken on another 10 million pounds but on the declared basis that, if 10 million pounds of butter were received by the government from domestic production at 63 cents per pound, the option would not be exercised. Under this proposal the government would not stand ready to buy unlimited quantities of butter at 63 cents and it would have to be made clear that the government was not raising the floor price to that figure. It would simply be an offer open until 10 million pounds had been received. In purchasing butter at that figure the government policy would be to resell in February or March at the lowest possible figure — the purchase price plus carrying charges.

5. The Cabinet, after considerable discussion, agreed that:

(a) negotiations be entered into with New Zealand for the purchase of 10 million pounds of butter at 58 cents per pound c.i.f. Halifax or Montreal, and for an option to purchase such additional amount of butter as might be available up to 10 million pounds;

(b) in announcing its decision, the government state that it would be prepared to buy butter from domestic production at 63 cents per pound until 10 million pounds had been received and that, if that amount of butter were received, it would not exercise the option to purchase from New Zealand;

(c) the government indicate that butter imported from New Zealand or purchased out of domestic production would be held for sale at a later date preferably after February 1st, 1952, at cost plus carrying charges; and,

(d) the Minister of Agriculture submit to the Cabinet for subsequent approval a draft announcement to the above effect and such additional measures as might be necessary to implement the policy.

BUTTER; IMPORTS AND DOMESTIC PURCHASES

1. The Prime Minister, referring to discussion at the meeting of July 31st, 1951, reported that a submission to Council had been prepared to implement the previous decision to have the Agricultural Products Board purchase up to 10 million pounds of butter for importation into Canada and to take an option on an additional amount up to 10 million pounds at a price not to exceed 63 cents per pound, landed in Montreal. Further negotiations with New Zealand showed that the price presently being asked there would be over 63 cents. It appeared that 3 million pounds of butter could be bought from Denmark at a landed price of 60.3 cents and that an option might be possible on an additional 3 million pounds. Butter had been offered from the Netherlands at 64 cents and it might be possible to secure some at a lower price.

The Deputy Minister of Agriculture had reported butter consumption to be down by 9 per cent in July and production up by 4 per cent, as compared with 1950. Butter stocks had improved between July 1st and August 1st, by 2,873,000 pounds. It has also been found that import orders placed by the private trade prior to August 1st amounted to 4,424,000 pounds. In the circumstances, it was suggested that consideration might be given to reducing purchases by the Agricultural Products Board from 10 million pounds to 6 million pounds. It was also suggested that the price for domestic purchases be set at 64 cents per pound basis delivery Montreal.

2. Mr. St-Laurent pointed out that the decision to buy up to 10 million pounds of butter abroad and take an option on an additional 10 million pounds had been taken at a well-attended Cabinet meeting. It should probably not be altered without further consideration by a majority of ministers. The same applied to the domestic purchase price which had been set tentatively at 63 cents to equal the expected duty-paid cost of imported butter.

An explanatory document was circulated.

(Letter, Deputy Minister of Agriculture to the Secretary to the Cabinet, August 14 — Cab. Doc. 210-51; letter, Deputy Minister of Agriculture to the Prime Minister, August 15; memoranda, Secretary to the Cabinet to the Prime Minister, August 15)†

3. The Cabinet, after discussion, agreed that:

(a) formal direction be given to the Agricultural Products Board to purchase up to 10 million pounds of butter from other countries and to take an option on additional quantities up to 10 million pounds; the price of purchase and the option price not to exceed 63 cents per pound, landed in Montreal; an Order in Council to be passed accordingly; and,

(b) no decision be taken to reduce purchases abroad to 6 million pounds or to set the price for domestic purchases of butter at 64 cents per pound without full consideration by the Cabinet.

BUTTER; REPORT ON IMPORTS AND PROPOSED ARRANGEMENTS FOR SALE; PROCEDURE FOR PURCHASE OF DOMESTIC BUTTER

1. The Prime Minister, referring to discussion at the meeting of August 22nd, 1951, said a report had been received from the Department of Agriculture that the Agricultural Products Board had now purchased, for import, 10 million pounds of butter — 3 million from Denmark and the same quantity from Sweden at 60.3 cents per pound, 1 million from the Netherlands at 60 cents and 3 million from New Zealand at 63 cents — all prices duty-paid, c.i.f. Montreal. Negotiations were proceeding for options on an additional 10 million pounds. The European butter would be up to Canadian standards but there was some uncertainty as to its storing quality and acceptability to the Canadian trade. For these reasons, it was proposed to put the European butter into consumption shortly after it landed and to take from the Canadian trade in return equal quantities of Canadian butter in store. To do this, it would be necessary to pay the trade approximately 2 cents per pound.

Funds for the purchase of imported butter were being made available by the Canadian Commercial Corporation but they could not be used to purchase domestic butter. The only source of funds appeared to be the Agricultural Prices Support account and it was recommended that the government authorize the Agricultural Prices Support Board to prescribe a price of 63 cents per pound for the purchase of not more than 10 million pounds of Canadian butter.

An explanatory memorandum was circulated.

(Memorandum, Secretary to the Cabinet, Aug. 29, 1951 — Cab. Doc. 223-51)†

2. The Cabinet, after discussion, noted with approval the report concerning imports and domestic purchases of butter and agreed that:

(a) the Agricultural Products Board be authorized to make arrangements with the butter trade to put European butter into consumption shortly after it landed, to take in return equal quantities of Canadian butter in store and, for this purpose, to pay to the trade up to 2 cents per pound as required; and,

(b) the Agricultural Prices Support Board be authorized to purchase first grade creamery butter produced in Canada at 63 cents per pound basis delivery Halifax, Saint John, Montreal and Toronto and 62 cents per pound basis delivery Vancouver; purchases at such prices to be not in excess of 10 million pounds; an Order in Council to be passed accordingly.

Note du greffier du Conseil privé et secrétaire du Cabinet pour le premier ministre

Memorandum from Clerk of Privy Council and Secretary to Cabinet to Prime Minister

Ottawa, September 4, 1951

NEW ZEALAND PROTEST CONCERNING BUTTER

Attached is a despatch which has just been received from the High Commissioner for New Zealand conveying an expression of dissatisfaction from the Government of New Zealand about the recent handling of butter purchases by this country.

The sequence of negotiations is set forth from the New Zealand point of view. While a number of grounds for dissatisfaction are advanced, the core of it is that New Zealand had refrained from making sales to the private butter trade, although approached with offers, because of the understanding that the Canadian government wished to have sales made only after prior agreement by the government. Accordingly they suffered injury when private traders placed orders in other countries which are to be left without interference and subsequently when the Agricultural Products Board purchased the bulk of its butter from countries other than New Zealand. They claim that New Zealand was not given a first preference in the Canadian market as they had understood they would be given and that the action of the Agricultural Products Board is contrary to both the spirit and the letter of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade. (From a quick look at Article 17 (which is on non-discrimination) I do not think this last point is to be taken seriously.)

While we have never had a clear report on exactly what took place in the negotiations, it would appear probable that New Zealand has some ground to feel aggrieved if, in fact, sales were not made to private traders out of deference for their understanding of the Canadian government position with regard to prior approval of imports.

So far as the Agricultural Products Board's purchases are concerned, it is difficult to see that they can claim New Zealand was not given first preference. My understanding is that they were, in fact, given first preference but that they were not prepared to meet prices that could be secured from other sources. On the question of price, there is one small mystery in that the Department of Agriculture report to the Cabinet on August 15 was that the New Zealand landed price in Montreal would be over 63¢ per pound while the despatch states that New Zealand stood ready to provide butter at 58¢ c.i.f. Montreal, which would be 63¢ with the addition of duty.

It is indicated that the Chairman of the New Zealand Dairy Products Marketing Commission will be visiting Ottawa on September 8 and hoping to discuss butter with representatives of the Canadian government. Perhaps the sense of grievance could be met if some options were taken on a certain amount of New Zealand butter or if specific purchases could be made for future delivery. The original Cabinet intention was that we should be in a position to have 20 million pounds of imported butter during the coming season. At the present date, 10 million pounds have been bought by the Agricultural Products Board and 4 1/2 million pounds by the trade. We would almost certainly not be in a surplus position if another 5 1/2 million pounds were bought from New Zealand for future delivery. That would be less than a week's supply.

I am having this matter placed on the agenda for discussion by the Cabinet, tomorrow. The Department of External Affairs is having copies of the despatch circulated to all Ministers directly concerned. I believe the Department of Agriculture is preparing a memorandum† on the question and I shall try to see that it is available for tomorrow.

[PIÈCE JOINTE/ENCLOSURE]

Le haut-commissaire de la Nouvelle-Zélande
au secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

High Commissioner of New Zealand to Secretary of State for External Affairs

Ottawa, September 1, 1951

Sir,

I desire, pursuant to the instructions of my Government, to draw the attention of the Government of Canada to the contracts recently made by the Canadian Agricultural Products Board for the importation of butter into Canada for the current season. I am instructed to say that in view of the agreement upon this subject made between our respective Governments in 1932 and renewed in an exchange of letters in 1938, followed by a personal conference of our respective Prime Ministers in 1951 which declared the said agreement as still operative, and in view of the recent negotiations and discussions between the Chairman of the New Zealand Dairy Products Marketing Commission, Mr. W.W. Marshall, and the representatives of the Government of Canada, and, mindful of the warm feelings of friendship that exist between the people of your country and mine, manifested alike in peace and in war, my Government, with great regret, feels impelled to make known to your government its feelings of grave disquiet and dissatisfaction concerning the negotiations and subsequent allocation of contracts above referred to for the import of butter into Canada. It is desired that the following representations be regarded as preliminary, pending the arrival here on 8 September of Mr. Marshall, Chairman of the New Zealand Dairy Products Marketing Commission, to whom it is desired there be given the opportunity of discussing upon his arrival this and relevant matters with the representatives of the Canadian Government.

I proceed, under my instructions, to give the following précis of the matters leading up to the negotiations and of the negotiations themselves in respect of the conduct and results of which this letter is presented to you.

(1) During the visit of the Rt. Hon. S.G. Holland to Canada in January last, the butter situation was discussed by him with the Rt. Hon. L.S. St. Laurent and the Rt. Hon. C.D. Howe. It is our understanding that Mr. St. Laurent assured Mr. Holland that the terms of the 1938 exchange of letters still held good and Mr. Holland gave appropriate assurances on New Zealand's behalf. It is my understanding also that Mr. Howe assured Mr. Holland that if Canada required butter, New Zealand would get first preference for any orders placed.

(2) During May last, Mr. Marshall interviewed officials and traders in Canada and ascertained that, on estimates made at that time, Canada would need about 20 million pounds of imported butter. This estimate was confirmed to the Hon. C.M. Bowden, New Zealand Minister of Customs, when the latter visited Canada.

(3) The New Zealand Dairy Products Marketing Commission, during the ensuing discussions in the United Kingdom for the purchase of New Zealand dairy products by the United Kingdom, took steps to reserve additional quantities of butter for sale outside the United Kingdom contract so as to be able to meet Canada's requirements.

(4) Pressing offers to purchase New Zealand butter were received from Canadian importers both during and subsequent to the negotiations in the United Kingdom but these were declined in order to fit in with Canadian Government policy.

(5) On 12 and 13 July, Mr. Marshall had discussions with the Rt. Hon. C.D. Howe, then Acting Prime Minister, and also with officials of the Department of Agriculture and the Department of Trade and Commerce. Mr. Marshall offered either:

(a) to sell to the trade at quantities and prices satisfactory to the Canadian Government and the trade: or

(b) to sell to the Canadian Government subject to agreement on prices and delivery dates.

Mr. Marshall told the Rt. Hon. Mr. Howe that he was prepared then and there to sell 20 million pounds of butter and was given to understand that an immediate purchase of this quantity could be effected at the time. However, to ensure that the Canadian Government would have every reasonable opportunity to consider the matter, Mr. Marshall did not press for an immediate decision.

(6) On 13 July, as a result of further discussions, Mr. Marshall made a firm offer to Mr. L.W. Pearsall of the Department of Agriculture of 6 million pounds forthwith, with a limited option over a further 4 million pounds. The Canadian officials undertook to make every endeavour to reply to this offer by 20 July. Mr. Marshall agreed on his part to continue holding off dealings with private dealers meantime.

(7) A decision was again deferred and this offer was left open until 31 July.

(8) On 1 August Mr. Pearsall advised that the Canadian Government was prepared to make an immediate purchase of a quantity of 10 million pounds and a request was also made for an option on a further quantity of up to 10 million pounds to 1 January 1952. At the same time, negotiations on price were commenced.

(9) On 2 August Mr. Pearsall was informed that the New Zealand Dairy Products Marketing Commission was prepared to make an immediate sale of 10 million pounds and would give an option on a further 6 million pounds to 1 October 1951. He was advised that the Commission adhered to the original price tentatively mentioned during Mr. Marshall's talks in Ottawa in July, that is, 58 cents C.I.F. Montreal.

(10) On the same day the New Zealand Dairy Products Marketing Commission was informed in reply that the Canadian Government would consider a price of 58 cents C.I.F. Montreal but for any deliveries at Halifax or Vancouver they would suggest a price of 56 3/4 cents C.I.F., the difference being the estimated additional haulage charges.

(11) On 3 August the Canadian authorities were advised that the Commission would agree to a price of 58 cents C.I.F. for deliveries at Montreal or Vancouver and 57 cents C.I.F. for deliveries at Halifax.

(12) On 3 August the Rt. Hon. J.G. Gardiner made an announcement which included the following points:

The decision to create an Agricultural Products Board with authority to purchase 10 million pounds of butter and to take options on a further 10 million pounds. The Board was also given power to buy quantities of Canadian butter at a figure approximating the local market price.

(b) The decision to control private imports except that permits would be issued in respect of contracts entered into before 1 August.

(13) On 8 August a decision had still not been reached and the Agricultural Products Board asked for a further extension of time (up to 18 August) to allow time for negotiations with other countries. The Board also suggested that if the Commission insisted on an immediate decision it might be necessary to make a limited offer only.

(14) On 9 August the Agricultural Products Board was informed that the Commission's offer to sell 10 million pounds and give an option on a further 6 million pounds was withdrawn on the grounds that the action of the Canadian Government in calling on foreign bids and considering a reduction in the quantity agreed to by New Zealand was a breach of faith, particularly when it was considered that New Zealand had refrained over a considerable period from selling to the trade. The Board was informed that the Commission could not consider the matter further unless there was a firm offer to buy.

(15) On 16 August the Agricultural Products Board made a firm offer to purchase 3 million pounds at a price of 57 cents C.I.F. Montreal, this offer to be conditional on an option to purchase a further 2 million pounds for delivery before 1 March 1952 at 58 cents C.I.F. Montreal or Vancouver and 56 3/4 cents Halifax.

(16) On 17 August the Commission declined this offer.

(17) On 22 August the Agricultural Products Board made a firm offer to purchase 3 million pounds at 58 cents C.I.F. Montreal. This offer was accepted.

I am instructed to state my Government's dissatisfaction with the negotiations on the following grounds:

(1) The decision of the Canadian Government to control private imports and to set up a monopoly buying organisation had the effect of taking away from New Zealand the selling advantages which existed under conditions of free trade. The Canada-New Zealand Trade Agreement, which gave New Zealand certain duty advantages, presupposed a condition of free trade and, therefore, New Zealand would expect not to be placed in a comparatively disadvantageous position through the Government's assumption of monopoly purchasing power. Canadian importers were given up to August 15 to obtain permits to import foreign butter bought prior to August 1. It is understood that the quantity so purchased amounts to about 4 1/2 million pounds, of which 3 million pounds will come from Sweden. It is a fact that the trade prefers New Zealand butter and this was evidenced by the efforts to purchase New Zealand butter from the Commission. We are confident that the trade would have bought from New Zealand had the Commission been prepared to sell. The Commission, however, acting in good faith and relying on the negotiations which had been conducted with the Canadian Government, refused the opportunity to take advantage of the situation.

(2) It has been reported that the Canadian Agricultural Products Board has bought 3 million pounds of butter from Denmark, 3 million pounds from Sweden and approximately 1 million pounds from the Netherlands. My Government feels that this position, viewed in the light of the negotiations mentioned above, contrasts strongly with the assurances given earlier in the year that New Zealand would get first preference in Canada.

(3) On the subject of price, it is understood that the Rt. Hon. the Minister of Agriculture has been reported criticising imports of New Zealand butter in the past on the grounds that the New Zealand butter, if imported at lower prices than Canadian, could injure Canadian dairy interests. My Government is satisfied that it has complied with the terms of the 1932 Trade Agreement and the understandings reached thereunder to which I have referred above. In particular, on the current transaction, New Zealand has sought to avoid any possibility of criticism and has offered butter this year at a price which would accord with the established Canadian market price and which, we have every reason to believe, would have been acceptable to the trade under free market conditions.

(4) My Government is concerned with its position under the New Zealand-Canada Trade Agreement of 1932. The Rt. Hon. the Minister of Agriculture has indicated that Canadian butter will be bought at prices in line with market values which are above the support level. The experience of the negotiations suggests that the Agricultural Products Board is not prepared to offer Canadian market prices on imported butter which is apparently to be balanced against the local purchases. My Government feel that this policy is equivalent to an increase of duty on all imported butter.

(5) Sales to Canada under these conditions are limited to quantities the Government will buy at prices they are willing to pay. New Zealand loses its traditional advantage which could be described as a traders' and consumers' preference.

(6) Finally, my Government feels that the action taken by the Agricultural Products Board is contrary to both the spirit and the letter of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade. I am asked to refer you particularly to Article XVII of the Agreement.

I should be pleased if you would bring this letter to the attention of your colleagues.

I have, etc.,
T.C.A. HISLOP

Le secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures au haut-commissaire de la Nouvelle-Zélande

Secretary of State for External Affairs to High Commissioner of New Zealand

LETTER NO. E-19 Ottawa, October 18, 1951

Sir,

I have the honour to refer to your notes of the 1st and 5th† of September concerning the negotiations on the sale of New Zealand butter to Canada, and the visit to Ottawa of Mr. W.W. Marshall, Chairman of the New Zealand Dairy Products Marketing Commission. In my reply of September 5 to your note of the same date, I informed you that either the Minister of Agriculture or the Minister of Trade and Commerce would welcome the opportunity of discussing Canadian butter policy with Mr. Marshall. As you are aware, Mr. Marshall had an interview with the Minister of Trade and Commerce in the absence of the Minister of Agriculture. He also had discussions with the various officials of the Departments of Agriculture and Trade and Commerce. During these meetings, negotiations leading to the purchase of butter from certain European countries and New Zealand were reviewed and misunderstandings, which had arisen as a result of Canadian decisions with respect to procurement were discussed freely.

It was pointed out to Mr. Marshall that, having regard to Article XVII of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, the Government of Canada on becoming the sole importer of butter, was obliged to obtain bids from countries participating in the General Agreement which had butter for export. Out of consideration for these international obligations, and after careful scrutiny of the bids received from the countries concerned, the Government proceeded through the medium of the Agricultural Products Board to make purchases of butter. The prices paid for European butter were 48, 48 1/2 and 49 cents per lb. c.i.f. Montreal, according to source of supply and type of container. These figures reflect duty paid prices of 60, 60 1/2 and 61 cents per lb. The price for New Zealand butter was 58 cents per lb. c.i.f. Montreal, which represents a duty paid value of 63 cents per lb. Furthermore, the quantity purchased from New Zealand was as great as that purchased by the Government from any other source of supply.

I can assure you that the preferential duty now existing under the terms of the 1932 Agreement between Canada and New Zealand was fully observed, and in any future dealings with New Zealand the same consideration will be given to whatever duty preferences are then in existence.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce has asked me to convey his appreciation of Mr. Marshall's visit and the spirit in which the discussions were carried on.

IV. U.K.-CANADA CONTINUING COMMITTEE ON TRADE AND ECONOMIC AFFAIRS; MEETING MAY 21-25

12. Mr. Plumptre submitted a list of items proposed by the United Kingdom for inclusion on the agenda of the next meeting of the U.K.-Canada Continuing Committee. They were:

(1) Changes in the international economic situation since the last meeting and their bearing on the United Kingdom and Canadian economies.

(2) Balance of payments and questions associated with it.

(3) Canadian exports to the United Kingdom and Colonies.

(4) United Kingdom exports to Canada.

The U.K. representatives at the meeting would be: Sir John Woods, Sir Frank Lee, Mr. R.W.B. Clarke, Sir Leslie Rowan, Mr. Philip Brown, Mr. Philip Harris,

Mr. D.J.C. Crawley, and, from Earnscliffe, Sir Alexander Clutterbuck and Mr. G.P. Hampshire.

13. The Deputy Minister of Trade and Commerce said the items it seemed particularly desirable to discuss from the Canadian point of view were:

(1) Balance of Payments General Review

(2) U.K. Programme for Canadian Exports including Agricultural Products

(3) Estimate of Canadian Imports from the U.K.

(4) Estimate of Canadian Imports of Primary Materials and Foodstuffs from Colonial Sources, including Reference to the Competitive Effect of British Contract Purchasing

(5) B.W.I. Liberalization Plan — General Principles

(6) U.K. Token Import Scheme

(7) Immigrants' Capital

(8) U.K. Post-Torquay Policy Towards Trade with Europe and the U.S.

(9) U.K. Purchase Tax

14. The Chairman suggested that it might be desirable to accept the U.K. proposals for the agenda and to say that under Item 3 the Canadian delegation would wish to discuss numbers 5, 6 and 9 on Mr. Bull's list. The item on immigrants' capital should not be referred to specifically since it was going to be brought up by the High Commissioner in London with the suggestion that it could be added to the agenda if the United Kingdom so wished.

It would be desirable to try to do some preparatory work for the meeting of the France-Canada committee a little later on.[56] It had, perhaps, been a bit neglected and it would be useful to see if a fairly serious job could be done.

15. The Committee, after discussion, agreed:

(a) that the U.K. High Commissioner's office be informed that the Canadian representatives accepted the U.K. suggestions for the agenda of the next meeting of the U.K.-Canada Continuing Committee and that under the third item thereof it would be desired to discuss the B.W.I. liberalization plan, the U.K. token import scheme and the U.K. purchase tax; and,

(b) that arrangements be made for the meeting of the France-Canada committee at a date after the meeting of the U.K.-Canada Committee.

TELEGRAM 884 Ottawa, May 26, 1951

CONFIDENTIAL

CANADA - U.K. COMMITTEE ON TRADE AND ECONOMIC AFFAIRS

A successful meeting of this Committee concluded yesterday. You will have received the statement issued to the press last night.[57] Copies of the minutes† and other papers† will be sent to you shortly. The main items of interest are as follows:

1. Trade and Balance of Payments. Our separate estimates of balances of payments for 1951-52 were very close, except that United Kingdom forecast imports from Canada at 780 million dollars which was more than 100 million dollars in excess of our figure. The United Kingdom side were more optimistic than our own about the amount of purchases they would be able to make here, particularly in the fields of forest products and metals.

2. U.K. Imports of Foodstuffs. U.K. figures for 1951-52 indicate 77 million pounds repeat pounds for wheat, 13 millions for flour, 2.9 millions for cheese, 2.5 millions for bacon and ham, 1.6 millions for canned salmon, 1.4 millions for apples, and 4.9 millions for tobacco. We enquired whether they would take eggs, lard, poultry meat, dried beans, flax fibre, linseed and honey. Lee said he was allergic to eggs, but would look into our proposals.

3. U.K. Imports of Forest Products. U.K. figures indicate 29.6 million pounds for softwood, 10.1 millions for other timber, 12.0 millions for paper pulp, 6.0 millions for rayon pulp, and 4.3 millions for newsprint.

4. U.K. Imports of Metals. U.K. figures indicate 1.5 million pounds for iron ore, 13.8 millions for copper including semis; 11.7 millions for zinc metal; 3.0 millions for zinc ores and concentrates; 27.8 millions for aluminum; 11.7 millions for nickel (including re-exports); 5.6 millions for lead; and 10.6 millions for other metals.

5. Service of Canada-United Kingdom Loan. U.K. figures provide for payments of interest and principal. There was no discussion in the Committee or outside.

6. U.K. Immigrants Capital Remittances. We mentioned that you had left a memorandum with Mr. Gordon Walker.[58] There was no discussion except that Deutsch suggested that U.K. authorities might allow U.K. immigrants to make use of new Canadian Customs provisions, allowing immigrants to bring out settlers' effects (including tools, etc) during three year period after arrival in Canada. The U.K. side undertook to look into this matter.

7. U.K. Open General Licenses. We urged the United Kingdom to eliminate all unnecessary import restrictions and to add specified essential supplies to their very small list of open general licenses for dollar imports. U.K. side emphasized their difficulties including the insecure position of their dollar reserves in the light of possible future changes in terms of trade and the cessation of ECA aid and Canadian loan. They also pointed out that import licenses, even if freely granted, provided a means of supervising domestic distribution of scarce materials which would not be possible under open general licenses. However, they undertook to give sympathetic attention to our recommendations.

8. U.K. Imports of Utility Items especially Rubber Footwear. U.K. side admitted that by imposing purchase tax on imports they were in default of their obligations under GATT and regretted delay in remedying this situation. Woods indicated privately that officials had proposed a remedy, but it had not yet been acceptable to Ministers.

9. Canadian Exports to the British West Indies.[59] We proposed: (a) Addition of about one hundred items to the list of programmed exports; (b) The use of open general licenses for a number of commodities; (c) Some slight expansion in the amounts of the list already programmed. The U.K. emphasized the difficulties of open general licences because of implications for other colonial areas. However, they said they hoped to take steps leading to an increase in Canadian exports which Woods could not quite bring himself to call "substantial". No decisions could be made, however, until the United Kingdom had received the delegation expected in London from the British West Indies next month. Further discussions would be necessary with the U.S. authorities and ourselves.

10. U.K. Exports to Canada. It was agreed that efforts should be made to maintain the enlarged flow, and U.K. estimates of the exports they hoped to make available to us were encouraging, particularly in the field of engineering goods. They emphasized that this would depend on supplies of materials from Canada and elsewhere. There was no detailed discussion.

CANADA-UNITED KINGDOM WHEAT AGREEMENT

SETTLEMENT UNDER "HAVE REGARD TO" CLAUSE

1. The Canadian Wheat Board is now closing its accounts with respect to wheat delivered by producers to the Board during the five-year pool period which ended on July 31, 1950; the final four years of which coincided with the term of the Canada-United Kingdom Wheat Agreement.[60] Before determining the amount of participation payments to be paid to producers, it is felt that the United Kingdom authorities should be advised of certain attitudes in Canada respecting the "have regard to" clause.

2. While prices were established for deliveries during the two final years of the Agreement, there are very many wheat producers and others in Canada who feel that it would be in accordance with the provisions and the intent of the Agreement for the United Kingdom Government to make an additional payment in respect of either or both of these two years.

3. Clause 2(b) of the Agreement reads as follows:

> "The actual prices to be paid for wheat to be bought and sold within the crop year 1948-49 shall be negotiated and settled between the United Kingdom Government and the Canadian Government not later than the 31st December, 1947, and prices for wheat to be bought and sold within the crop year 1949-50 shall be negotiated and settled not later than the 31st December, 1948. In determining the prices for these two crop years, 1948-49 and 1949-50, the United Kingdom Government will have regard to any difference between the prices paid under this Agreement in the 1946-47 and 1947-48 crop years."

4. When prices for 1948-49 and 1949-50 were being negotiated, the United Kingdom was faced with a serious shortage of dollar exchange and the Canadian Government was reluctant to add to these difficulties by pressing for a level of prices which would carry out the intent of Clause 2(b) of the Agreement. Moreover, there was some uncertainty as to what level of prices would be appropriate; in the event the prices set were below those which it was possible in those years for the Wheat Board to secure from other customers. The announcement made by the Canadian

[60] Voir/See Volume 16, Documents 713-723.

Government on January 19, 1949, after consultation with the Government of the United Kingdom, indicates the tentative nature of the price fixed for 1949-50:

> "Representatives of the United Kingdom and Canadian Governments have had discussions on the price to be paid by the United Kingdom for Canadian wheat in 1949-50, the fourth and final year under the United Kingdom-Canadian Wheat Agreement of 1946.
> "After taking into account all relevant considerations, including but without attempting to reach a final settlement of the United Kingdom obligations under Clause 2(b) of the Agreement, the two Governments have agreed upon a price of $2.00 per bushel.
> "The two Governments have also agreed that their representatives shall meet not later than July 31st, 1950, to settle any obligations of the United Kingdom which may then still be outstanding under Clause 2(b) of the Agreement. The extent to which any such obligations will remain will depend largely upon the actual prices ruling for wheat during 1949-50."

5. In May of 1950 the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) discussed with members of the Government of the United Kingdom what further settlement of the "have regard to" clause would be appropriate, and at that time the United Kingdom representatives felt that it would be reasonable that all obligations under the "have regard to" clause might be considered to have been taken care of. Mr. Howe said that this was a matter which could only be settled by the Canadian Cabinet on his return. Mr. Howe subsequently advised the Chancellor of the Exchequer (Sir Stafford Cripps) that the Canadian Cabinet was in accord with the conclusions in the agreed record of the meeting, and it is understandable that the United Kingdom authorities should consider that the matter was disposed of, although these conclusions do not in fact go beyond saying that the question respecting the "have regard to" clause would have to be settled by the Canadian Cabinet.

6. The Canadian Government does not however claim that there is any further obligation in a strictly legal sense and is making no representations on that basis. The Government feels, however, that the United Kingdom authorities should realize fully that the wheat growers of Canada and most of the community of the prairie provinces believe there is some continuing obligation under the "have regard to" clause which has not been discharged. The statements made by several United Kingdom Ministers in Canada were calculated to create the impression among the wheat growers that they would receive adequate returns under the United Kingdom Agreement. It should not be overlooked that the wheat producers of Canada have given support over a long period of years to policies specifically designed to ensure that the people of the United Kingdom would be able to obtain vitally needed supplies of wheat at reasonable prices. From September 1943 on, wheat was provided on the basis of $1.25 per bushel under Mutual Aid. When Mutual Aid came to an end the Canadian Government unilaterally and of its own volition gave priority to shipments to the United Kingdom and placed a ceiling on export prices of $1.55 per bushel. The Canada-United Kingdom Agreement assured that a steady flow of supplies and stable prices would continue.

7. If a further payment of a reasonable amount were made under the "have regard to" clause, the position would still be that the purchase of wheat under the Agreement had been a favourable arrangement for the United Kingdom Treasury. Since all of any such payment would be paid to wheat producers, it would, in the opinion of the Canadian Government, indicate to these producers that their confidence in the United Kingdom market and in the United Kingdom Agreement has not been misplaced.

8. The Canadian Government would be prepared to discuss an arrangement whereby all or most of such a payment would come out of the unused portion of the 1946 loan so as to avoid any strain on the immediate dollar position of the United Kingdom.[61] From the United Kingdom standpoint we feel there would be great importance in retaining the good will and support, for policies of cooperation in the future, of something like a quarter of the Canadian population which is traditionally well disposed to the United Kingdom. This same section of the Canadian community, if left with a deep and abiding sense of grievance, might in future be some political obstacle to the kind of cooperation between Canada and the United Kingdom that successive Canadian Governments have been able to secure overwhelming support for in times of stress in the past. It is the view of the Canadian Government that a payment under the "have regard to" clause which Canadian wheat growers would consider fair to them would constitute a profitable investment by the United Kingdom in Canadian good will.

WHEAT; FURTHER SETTLEMENT BY THE UNITED KINGDOM

6. The Prime Minister, referring to discussion at the meeting of January 24th, 1951, reported that he had learned from the High Commissioner for the United Kingdom that the U.K. government did not feel that they could re-open the question of final settlement for wheat delivered under the 5-year contract. It would appear that the U.K. government appreciated that the decision would leave a feeling of some resentment in the wheat growing provinces of Canada. The High Commissioner had been informed that it might be necessary to say publicly that representations had been made to the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom and Ministers concerned about the feeling by the wheat growers that the U.K. government had not carried out the "have regard to" clause as it had been understood by the producers.

[61] Voir/See Volume 12, Documents 796-809.

7. The Cabinet, after discussion, noted the report of the Prime Minister concerning the decision by the U.K. government that it would not re-open consideration of the final settlement for wheat delivered under the 5-year contract and agreed that the matter of further payment for wheat sold under the 5-year pool be considered at a subsequent meeting at which the Minister of Agriculture was present.

RE SETTLEMENT OF WHEAT POOL

It seems to me the most important aspect of this question is political, i.e. what will be the effect on the Liberal party

(a) of making a governmental contribution to the pool;

(b) of standing pat.

Obviously there is no point in making any contribution to the pool unless it is sufficiently substantial to be regarded by the wheat growers as reasonably fair and just; but I think the majority of them would regard as fair and just considerably less than any figure yet mentioned in any calculations, provided sufficient emphasis was placed on the fact that it was a contribution from the rest of the taxpayers and that it was NOT based on any precise calculations, but merely on the feeling that the whole burden of helping the British and keeping down costs to consumers was not being left on the wheat growers.

No doubt a substantial contribution would be somewhat resented in other parts of Canada, particularly east of the Ottawa River. (In this connection Bob McCubbin tells me the Ontario farmers are so prosperous and well disposed he would look for little if any unfavourable reaction there.)

In the long run, political resentment at what is regarded as a favour to some other group rarely counts; it is soon forgotten when the policy is borne by the whole community and does no special injustice to another specific and limited group.

On the other hand, the wheat growers have been led to expect by certain members of our government, by some statements of British Ministers, by the delay itself, and, above all, by the fact that the Wheat Board, in every year of the contract, sold some of their wheat at considerably higher prices than the British paid, to feel they are entitled to something more.

If the government should attempt to stand pat I would gravely fear that there would be a widespread feeling of injustice not very dissimilar to that which still exists in Western Canada towards the Bennett regime.

I believe it is not merely possible but probable that the majority of the Western farmers would be lost to the Liberal party (to which most of them have finally come back after the 1921 rebellion) for at least a generation. I would doubt if they would go into any of the existing parties and the effect, in these times, of a specifically agrarian group on the unity of the country is not pleasant to contemplate.

I feel it would be better both for the Liberal party and for the country to make a substantial contribution to the pool.

I have been wondering if the British loan could not be terminated (it is never going to be revived anyway) and the undrawn balance applied to this purpose. That would provide a yardstick which seems to me preferable to any mathematical computation; it might also look like rough justice in other parts of the country.

ADDITIONAL PAYMENTS TO THE WHEAT POOLS

You will be aware that western Liberal M.P.s are under pressure from their constituents to have the Government make additional payments to the pools because of the poor crop last year. The western caucus, I understand, was very violent on this subject a few days ago.

2. To meet this outcry, it has been suggested (by Jack Pickersgill, I gather) that Canada should now close out the residue which remains in the line of credit extended to the United Kingdom in 1945. This amounts to some $60 million at the moment and is not being drawn upon. The Government could then use this amount as a sweetener for members of the pools.

3. This seems to me to be a risky and unfortunate method of dealing with the problem. In the first place, Mr. Howe announced in the House of Commons last May that the United Kingdom had discharged its obligation under the "have regard to" clause of the wheat contract. There is, therefore, no moral basis for insisting that the United Kingdom take any further action to satisfy this clause. Secondly, to close out the residue of the credit arbitrarily would be unjustified and unreasonable, I think.

4. If this suggestion is brought up in Cabinet this afternoon, you might wish to head it off by proposing that the United Kingdom might be asked informally if they would be willing of their own volition to declare that they did not intend to draw on the credit further and were, therefore, closing it out. If the United Kingdom Government agreed to make a statement of that kind, the Government here might then say that they intended to use this windfall to increase the amount to be paid to participants in the pools. This procedure would have great advantages over what may be suggested by the Prime Minister, I think. It would avoid raising once again the contentious "have regard to" clause. It would avoid any arbitrary Canadian action in closing out the residue of the credit. It would give western farmers some further financial satisfaction without worsening economic relations between Canada and the United Kingdom.

WHEAT AGREEMENT WITH THE UNITED KINGDOM; FINAL SETTLEMENT

7. The Minister of Agriculture, referring to discussion at the meeting of February 1st, 1951, submitted a memorandum on the wheat agreement with the United Kingdom and discussions relating to the settlement under the "have regard to" clause. Copies of the memorandum had been circulated.

(Minister's memorandum, undated — Cab. Doc. 44-51)†

The feeling of wheat producers that the United Kingdom had failed to carry out the general understanding as to the meaning of the "have regard to" clause was already causing injury to that country in western Canada and would do so increasingly if no further settlement were made. It was at least as important that producers should feel that the United Kingdom had properly fulfilled the contract as it was that they should get the money involved. It might be desirable to make a further effort to see whether the United Kingdom would not be prepared to take some action if funds were provided either from the unused portion of the 1946 loan or by a special credit. So far as the Canadian government was concerned, it had taken the position, through statements by Ministers on several occasions, that there would be a settlement under the "have regard to" clause and it had assumed responsibility for the contract. If it became clear that nothing would be done by the United Kingdom, consideration would have to be given to what action the Canadian government should take.

8. The Prime Minister read the text of an aide mémoire which had been left with U.K. ministers during his visit to London. This had indicated that the Canadian government would be prepared to have any settlement by the U.K. government come out of the unused portion of the 1946 loan. On January 30th, the High Commissioner for the United Kingdom had reported that his government was not willing to re-open the question. It seemed doubtful whether anything further could be done unless the Minister of Agriculture wished to attempt some new discussions.

(Aide Mémoire, Canada-United Kingdom Wheat Agreement, Jan. 9, 1951)

9. The Secretary of State for External Affairs felt that, in view of the U.K. reply, it did not seem possible to re-open the question of a direct payment. However, it might be possible to approach the British government on the question of foregoing the residue of the 1946 credit and turning it back to Canadian account. It might then be possible to use the funds for a final settlement.

10. The Minister of Justice said that, if the U.K. government were under the impression that failure to make any further settlement would not seriously affect western opinion, they were very much mistaken. The meaning of the "have regard to" clause had originally been uncertain but explicit assurances by ministers of both governments as to its intent made it impossible for growers to accept the proposition that there was not something further due under the agreement. The contract and the settlement had become a matter of controversy between economic groups and political parties and people in the west would not be allowed to forget it.

11. The Cabinet, after considerable discussion, agreed that the Minister of Agriculture make arrangements to proceed to the United Kingdom at the earliest possible date in an effort to have further discussions with members of the U.K. government concerning final settlement of the wheat agreement.

UNITED KINGDOM-CANADA WHEAT AGREEMENT
("HAVE REGARD TO" CLAUSE 2 (B))

1. This morning Mr. Pearson, with Norman Robertson and I, saw Clutterbuck and Mr. Pearson explained to him the importance which the Government attached to early action to provide the means of an additional compensation to Western wheat farmers for their deliveries under the U.K. contract during the war and post-war years.

Mr. Pearson emphasized to the U.K. High Commissioner the strength and unanimity of Western opinion on this subject and pointed out that, whatever the rights and wrongs of this tangled subject, the United Kingdom were bound to be the subject of Canadian criticism, unless some early action were taken which would be acceptable to the agricultural community. The Government were anxiously considering what could be done and felt that a satisfactory solution was in the joint interest of the United Kingdom and Canada. This was particularly so because we were likely to have to call again upon the farmers for increased food production against a new emergency, the duration of which might be long.

2. Clutterbuck took the position that the obligation of the U.K. Government under the "have regard to" clause had been finally discharged and that was that. Mr. Howe had agreed to a settlement with the U.K. Chancellor last year and, presumably after consulting the Canadian Cabinet, the minutes of the London discussions had been agreed and Mr. Howe had made a categorical statement to this effect in the House. There could be no going back on this clear record; it was now up to the Canadian Government to "defend" the agreement. They could not, or should not, leave the United Kingdom to bear the brunt of any unjustified criticism when they, the Canadian Government, had clearly agreed that the matter had been discharged. It would be unfair and unreasonable to expect U.K. Ministers even to contemplate additional payments to farmers under the agreement, from U.K. financial resources.

3. Mr. Pearson intimated that Canadian authorities were not expecting the United Kingdom to finance directly any additional payments which might have to be made to the farmers. He re-emphasized, however, the joint U.K.-Canada interest in a solution which would satisfy the agricultural community that they had been fairly dealt with. Various possible lines of action relating to the balance of the U.K. Government's credit in Canada had been considered in Ottawa. Would the U.K. Government, for example, be willing to renounce further drawings upon the credit, the balance of which now stood at some $65 million. If they would, it might be possible for the Canadian Government unilaterally to make an additional payment to the wheat growers, which the latter would regard as a measure of compensation for the prices they accepted under the U.K. agreement. Something like this might be worked out. If it were to achieve its object it would have to be done at once.

4. Clutterbuck said that the U.K. Government did not, in any event, intend to draw upon the balance of the credit. It might, therefore, be possible for his Government to make such a renouncement as the Minister had suggested.

5. Mr. Pearson asked Clutterbuck to explore the possibilities of action along the lines suggested above, with Robertson. We are at the beginning of a new era of joint effort when a mutual assistance programme of very large dimensions would have to be worked out. If the slate could be cleared now of this old score upon which feelings ran high, it would be obviously to the advantage of both countries. From the Canadian point of view a solution was of the greatest urgency. Failure of solution would affect in some measure the unity and level of our NATO effort.

WHEAT; "HAVE REGARD TO" CLAUSE; SETTLEMENT OF 5-YEAR POOL

5. The Minister of Agriculture reported on recent discussions in London concerning final settlement of the wheat agreement with the United Kingdom. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had referred to the position the U.K. government had taken in May 1950 that they were under no obligation to make further payments and said that they adhered to this position. The possibility had been discussed of having the undrawn balance of U.K. credit made available to cover at least part of a final payment. The Chancellor had indicated that he would announce that the United Kingdom were not going to draw down the remaining $65 million in the Canadian credit but they thought it would be presumptuous for them to suggest what the Canadian government should do with it. After further discussion, Mr. Gaitskell indicated that, although the United Kingdom could take no part in suggesting payment, they would consider joining with Canada in a statement that might be helpful in removing misunderstanding, if a satisfactory one could be worked out.

6. Mr. Gardiner said he had suggested this as a possible course but he doubted whether it would be helpful. He had written subsequently to the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom on February 22nd concerning the discussions and in a reply of the same date Mr. Attlee had made it clear that the decision had been carefully considered by the U.K. government.

Copies of the report were circulated.

(Minister's report, undated, with attached letter to the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom and reply February 22nd, 1951)†

In the discussions, the President of the Wheat Pools had presented figures to the effect that the United Kingdom should pay an additional 16¢ a bushel on 600,000,000 bushels, or approximately $100 million. This would amount to about 7¢ per bushel on the 1400 million bushels in the 5-year pool. This calculation was based on the price U.S. farmers received for their wheat during the contract period. A payment of $100 million might constitute a proper settlement.

7. The Minister of Justice said it seemed clear from the experience with the wheat agreement that long term contracts were apt to be an undesirable means of handling agricultural products. If prices fell, the contract was likely to be regarded as satisfactory but if prices turned out to be higher than the contract price over the period there were very likely always to be claims that the government should compensate the producers. However, in the present instance, there was a special consideration in that the "have regard to" clause had been considered indefinite in its meaning and there had been specific statements concerning its effect. The producers' understanding of the explanatory statements by both U.K. and Canadian ministers had not been met. The primary moral obligation was that of the United Kingdom but if they failed to recognize it, it seemed clear that the Canadian government had a residual obligation.

8. The Prime Minister said that, whether there was an obligation or not, it was quite clear that a large part of the Canadian population was of the opinion that the Canadian government did have some obligation if the U.K. government did not meet the understandings that had been given concerning the clause. In the circumstances, an important consideration was that any settlement should seem fair to the persons who were concerned and who had placed their confidence in the government in handling the matter.

9. The Cabinet, after considerable discussion, agreed that an amount equal to the undrawn balance of the credit to the United Kingdom ($65 million) be added to the sums available for distribution in final settlement of the 5-year wheat pool; an announcement to that effect to be made by the Prime Minister in the House of Commons on March 2nd.[63]

Memorandum from First Secretary, High Commission in United Kingdom, to Secretary of State for External Affairs

CONFIDENTIAL [London], August 1, 1951

OBSTACLES TO UNITED KINGDOM INVESTMENT IN CANADA

So far as we are aware, there is no obstacle on the Canadian side to the investment of new money in Canada by the United Kingdom, apart, of course, from such restrictions as the Canadian authorities may apply to domestic investment generally in order to release resources for the defence programme. To the extent that the United Kingdom Treasury releases dollars for the purpose, they can normally be freely invested in Canada.

2. The only partial exception relates to dollars accruing from the sale (or redemption at maturity) of old Canadian securities. Those dollars have generally to be applied against the repayment of the 1942 interest-free loan.[64] Such dollars can be re-invested in Canada only as "direct" investments involving the establishment or expansion of United Kingdom controlled productive enterprises. They cannot be re-invested in ordinary market securities or in Canadian firms which are not United Kingdom owned.

3. Accordingly, while there would appear to be no obstacle to the investment of new money in Canada, there are certain limitations on the use of old money for investment in new lines.

4. The question which was raised with you concerning these limitations may now be somewhat academic since we understand that an announcement is probably to be made in Ottawa and London this afternoon indicating that this arrangement is to be continued through 1953 (subject to the passage of the necessary confirmatory legislation by the Canadian Parliament this autumn).

5. We are still somewhat in the dark concerning the negotiations between the United Kingdom and Canada in Ottawa on this subject, and therefore are not in too good a position to comment on the Canadian attitude or on the case which the United Kingdom Government may have made for some change in the arrangement (a case which has been given considerable prominence in the United Kingdom press and in various company statements during the past three weeks).

[64] Voir/See Volume 9, Documents 343-355.

6. Generally, we understand that the United Kingdom objections to the limitations which we have imposed on their freedom to switch from one security to another are based on such considerations as the following:

(a) Individual United Kingdom investors are being denied the opportunity of switching from a low-yield security to one which might bring them a higher return.

(b) From the national point of view, the United Kingdom is being prevented from shifting out of old lines of investment into:

(i) investment in the development of new Canadian resources in which the United Kingdom would like to have an interest, but could not finance the establishment of firms which were completely United Kingdom controlled (e.g. petroleum, iron ore, etc.);

(ii) investment in the more profitable lines which would help the United Kingdom's general balance of payments with Canada.

(c) The attitude of Canada is more restrictive in this respect than that of the United States, since the latter country allows free switching by United Kingdom residents from one security to another.

(d) The amount of United Kingdom securities which are, in effect, tied up as a negative pledge against the 1942 loan is very substantially greater than the unpaid balance of that loan.

7. We are not sure of the reasoning behind the Canadian preference for this arrangement to an alternative arrangement which might allow the United Kingdom to use these dollars more freely in Canada (in return for an undertaking by the United Kingdom to pay back the old loan in a fixed annual amount with a respectable rate of interest). We may conceivably be arguing on somewhat the following lines:

(a) A continuation of the present arrangement, which merely limits the use of money already invested in Canada, far from preventing new investment in Canada, may actually bring out more new money for those lines of investment in which the United Kingdom is really interested; the argument being that, if the United Kingdom could use these dollars for the purpose, they would not have the same incentive to consider releasing other dollars in their possession. Such an argument, if it ever was used in the past, would seem to have lost much of its force with the recent weakening of the sterling area's dollar position. It would appear increasingly unlikely that the United Kingdom will release substantial amounts for investment in Canada unless it can use funds accruing from Canada (although the expected "unfreezing" in October of the very substantial amount of United States securities which had been pledged against the RFC loan may provide additional resources which the United Kingdom might consider diverting to Canada).

(b) From the political point of view, progress in the repayment of the loan may appear more important than some of the general economic considerations mentioned above, and it may be considered that such repayment is likely to proceed more rapidly if it is related to the amount of United Kingdom securities liquidated annually in Canada than if it is made on the basis of a fixed annual amount — which would presumably be smaller than the expected proceeds from United Kingdom sales of securities each year.

(c) It may be considered desirable, for the purpose of future intergovernmental bargaining on one subject or another, for the Canadian authorities to retain the present degree of control over the disposal of the proceeds of old United Kingdom investments. For instance, it was doubtless an advantage in the case of the Canadair/BOAC deal to be able to resort to such proceeds as a means of financing the transaction. Other similar issues may be contemplated in the future (possibly even in connection with the repayment of the 1946 loan, although the provisions of that agreement would appear to be rather unrelated to the size of the United Kingdom's holdings of Canadian securities).

8. Against these possible arguments, the restrictive present arrangement may be represented as having some disadvantages even from the Canadian point of view. For instance:

(a) If United Kingdom investors were to be allowed to acquire a limited interest in certain companies in Canada (even though those companies might be United States or Canadian controlled), the United Kingdom Government might be more willing to allow the sale of the products of those companies in the sterling area or to permit the release of scarce United Kingdom materials (steel, etc.) required by those companies.

(b) The introduction of some United Kingdom capital into such companies might be politically desirable, since it would dilute the disturbingly large United States element.

Memorandum from Special Assistant to Secretary of State for External Affairs to Secretary of State for External Affairs

SECRET [Ottawa], August 22, 1951

UNITED KINGDOM INVESTMENT IN CANADA

You will remember giving me a memorandum prepared for you by Ed Ritchie on this subject in London and asking for my comments. I am now returning it. As one might expect of anything done by Ed, it seems to me admirable and does not require correction at any point.

2. However, I have now had a chance to discuss this subject (or, more exactly, the arrangements for repayment of the 1942 interest-free loan, which restrict United Kingdom investment in Canada) with Lou Rasminsky of the Bank of Canada. As a result, I can add perhaps a few things which may be of interest.

3. Lou said that the main motive of "the Canadian Government" in all the negotiations over the interest-free loan had been to see that the loan was repaid as quickly as possible. By "the Canadian Government", I think he meant, in this context, Mr. Abbott and his officials and the Bank of Canada. He said that the general view was that Canada had treated the United Kingdom not ungenerously in all the war-time financial transactions and that there was, therefore, no reason for revising the terms of the loan, whereby the proceeds from the sale or redemption of Canadian securities held by United Kingdom residents are applied to reduce the amount outstanding. This attitude had been strengthened, in his opinion, by irritation in Ottawa against the rigidity which the United Kingdom had shown on a number of occasions in recent months in its financial dealings with Canada. He had in mind particularly the unwillingness of the Treasury to make some further payment in satisfaction of the "have-regard-to clause" of the Canada-United Kingdom Wheat Agreement.[65]

4. The United Kingdom Government, for its part, had been motivated in the recent negotiations by various considerations, most of which were listed by Ed Ritchie. Individual United Kingdom investors were handicapped by being unable to switch from one Canadian security to another; and possible improvement in the net investment position of the United Kingdom as a whole was hampered by inability to shift to more profitable lines of investment in Canada. Lou also added one further explanation of the United Kingdom desire to secure revision of the terms of the 1942 loan agreement. He said that the Bank of England seemed to consider it a reflection on the credit of sterling that the Canadian Government should require collateral for the 1942 loan. You will notice that here, as in other aspects of the United Kingdom's financial policy, considerations of prestige and of hard practical interest are inseparably intertwined.

5. The attached memorandum prepared by the Department of Finance gives a good account of the negotiations which have recently resulted in an agreement to extend the existing terms of the 1942 loan agreement for another three years. This memorandum has been sent to London; and, indeed, I think that it was prepared as a result of a request for information originating with Ed Ritchie. Briefly and roughly, the course of the negotiations was as follows. The United Kingdom Government suggested that the residue of the loan now outstanding (some $260 million) should be repaid in ten annual instalments. The Department of Finance replied that they could consider such a suggestion only if the United Kingdom agreed to pay interest on the loan or to make a very considerable lump sum payment now. Although no figure was mentioned, I gather that our people had in mind a sum of perhaps $100 million. An impasse was thus reached, and it was then agreed on both sides that the best thing would be to extend the present arrangements.

6. My own conclusions about this episode are:

(a) that our negotiators took a defensible and proper line, but

(b) that they gave little or no consideration to the political importance of increased United Kingdom investment in Canada as a counter-balance to vastly swollen United States investment.

[65] Voir les documents 616-622./See Documents 616-622.

Even if this factor had been given its due weight, however, I doubt whether our negotiators would have come to any different position, on balance.

7. Nevertheless, I am somewhat worried by the risk that in future negotiations, where the possibility of United Kingdom investment may be involved, our representatives may not attach sufficient importance to the value from Canada's point of view of increased investment here by the United Kingdom. I would, therefore, like to make two tentative suggestions:

(a) that you ask the Economic Division to examine what Canada might do to stimulate United Kingdom investment;

(b) that you discuss this question informally with Graham Towers and with Norman Robertson or instruct me to do so when I have the opportunity.[66]

I have heard Mr. Towers say that he is quite worried over the long-term political effects of the very heavy United States investment that is now taking place. On the other hand, of course, he cannot help but be gratified that this large capital movement is meeting, and more than meeting, the substantial deficit that we are now running on current account. Were it not for this capital inflow, we would now be faced, of course, by a very severe exchange problem.

8. You will be interested to know that the United Kingdom, on its side, has been doing something to relax the exchange control regulations which now restrict the possibility of new investment in Canada. Residents of the United Kingdom may now use capital acquired by inheritance in Canada for new Canadian investment. Until very recently, this was not possible and residents of the United Kingdom were obliged to surrender Canadian dollars so acquired to the Bank of England.

1942 INTEREST FREE LOAN TO UNITED KINGDOM — CONSIDERATIONS AFFECTING CANADIAN POLICY

This loan of $700 million originated in the transfer back to the British Government of the sterling accumulated by the F.E.C.B. in financing the sterling area deficiency of Canadian dollars in 1941-42. The arrangements provided that the loan would be free of interest, would mature at the end of the war, but would be reduced during the war by the application of funds arising from any redemption or repayment of Canadian securities owned in Britain, as well as by the proceeds of any sales of U.K. owned Canadian securities to persons outside the United Kingdom.

---

[66] M. Pearson a coché ces deux propositions pour montrer son accord.
Pearson indicated his approval of these two suggestions with check-marks.

Article 6 of the 1946 financial agreement between Canada and the United Kingdom extended until January 1st, 1951 the interest-free provision and the arrangements in effect with respect to security transactions, with discussions to be held before that date "with regard to the question of interest on, and the terms of repayment of, any balance of the loan then outstanding."[67]

The effect of the arrangements regarding application of the proceeds of security sales and redemptions against the 1942 loan is, of course, that residents of the United Kingdom cannot "switch" securities in Canada or maintain their investment here if the Canadian security they are holding is redeemed. However, on December 19th, 1946, the Canadian Government agreed:

(a) to allow United Kingdom residents to accept new Canadian securities in a reorganization proceeding;

(b) to allow Canadian dollar securities held by United Kingdom residents to be transferred to heirs on the occasion of the settlement of estates, and

(c) to allow new direct "bricks-and-mortar" investment in Canada to be offset against sales of securities for the purpose of calculating the amount which could be applied from time to time in retirement of the loan. It was intended that this direct investment would be limited to the establishment of a new industrial plant in Canada or the extension of an existing industrial plant.

Subsequently provision was made for the financing of the B.O.A.C. contract with Canadair out of the proceeds of security sales and redemptions.

For some years the British have not been happy about the ban on switching. Last December, as a result of the approaching date of termination of the extended loan arrangement, Sir Alexander Clutterbuck presented proposals of the United Kingdom Government for dealing with the unpaid balance of the loan, which by the end of December, 1950 amounted to approximately $260 million. He stated that the Bank of England felt that the present restrictions on switching

"(1) create a predisposition in the minds of United Kingdom holders towards the sale of large blocks of Canadian securities, including securities of the C.P.R.

(2) interfere with prudent investment arrangements in Canada since United Kingdom holders of existing securities are debarred from transferring their investments in a manner which would enable them to take part in new developments in Canada. It is felt that this situation is generally prejudicial to the encouragement of British investment in Canada.

(3) give rise to much irritation in the City and to constant complaints to the United Kingdom authorities regarding alleged discrimination against holders of Canadian securities who are not allowed the privilege of "switching" as against holders of United States securities who are permitted this privilege.

(4) entail a heavy administrative burden on the Bank of England."

Sir Alexander said that, in view of these difficulties, his Government would wish to have the restrictions on the holders of Canadian securities eliminated and that a new agreement be entered into between the two governments, under which the United Kingdom would undertake to reduce the balance to $250 million at the end of 1951, and to pay this off in ten equal instalments of $25 million a year on an interest-free basis. On being told that it was unlikely that the Canadian Government would regard this proposal favourably he made the alternative suggestion that the present arrangements be continued, but the United Kingdom would guarantee that the minimum repayment in any year would not be less than $25 million. If it were less the difference would be made up by direct payments by the United Kingdom Government. In return for such a minimum guarantee, he wondered if the Canadian authorities would agree to allow switching.

The considerations affecting the decision of the Canadian Government to reject the United Kingdom proposals can be summarized briefly. If switching were permitted, British holders of Canadian securities called for redemption would be able to transfer their investment to Canadian securities of longer term. Moreover, since the end of the war a substantial portion of the funds available for payment on the loan have arisen as a result of sales of Canadian securities in the Canadian market by U.K. residents; if switching were permitted, any Canadian security would be saleable in the United Kingdom since it could be used for switching into the desired Canadian investment. In these circumstances it would be surprising if the amounts available for repayment on the loan did not decline to negligible proportions, and, as originally proposed, the $25 million annually would be a direct charge on the United Kingdom Treasury.

It is possible that the U.K. proposals might affect the present volume of direct U.K. investment in Canada. Under present arrangements this investment is financed out of the proceeds of security sales or redemptions. If the United Kingdom were repaying $25 million a year on the loan it is unlikely that they would be in a position to permit much additional export of capital to Canada. Presumably potential investors would be compelled to seek entry to Canada by buying Canadian securities in the United Kingdom (no doubt at substantial premia) and then switching.

In effect the adoption of the United Kingdom proposals would mean that Canada would be giving up the collateral on the loan, and taking in its place a long term unsecured note. In addition, the extension of the interest-free provision for as long a period as ten years would seem to be inconsistent with the intention of original loan or of the 1946 extension. On the other hand, repayment in five annual instalments of about $50 million, even if they had been prepared to undertake this, would seem to impose too heavy a burden on the United Kingdom at a time when presumably they will be making repayments on the Canadian and American postwar loans and might prejudice the position of certain Canadian exports to U.K. and U.S.A. It also appeared that the United Kingdom would not be prepared to accept a settlement involving the payment of interest on the balance outstanding. The United Kingdom authorities were therefore advised that unless the loan was reduced to much smaller proportions by a substantial lump sum repayment, the Canadian Government could not see its way clear to allowing switching. The United Kingdom Government replied that they did not consider the switching privilege valuable enough to justify making a substantial payment now (February 1951).

In consequence, the only solution acceptable to both governments was the continuation of the present arrangements. The Canadian Government has agreed to recommend to Parliament that the present arrangements with respect to the 1942 interest-free loan be continued for a further three-year period, that is until January 1st, 1954. Legislation to this effect will be introduced at the fall session of Parliament. A statement to this effect was announced by the Acting Minister of Finance on August 1st, 1951, at the same time as a similar statement was made in the United Kingdom House of Commons.

In connection with the charge made frequently in the United Kingdom that holders of American securities are in a preferred position to holders of Canadian securities, it might be useful to refer to the different policies adopted by the American and Canadian Governments in their handling of aid to the United Kingdom in the early days of the war. The United Kingdom was obliged to vest and sell the bulk of its American securities at bargain prices before Lend-Lease appeared on the scene in 1941. The Canadian Government, on the other hand, had resisted considerable feeling in Canada that all Canadian securities held in Britain should be bought back as a method of providing dollars needed by the United Kingdom. The Government's own direct and guaranteed obligations, including certain unguaranteed obligations of the C.N.R., were repatriated, but there was only one small vesting of Canadian securities other than Government's and C.N.R.'s. Not only were United Kingdom investors left with a higher proportion of their total pre-war holdings of Canadian securities than was the case with their American securities, but they retained almost all their holdings of Canadian equity securities as compared with a reduction of more than 50% in their comparable U.S. holdings. They have since enjoyed a very substantial increase in the market value of their Canadian equities, as compared with the low prices realized on their large forced sales of U.S. equity securities in the early days of the war. Although not directly relevant, it is worth remembering that there was in Canada no liquidation of United Kingdom direct investments, whereas in the United States a major direct investment, Courtauld's subsidiary American Viscose, had to be sold at a fraction of its value even at that time. It might also be noted that at the end of the war Canada was still in the position of being a net debtor to the United Kingdom on capital account, in contrast with the position of the United States. This information might be useful in counteracting the impression that Canada has been treating the United Kingdom investor more harshly than has the United States.[68]

Note de l'adjoint spécial du secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures pour la Direction économique

Memorandum from Special Assistant to Secretary of State for External Affairs to Economic Division

SECRET [Ottawa], August 25, 1951

While Mr. Pearson was in the United Kingdom, a number of individuals spoke to him at some length about the desirability of increasing United Kingdom investment in Canada. On political grounds, the Minister is inclined to think that this would be strongly to Canada's advantage. The very large flow of United States capital, which is now coming to Canada, is welcome for a number of reasons, and not least, because it covers, and more than covers, the substantial deficit that Canada is now running on current account. On the other hand, this large capital inflow does greatly increase our dependence on the United States. Investment in Canada by the United Kingdom, even if it were on a much smaller scale, might do something to counter-balance heavy United States investment.

2. The Minister would, therefore, be grateful if a paper could be prepared in your Division on the possibilities of increasing United Kingdom investment in Canada and on possible methods by which this might be encouraged. He is, of course, aware that the chief obstacle at the moment is provided by the exchange regulations of the United Kingdom Government. But he wonders whether it might not be possible for Canada, by one means or another, to facilitate investment here of United Kingdom capital.

3. Mr. Pearson is aware of the many pressing responsibilities now borne by the Economic Division and is quite content to wait for sometime before receiving your views on this subject.[69]

ing asked the Economic Division, through LePan, to prepare some notes for you on this subject and you indicated at the time that there was no rush about this. Accordingly the preparation of the material has not been given any priority.

As you know and as is stated in the memorandum, the arrangements covering the U.K. interest-free loan have been extended to 1954. The enclosed memorandum presents a case for relaxing some of the terms of this loan. It would clearly be bad timing to press these arguments upon the Department of Finance now when we have so recently extended the arrangements. If you agree, perhaps we could retain this memorandum on file for six or eight months and then following consideration of the question within the Department make our views known to the Department of Finance. I am informed that notwithstanding their present critical external situation the U.K. Government feels every bit as strongly about relaxing the ban on "switching" now as it did a year ago when the suggestion to relax it was originally made.[70]

Note de la Direction économique

Memorandum by Economic Division

[Ottawa], December 27, 1951

UNITED KINGDOM INVESTMENT IN CANADA

It is proposed in this memorandum to examine the position of United Kingdom investment in Canada over a period of years up to the present time, to assess the political and economic importance of this investment and to suggest possible ways by which it could be facilitated.

Position of British in Relation to Total Foreign Investment

2. British investment in Canada up until 25 years ago was a significant proportion of the total. It is unnecessary to emphasize the fact that almost all the early development of this country was undertaken by British capital; the City of London participated heavily, for example, in the financing of our railway development in the latter part of the last and in the first decade of this century.

3. Since the "twenties", however, there has been a marked decline. This decline has been sharply emphasized by the consistent increase in total foreign investment. This increase is almost entirely attributable to a heavy influx from the United States. No attempt will be made here to explain why the United States has supplanted the United Kingdom as our principal source of foreign financing but probably the most important of several obvious reasons is that by establishing subsidiary plants in Canada the United States was able to gain access to markets in the sterling area protected by the British Preferential Tariff. This does not mean that the realignment had not begun before the Ottawa Agreements of the early "thirties" but certainly the trend was accentuated following these Agreements.

[70] Note marginale :/Marginal note:
Mr Plumptre Many thanks L.B.P[earson].

4. In Table 1 overleaf is set forth a breakdown of foreign investment for selected years:

TABLE I

(millions of dollars book value)

Years	U.K.	U.S.	All other	Total
1926	2,636 (44%)	3,196 (53%)	170 (3%)	6,002(100%)
1930	2,766 (36%)	4,660 (62%)	188 (2%)	7,614(100%)
1939	2,476 (36%)	4,151 (60%)	286 (4%)(a)	6,913(100%)
1945	1,750 (25%)(b)	4,990 (70%)	352 (5%)(c)	7,092(100%)
1949	1,694 (21%)(d)	5,932 (75%)	340 (4%)	7,966(100%)

(a) This fairly substantial increase occurred principally as a result of a flight of capital following Munich.

(b) This decline arose as a result of U.K. official repatriation during the period of war-time liquidation of dollar exchange.

(c) This increase arose out of re-investment by the Custodian of Enemy Property of income held back during the war. There is also doubtless some refugee capital included.

(d) This figure includes for the first time British investments in Newfoundland amounting to approximately $350,000,000.

5. 1949 is the last year for which final official figures are available. Since then, while there has not been much change in the British figure, (some liquidation and some new investment) the United States figure has risen to a new peak. This is attributable not only to a direct influx of new capital but to heavy reinvestment of earnings. By the end of 1950 the United States figure is estimated to have risen to between six and one-half and seven billion dollars. This rise is expected to have been sustained in 1951 and it is estimated that the United States figure will amount to over seven and one-half billion dollars by the end of this year.

Advantages of Facilitating U.K. Investment

6. A strong argument can be made out for encouraging an increased flow of British capital to Canada. As is known, an extremely high proportion of our total visible foreign trade is already conducted with the United States. To be precise 66% of our exports now go to the United States and 67% of our imports emanate from that source. This, in itself, poses some awkward questions for us; with such a high proportion of our trade confined to one country there is always the danger of dictatorial complications arising. We court unpopularity in our international relations generally by our apparent dependence upon the United States and by what must often appear to be subservience to their economic pressures. One of the recent departmental policy papers stated:

"Our bargaining power in political and economic matters has been reduced because of our closer economic relations with the United States".

It is naturally not suggested that Canada should adopt any measures which would have the effect of restricting our trade with the U.S. But what we should do is to encourage in every way we can the development of our trade with other countries. A very good way of doing so is to stimulate outside investment in Canada.

7. Apart from the foregoing point which is perhaps the most important one, there is evidence that once British capital has financed an enterprise, the U.K. Government hesitates, during periods of economic emergency, to cut back imports of the production of that enterprise. In other words, if the U.K. permits investment in an enterprise in Canada, particularly one which produces types of raw materials which the U.K. must import from one source or another but which in periods of dollar crisis could be found elsewhere, the chances of their cutting back imports from Canada at a time of economic stress are materially lessened.

8. A good example of the way a British investment can influence U.K. import policy is the recent British investment in the Kitimat aluminium project in British Columbia. Here the British not only invested capital but made sure of obtaining a stated proportion of the output. The investment accomplished two things. It helped to offset the heavy proportion of United States investment in Canada and also created an export demand in the United Kingdom which ought to be a great deal more permanent than if the investment were not behind it.

9. Another illustration, in this case of an investment that was not made but which well might have been, is afforded by a recent decision of the Dominion Steel and Coal Corporation. That Corporation has had difficulties in recent years persuading the U.K. to provide dollars for the importation of Wabana ore and the result has been some depression in this Newfoundland industry. Changed circumstances in U.K. alternative sources of supply recently persuaded the U.K. Government to approve a five year contract with DOSCO for a substantial tonnage. To meet this contract, DOSCO undertook an expansion programme at Wabana, financing it in Canada. It might have been wiser to explore the possibility of obtaining U.K. financing. Such an interest might well colour the British long-term attitude towards iron ore purchases.

10. Another minor argument is that, to some limited extent, U.K. investment in Canada can be considered as a sort of secondary dollar reserve. When U.K. reserves become depleted, the corrective action almost always affects Canada adversely. It is obvious, of course, that especially in "bricks and mortar" types of investment there is an inherent lack of liquidity and nobody would argue that this type of investment would serve the purpose of meeting sudden and short term demands arising out of periodic and more or less normal deficits on international current or capital account. Nevertheless, as the table in paragraph 4 illustrates, there is ample precedent for the utilization of foreign investment to meet major threats to external stability; threats, which in the absence of such assets, would simply impose the burden on gold and dollar reserves. The building up of U.K. investment in Canada suggests, therefore, a contribution to the means whereby the U.K. could weather the economic storms which blow up every two years or so and which invariably exercise an unfavourable effect upon Canadian trade.

The Interest Free Loan

11. This loan, it will be remembered, arose as a result of approximately $1,000,000,000 worth of U.K. purchasing in Canada during the early part of the war before mutual aid was established. Of this indebtedness $300,000,000 was liquidated through the sale of U.K.-held Canadian obligations, mostly C.N.R. and Canadian Government bonds. The remaining $700,000,000 was formally established in 1942 as a loan by the Canadian Government to the Government of the United Kingdom. The arrangement was that the loan would be free of interest, would mature at the end of the war and would be reduced by the application of funds arising from any redemption or repayment of Canadian securities owned in Britain as well as by the proceeds of any sales of U.K.-owned Canadian securities to persons outside the U.K. In 1946 this financial arrangement was extended to 1951 and in the House of Commons recently the Minister of Finance announced a further extension until January 1, 1954.

12. The effect of the arrangements requiring application of the proceeds of security sales and redemption to the interest free loan is, of course, that residents of the United Kingdom cannot "switch" their Canadian securities or maintain their investments if redeemed. There has been a good deal of press discussion in the U.K. about the ban on switching and some considerable bitterness in the City of London. However, the ban on switching is not, in its effect, outright because in December 1946 the Canadian Government agreed:

(a) to allow U.K. residents to accept new Canadian securities in a reorganization proceeding;

(b) to allow Canadian dollar securities held by U.K. residents to be transferred to heirs in the settlement of estates;

(c) to allow new direct "bricks and mortar" investment in Canada to be offset against sales of securities for the purpose of calculating the amount which could be applied from time to time in retirement of the loan. The intention here was that this direct investment would be limited to the establishment of new or to the extension of existing industrial plant and would serve to bring British "know-how" to Canada.

13. As of October 1946, new direct investments arising from this source amounted to approximately $43,000,000. The Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance recently outlined the terms under which transferral of capital under the agreement could be accomplished. He also referred to some of the investments that had come to Canada through the operation of this arrangement (Hansard, Thursday, November 22, 1951). He mentioned the following among others:

(a) The English Electric Company—to manufacture the Y-100 Turbine in Canada;

(b) Kemball Bishop and Company—to manufacture citric and tartaric acid;

(c) The Vivian Engine Works Ltd.—to manufacture diesels;

(d) The British Oxygen Company—to manufacture compressed gasses;

(e) The Edeco Company—to manufacture rock bits and mining machinery;

(f) Flight Refuelling Company—to manufacture apparatus for refuelling aircraft in flight;

(g) Sir George Godfrey & Partners—to manufacture aircraft equipment.

It will be seen that these items generally represent a specialized type of production in which the U.K. excels.

14. In December 1950, as a result of the agitation in the United Kingdom over the ban on switching as well as of the date of termination of the existing loan arrangement, the U.K. High Commissioner in Ottawa presented proposals for dealing with the unpaid balance of the loan which at that time amounted to approximately $260,000,000. He stated that the Bank of England felt that the restrictions on switching

(a) created a predisposition towards the sale of large blocks of Canadian securities;

(b) interfered with prudent investment since holders of securities were debarred from taking part in new developments in Canada;

(c) put a heavy administrative burden on the Bank of England.

The High Commissioner, therefore, proposed that the U.K. undertake to reduce the outstanding balance to $250,000,000 by the end of 1951 and to pay this off in ten instalments of $25,000,000 a year interest-free. In return for this arrangement, the U.K. proposed that the ban on switching be relaxed.

15. The Canadian Government was not able to accept this proposal. The Department of Finance felt that any transferral of the machinery by which the loan would be liquidated from the sale of securities to a direct charge against U.K. gold and dollar reserves might, during a period of external stringency such as the present, have unfavourable effects upon Canadian exports to the U.K.

16. The High Commissioner thereupon made an alternative suggestion. He proposed that the present arrangement be continued but that the U.K. would guarantee that the minimum repayment in any year would not be less than $25,000,000. In return for this minimum guarantee the U.K. requested that the Canadian authorities agree to allow switching.

17. The considerations affecting the decision of the Canadian Government to reject both of these proposals really boil down to a single fact: if switching were permitted, it would mean that Canada would be giving up the collateral on the loan and taking in its place a long-term unsecured note.

18. This is undoubtedly a cogent statement with a nice, solid, Treasury ring to it, but there is some question whether or not our political and economic interest in diversifying total foreign investment in this country does not outweigh our interest in maintaining full security on the loan or even in ensuring its actual repayment. The obligation arose in 1941 as part of the joint war effort. It was consolidated into a "loan" at the same time that Canada extended its billion dollar gift to Britain on which, of course, no repayment has been desired or expected. Moreover, it is apparent that the "collateral" against the loan amounts to far more than the outstanding balance of the loan itself — $229,000,000 as of October 1951.

19. The argument may be advanced that if switching is permitted and responsibility for repaying the loan is transferred to a direct charge upon the U.K. Treasury, the effect will be elimination of the principal means by which new British capital for "bricks and mortar" enterprises can in present circumstances be made available. It is probably true that in periods of dollar difficulty the U.K. Treasury will feel obliged to restrict the supply of dollars for such a purpose. But in assessing the validity of this argument the net position of U.K. investment in Canada should not be overlooked; it has, after all, required the liquidation of $428 million of existing U.K. investment to produce only 43 million of new investment through the concession we have granted under the scheme of loan repayment. The Bank of England has between November 1950 and July 1951 made available separately — that is, over and above the $43 million — a further total of $3.75 million for direct investment in Canada. This would seem to indicate that there exists in the U.K. Treasury a realization of the ultimate value of investment in Canada to the U.K. external payments position. And it seems probable that the present U.K. Government feels more strongly on this point than the Labour Government did.

Conclusions

20. It should be said at once that it is almost impossible for Canada to put forward any really effective method of facilitating British investment which in the end does not turn out to be either a loan or a gift; investment by a U.K. company in Canada obviously involves the acquisition of Canadian dollars and, if these cannot be made available by the Bank of England, Canada can help only by making them available herself in one form or another. It is concluded, however, that the "freezing" of British investment which results from the ban on switching has an unsatisfactory result from the Canadian, as well as from the U.K. point of view. It creates a considerable degree of rigidity and denies the U.K. investor the opportunity to participate in the present very lively exploitation of Canadian resources which generally may be expected to produce capital gain and consequent expansion in total British investment in this country.

21. In balancing the political and economic importance of diversifying foreign investment in Canada against our interest in securing the repayment of the loan, it would appear that the former outweighs the latter, particularly having regard to the circumstances under which the loan was contracted in the first place.

22. It is concluded that the rebuilding of British investment is of some considerable political and economic importance to Canada and that at an appropriate time the Department should support proposals to allow "switching" and to accept repayment of the loan as a direct charge on U.K. gold and dollar reserves. In accepting proposals of this kind it is difficult to see how we should be prejudicing to any extent our present exports to the U.K. because they are already on or near a minimum basis. That is to say, further cuts in Canadian imports by the U.K. are unlikely since our exports to the U.K. are at present confined almost entirely to necessary raw materials.

Also present:

The Deputy Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, (Col. Fortier),
Mr. A.F.W. Plumptre, Department of External Affairs,
Mr. G.B. Urquhart, Department of National Revenue,
Mr. C.M. Isbister, Department of Trade and Commerce.

I. IMMIGRATION, FUNDS TRANSFERABLE FROM THE UNITED KINGDOM

1. The Deputy Minister of Citizenship and Immigration referred to the decision of the Committee at its meeting of October 20, 1950 that no approach should be made to the U.K. government for an increase in the amount of funds transferable by immigrants to Canada until consideration had been given to other aspects of assistance to immigration. Since that time, the government had announced a special arrangement for immigrants to come by T.C.A. and also an assisted passage scheme for certain categories of immigrants. The objective for 1951 was to bring the total of immigrants up to 150,000 and it was felt that an increase in the level of transferable funds from the United Kingdom might be helpful. Movement from the U.K. was up considerably. In 1950, only 13,000 had come from the United Kingdom and nearly that many had arrived already in 1951. It seemed probable that about 35,000 might come during the year.

(Letter, Deputy Minister of Citizenship and Immigration to the Secretary to the Cabinet and enclosures — I.C.E.T.P. Document No. 88).†

2. The Chairman said that there did not appear now to be the same objections to a renewed approach to the United Kingdom as had been thought to apply in 1950. The representations could be made without prejudice to any other matter. The desirable approach might be to have the High Commissioner in London make representations to the Commonwealth Relations Office and at the same time to let them know that it would be satisfactory to discuss the matter at the next meeting of the U.K.-Canada Continuing Committee on Trade if the United Kingdom so desired.

3. Mr. Plumptre suggested that it would be best not to ask for any definite figure as the new limit for immigrant remittances.

4. The Committee, after discussion, agreed that External Affairs ask the High Commissioner in London to make representations to the Commonwealth Relations Office seeking an increase in the amount of funds allowed to be transferred by immigrants from the United Kingdom to Canada and, in so doing, to inform the C.R.O. that it would be satisfactory to have the matter placed on the agenda of the next meeting of the U.K.-Canada Continuing Committee if the United Kingdom so desired; no new limit of transferable funds to be suggested in the representations.

II. IMMIGRATION; EXTENSION OF ASSISTED AIR PASSAGE SCHEME TO B.O.A.C.

5. The Deputy Minister of Citizenship and Immigration said that the U.K. High Commissioner's Office in Ottawa had enquired whether the Canadian government would be prepared to extend to B.O.A.C. an arrangement similar to that applying to T.C.A. for the movement of immigrants by air. B.O.A.C. was known to have some unused capacity and transportation was one of the limitations on immigrant movement at present. It would, accordingly, be useful, if some immigrants could come by B.O.A.C. It had been explained in response to the enquiry that the arrangement for T.C.A. was largely a matter of accounting since the government was responsible for any T.C.A. deficit. The arrangement applied only to unsold T.C.A. space and the amount contributed by the government for immigrant fares amounted to a deduction from the sum that would be payable to cover the T.C.A. deficit. There would be no such offset against any contribution toward passages by B.O.A.C. or other airlines. It was for consideration whether it might not be desirable to suggest to the U.K. government they inaugurate the arrangement for B.O.A.C. The position was parallel in that the U.K. government had to meet B.O.A.C. deficits. So long as only unsold space were used such an arrangement would appear to operate to the advantage of the United Kingdom since B.O.A.C. would receive at least £55 per immigrant for use of space that would otherwise be unoccupied.

(Letter, Deputy Minister of Citizenship and Immigration to the Secretary to the Cabinet with enclosure — I.C.E.T.P. Document No. 92).†

6. The Chairman said that he did not think the proposition was one that should be discussed formally with the U.K. government since it was a matter of internal financing. He had, however, raised it informally with the U.K. High Commissioner in Ottawa.

7. Mr. Plumptre suggested it might be appropriate to have the matter brought up informally at the London end.

8. The Committee, after discussion, agreed that the High Commissioner in London be informed of the representations made on behalf of B.O.A.C. for extension to it of the assisted air passage scheme and of the informal discussion with the U.K. High Commissioner of the alternative proposal for inauguration of an assisted air passage plan by the U.K. government using unsold capacity on B.O.A.C.; the High Commissioner to be advised that, while it was felt that formal representations on the latter proposal would not be appropriate, there would be no objection to having it raised informally for consideration by the U.K. government.

Le haut-commissaire suppléant du Royaume-Uni au sous-secrétaire d'État adjoint aux Affaires extérieures

Deputy High Commissioner of United Kingdom to Assistant Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

Ottawa, June 9, 1951

Dear Mr. Moran,

You will recall that I spoke to you last week on the question which I had raised at an earlier date of the possibility of B.O.A.C. assisting T.C.A. with passages of emigrants from the United Kingdom to Canada on a fill-up basis. You told me that the question was still under consideration by the various interested departments. In this connection I have been informed from London that Mr. Wilgress has handed in an Aide Mémoire on the question of emigration from the United Kingdom to Canada which stresses the importance of encouraging suitable emigrants from the British Isles.[71] A copy of this Aide Mémoire is enclosed for ready reference. It would seem that the offer which is now being made of using such B.O.A.C. vacancies as may become available is in the line of thought embodied in the High Commissioner's Aide-Mémoire.

I would very much hope that in the circumstances something might be done to accept the B.O.A.C. offer.

Yours sincerely,
J. THOMSON

[PIÈCE JOINTE/ENCLOSURE]

Aide Mémoire

London, May 21, 1951

It has been the policy of the Canadian Government in recent years to encourage emigration to Canada by fostering the careful selection and permanent settlement of such numbers of immigrants as can be advantageously absorbed in the national economy. Immigration to Canada, however, should not have the effect of altering the fundamental character of the Canadian population.

[71] Remis à Patrick Gordon-Walker le 21 mai 1951./Handed to Patrick Gordon-Walker on May 21, 1951.

In order to pursue this policy vigorously, the Canadian Government established a new Department of Citizenship and Immigration under the direction of a Cabinet Minister. Migration to Canada has been opened, broadly speaking, to all persons likely to become readily adapted to Canadian conditions and to be useful citizens. In April, 1950, the period of qualification for family allowances was reduced from three years' to one years' residence. Immigration rules have been simplified to reduce to a minimum the formalities required of settlers. In addition, the Canadian Government is facilitating sea and air passages to Canada by the Assisted Passage Loan scheme, and reduced fares on the Trans Canada Air Lines.

The Canadian Government considers that the absorptive capacity of Canada at the present time is such that it is prepared (notwithstanding the seasonal vagaries of employment and the housing situation) to accept settlers during the whole of the year.

It has become clear, however, that the numbers of settlers from the British Isles have dropped very considerably. The latest figures illustrating this fall are:

Year	Total	Non-British	British	% British to Total
1945	22,722	8,045	14,677	64.6
1946	71,719	20,311	51,408	71.7
1947	64,129	25,380	38,747	60.4
1948	125,414	79,357	46,057	36.7
1949	95,217	73,016	22,201	23.3
1950	73,912	60,485	13,427	18.1

As the United Kingdom Government knows, Canada has traditionally accorded preference to immigrants from the British Isles. The Canadian Government is most anxious that the proportion of settlers from the United Kingdom should be maintained and it has reason to believe that this view is shared by the United Kingdom Government.

Among the factors which impede the flow of British migrants to Canada are shipping fares and the restrictions on transferable funds. Though precise statistics are not available in Canada or in the United Kingdom on this point, reports from Canadian Immigration officers throughout the British Isles indicate that one of the main deterrents to prospective migrants who would come forward, is the limitation of the transfer of funds. The welcome administrative relaxations announced by the Chancellor of the Exchequer on June 20, 1950, have been productive of results in some cases. However, the majority must rely on an annual amount which, in the case of heads of families, is insufficient under Canadian conditions to ensure adequate chances of success in the delicate operation of transplanting whole families to new surroundings.

The Canadian Government therefore feels that the limitation in question should be mitigated, at least for heads of families, as a complementary measure to the administrative relaxations announced on June 20, 1950. The Canadian authorities are not unmindful that when the limitation on capital withdrawals by emigrants was reduced from £5,000 to £1,000, the critical dollar position of the United Kingdom made such action imperative. It is considered, however, that an increase at this time, without imposing a heavy drain on United Kingdom resources of dollars, would lead to an increase in the number who will be able to emigrate to Canada which would be in the interests of both countries.

The Canadian Government, accordingly, seeks to ascertain the views of the United Kingdom Government on the following points:

(a) Whether the United Kingdom Government agrees with the desirability of encouraging general emigration from the United Kingdom to Canada at the present time and would welcome the Canadian Government taking such steps as may be appropriate, in the United Kingdom, to that end.

(b) Whether the United Kingdom Government would agree to raise the limitation on transferable funds, for heads of families at least, in addition to the administrative relaxations announced on June 20, 1950.

Le secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures au haut-commissaire au Royaume-Uni

Secretary of State for External Affairs to High Commissioner in United Kingdom

TELEGRAM 1040 Ottawa, June 19, 1951

CONFIDENTIAL

Following for the Minister from Heeney, Begins: Before you left, Mr. Harris handed to you a memorandum† which dealt in part with a proposal that arrangements be made with the United Kingdom Government for carriage of immigrants to Canada by BOAC. For your convenience I quote the relevant part of his memorandum:

"B. Re Subsidy by the British Government to B.O.A.C. for the Transportation of Immigrants to Canada

Some months ago the United Kingdom High Commissioner in Ottawa inquired whether the Canadian Government would be prepared to extend to B.O.A.C. an arrangement similar to the one applying to T.C.A. for the movement of immigrants by air. Similar representations had been made unofficially to us by representatives of B.O.A.C. immediately after the agreement with T.C.A. was announced last November.

Our agreement with T.C.A., as you are aware, is that this company has agreed to use its vacant seats to transport immigrants, the immigrants paying £55 (which is equivalent to tourist rate on ships), and the Canadian Government paying the difference between £55 and the regular first class rate charged by T.C.A. This plan serves two purposes:

(a) It facilitates the movement of immigrants to Canada (2,431 have used this plan between the 1st of December and the 30th of April).

(b) It helps financially T.C.A. who, by this means, fills their aircraft, collects £55 from the immigrants, which is money found as these immigrants would have travelled by sea. The difference in cost paid by the Canadian Government is only an accounting inscription as the deficits of T.C.A. are paid by the public.

I believe the following comparative statement explains more clearly the advantages of this plan:

	Immigrants	Non-Immigrants	Total Passengers	Capacity
Five Months ended April 30, 1950
T.C.A.	265	2,664	2,929	4,640
B.O.A.C.	190	1,323	1,513	4,033
Totals	455	3,987	4,442	8,673
Five Months ended April 30, 1951
T.C.A.	2,431	2,023	4,454	5,280
B.O.A.C.	362	2,327	2,689	5,184
Totals	2,793	4,350	7,143	10,464

We believe that the British Government could adopt a similar plan with B.O.A.C. You will note from the above statement that their aircraft are still not booked to capacity. In fact, during the period of December 1st to April 30th they had 2,234 vacant seats, which could have been filled by immigrant passengers. These immigrants would have paid £55 each representing an income of £122870.

The United Kingdom Government is assisting financially in the transportation of immigrants to Australia. An agreement such as the one the Canadian Government has with T.C.A. would not cost anything to the British Government (who pays the deficit of B.O.A.C.), would, at the same time, increase the revenue of B.O.A.C. (the immigrants having to pay £55), and would assist Canada in its immigration programme.

I would suggest that during your visit in the United Kingdom you discuss these matters with the Ministers of the British Governments."

2. As Mr. Harris explains, the Government now pays TCA the fare in excess of £55 for immigrants who occupy seats which would otherwise be vacant. This arrangement is justified because TCA is government-owned and its annual deficit on international services is made up from public funds. The fare subsidies paid by the government constitute a reduction of the annual deficit and are therefore largely an accounting transaction.

3. It would be more difficult to justify such payments to a foreign airline. However, we would be glad to see BOAC use its vacant seats to carry immigrant traffic which TCA cannot handle provided they will do so with no, repeat no, subsidy from us. This might be done in two ways:

(1) by BOAC establishing a fare of about £55 for such "fill-up" immigrant traffic. Under inter-company agreements it would be permissible for them to do this if we requested it; or

(2) by BOAC charging full fare, the immigrant to pay a share of about £55 and the United Kingdom Government to make up the difference.

4. The United Kingdom Government might prefer the second alternative since it would not involve fare cutting. No real expense would be involved since their payment of subsidies would serve to reduce BOAC's annual deficit. In either case, BOAC would benefit by the revenue obtained from seats which would otherwise be vacant.

5. The Deputy High Commissioner at Earnscliffe thinks that his Government would be interested in some such arrangement. If the United Kingdom Government agrees, details could be worked out with BOAC by our Immigration authorities. You may wish to pursue the matter while you are in London. Ends.

Le secrétaire d'État des Relations du Commonwealth du Royaume-Uni au haut-commissaire au Royaume-Uni

Secretary of State for Commonwealth Relations of United Kingdom to High Commissioner in United Kingdom

London, June 25, 1951

Dear Dana [Wilgress]:

You will remember that on the 21st May you left with me an aide mémoire asking for our views on

(a) the general question of encouraging emigration from the United Kingdom to Canada, and

(b) the possibility of raising the present limit on transferable funds for heads of families.

I am glad to be able to tell you that the Chancellor of the Exchequer has agreed to increase the amount which heads of families may take to Canada. The present limit of £1,000 in the first four years will be increased by £250 in respect of every dependent member of the emigrant's family provided that the total does not exceed £2,000. In addition consideration will be given to applications by emigrants to spend their blocked funds in this country, during their first four years, on personal effects and tools of their trade. Both concessions will apply to emigrants already in Canada as well as to those going out in the future. The Chancellor will be announcing this in answer to a question in the House of Commons on Tuesday afternoon, the 26th June.

In our conversation on the 21st, I told you that Mr. Holt, the Australian Minister for Immigration, would be coming over fairly soon to have talks about migration and that I should very much like to have talks with you about the same time.

I have now heard from Mr. Menzies that Mr. Holt will be unable to come over and Mr. McCarthy, the Acting High Commissioner, will take the discussions instead. I hope to embark on these discussions at the beginning of July and I should be very glad to have similar discussions with you about the same time.

Yours ever,

PATRICK [C. GORDON-WALKER]

CARRIAGE OF IMMIGRANTS BY B.O.A.C.

2. As reported by the Minister to Mr. St. Laurent he raised the issue referred to in your telegram with Gordon-Walker on June 27th. I myself had previously broached the subject informally, as suggested by you, with Sir Miles Thomas, Chairman of BOAC, and Gordon-Walker. The former had been enthusiastic and the latter, non-committal.

3. In order that the United Kingdom officials have before them some of the facts which might influence their decision, Coté and Ritchie, together with Cumming of Immigration, saw Gibson of CRO and Duff of Civil Aviation on June 29th in an informal talk and gave them the arguments and the figures contained in your telegram under reference so that they may be in a position to brief their Ministers for a reply in due course.

4. I gather that Gordon-Walker may wish to discuss immigration questions during the week after July 9th when it may be that Gordon-Walker will let us know his views.

5. I should think that Gordon-Walker's reply would be a favourable one. In this event we should require to discuss in detail, dependent on the United Kingdom decision whether BOAC will charge full fare or not, what would be the arrangements between BOAC and TCA in London. I assume that you are keeping TCA informed of this approach and the possible developments which may rapidly ensue.

PROPOSED BOAC ARRANGEMENT FOR EMIGRANT TRAVEL

Commonwealth Relations Office in a letter† to us dated July 16 stated that the proposal made by Mr. Pearson has been considered by the Minister of Civil Aviation and CRO in the light of the information we had given. The conclusion is that whatever the merits of this proposal, it would not be possible for the United Kingdom to operate it in view of the statutory provisions governing the payment of subsidies to BOAC and the United Kingdom system of accountability to Parliament for such payments.

2. CRO suggests, however, that the desired results can be achieved by an alternative arrangement which the United Kingdom High Commissioner in Ottawa has given the United Kingdom reason to believe is acceptable to you. Under this alternative, the Ministry of Civil Aviation would issue direction under an IATA resolution authorizing BOAC to carry migrant traffic to Canada on a "fill-up" basis with the stipulation that intending passengers must produce a certificate to prove their bona fides. When the direction is issued, details of arrangements could be discussed by BOAC with TCA in the light of current load factors in the west bound direction.

3. CRO concludes its letter by saying that the United Kingdom High Commissioner in Ottawa has been asked to communicate with you on these lines and if he confirms that the Canadian authorities agree, the authorization to BOAC will be issued without further delay.

4. The IATA resolution concerned is 216/200. The Ministry of Civil Aviation is satisfied that it can operate under the second proviso that passes may be issued at the request of the members' governments provided this is also satisfactory to any other country into which they are operating. The United Kingdom is apparently doing this for New Zealand emigration traffic.

Note du secrétaire adjoint du Cabinet pour le premier ministre

Memorandum from Assistant Secretary to Cabinet to Prime Minister

CONFIDENTIAL Ottawa, July 25, 1951

RE CARRIAGE OF IMMIGRANTS TO CANADA BY B.O.A.C. AT REDUCED RATES

The meeting of the Cabinet on July 24th deferred decision on the proposal to have B.O.A.C. carry immigrants at reduced rates. The Department of Citizenship and Immigration considers the matter to be important and urgent since they have a large backlog of immigrants in the United Kingdom awaiting movement to Canada and a severe shortage of passenger accommodation. Unless new space is made available, some of the immigrants already passed for entry will not be able to get passages before February or March, 1952. The Air Transport Board object to the type of arrangement it is proposed to have B.O.A.C. put into effect. In the circumstances, you may wish to be informed of the details and have an opportunity to consider the matter.

Some time ago, the government decided that T.C.A. should carry immigrants to Canada on a "fill-up" basis, with the immigrant paying £55 (the tourist rate by ship) and the Canadian government paying the difference. The arrangement has been entirely successful. B.O.A.C. has a number of vacant seats westbound and the British government asked if we would extend the same arrangement to that line. We proposed in turn that the British government should inaugurate the plan since they have to meet B.O.A.C. deficits in any case. At Mr. Harris' request, Mr. Pearson urged British action along these lines in the course of his visit to London.

The Commonwealth Relations Office have now stated that, in view of the statutory provisions governing the payment of subsidies to B.O.A.C., and the U.K. system of accountability to Parliament for such payments, they cannot inaugurate a scheme along the same lines as our T.C.A. plan. As an alternative, they suggest that the Ministry of Civil Aviation issue a direction under IATA Resolution 216/200 authorizing B.O.A.C. to carry immigrant traffic to Canada on a "fill-up" basis (presumably at £55) with the stipulation that intending passengers would have to produce a certificate to prove that they are bona fide immigrants. Apparently such an arrangement is in effect with New Zealand and has been adopted in a few other instances. The Department of Citizenship and Immigration thinks that it might provide accommodation for about 1,000 immigrants between now and the end of the year.

The objections of the Air Transport Board to the plan are set forth in the attached memorandum† by Mr. Baldwin to Mr. Chevrier. Briefly they are:

(1) A reduced fare scheme of the sort proposed might endanger the international rate structure on the Atlantic.

(2) The resolution under which B.O.A.C. proposes to act was not intended to deal with situations such as immigrant movement and if used for the purpose would provide a loophole for other air lines to break or vary the Atlantic rate structure. The U.S. government and U.S. carriers would either take strong exception or else use it as a precedent to force other undesirable rate changes.

(3) An alternative course is available — that of having the Department of Citizenship and Immigration charter B.O.A.C. or other planes for special flights to carry immigrants.

The Air Transport Board think that, in any case, the U.K. proposal should not be adopted without full discussion first among IATA members, so that the views of other air lines and governments may be known.

While Mr. Baldwin makes a strong argument, it is somewhat difficult to see why the trans-Atlantic rate structure would be imperilled by a scheme under which an immigrant pays £55 and the British government makes up the deficit, but is not imperilled when an immigrant pays the same price and the Canadian government makes up the difference. In either case, the immigrant gets the advantage of a cut rate and the only difference is as to the form in which the government provides the subsidy. As to the argument that the plan might be extended dangerously to other fields, there appear to be two safeguards. One is that the fares would apply only on a "fill-up" basis. There could thus be no reservation of space in advance and the uncertainties of travel would make such a basis unattractive and not likely to be extended except in the case of persons such as immigrants. The second safeguard is that, as I understand it, the IATA resolution would be resorted to in a manner such as that proposed only with the agreement of the other country or countries involved in the flight to which the reduced fare would apply.

Unless there is a much greater difference than I am able to discern between the substance of the British government's plan and the plan we asked them to institute, they might have some reason to feel that we were taking an unduly technical position in objecting to its inauguration on their responsibility. If the matter is held over for prior discussion in IATA, the delay is likely to be such that very little help will be available for immigrant movement this year.

In the circumstances, the best course might be to inform the British government that we have doubts whether the plan will prove acceptable to other governments and air lines and also doubt the propriety of using the IATA resolution for this purpose, but that we would be prepared to see the plan instituted on the understanding that it would be terminated if other governments or lines objected or if IATA decided that the resolution did not properly cover the scheme.

IMMIGRATION; CARRIAGE OF IMMIGRANTS TO CANADA BY BOAC AT REDUCED RATES

51. The Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, referring to the discussion at the meeting of July 24th, 1951, pointed out that the arrangement contemplated was for B.O.A.C. to transport immigrants on a "fill-up" basis at the reduced rate of £55. This was the same as the rate charged to immigrants moved by T.C.A. but the Canadian government paid to T.C.A. the difference between the £55 and the full air rate. The arrangement with B.O.A.C. did not envisage any such re-imbursement.

52. The Minister of Transport felt that, although U.K. authorities had indicated that the B.O.A.C. proposal could be put legally into effect under I.A.T.A. Resolution 216/200, the scheme, in actual fact, would be in contravention of the spirit of this resolution, which, although authorizing participating air lines to transport passengers on free passes or at reduced rates in certain cases, was intended to cover such occurrences as inaugural flights, the transportation of "V.I.P.'s", action to be taken in cases of emergency, such as floods and other disasters and could not be construed to apply to a mass immigration movement.

53. Mr. Harris pointed out that there was in reality very little difference between the T.C.A. scheme and the B.O.A.C. proposal, since in the latter case the U.K. government would have to make up any deficit suffered by the U.K. line.

54. The Minister of Trade and Commerce was of the opinion that, if the B.O.A.C. proposal were put into effect, the International Air Transport Association could probably not survive.

55. The Prime Minister felt that Canada could be justified in agreeing to this proposal only if the U.K. authorities obtained I.A.T.A. approval of the scheme.

56. The Cabinet, after discussion, agreed that the U.K. authorities be informed that Canada would agree to the British Overseas Airways Corporation proposal for the transportation of immigrants on a "fill-up" basis at reduced rates only if the scheme were submitted to, and approved by the International Air Transport Association.

Ottawa, August 7, 1951

Dear Mr. Moran,

In Mr. Thomson's absence I refer to the memorandum† which he left with you on 20th July about the proposed action by the Canadian and United Kingdom Governments in regard to the establishment of a reduced fare for the carriage of migrants by B.O.A.C.

I have been asked to say that the United Kingdom authorities have been somewhat disturbed to learn that T.C.A. have apparently invited quotations from B.O.A.C., Air France and K.L.M. for charters to T.C.A. for the carriage of emigrants to Canada on an ad hoc or regular basis from London, Prestwick and Paris. It seems that this contract would be available until 31st December of this year with the possibility of further extension.

We should be glad to learn, in the light of the discussions which are still continuing between our two Governments, whether T.C.A. have taken the steps outlined above with the concurrence of the Canadian Government, or whether the matter has simply been discussed between the air corporations concerned.

I have also been asked to say that the authorities in the United Kingdom are disturbed lest the action said to have been taken by T.C.A. should deprive B.O.A.C. of a fair and equal opportunity under Article V(1) of the United Kingdom-Canada Air Agreement for the carriage of migrants to Canada. It remains the view of the United Kingdom Government that use of I.A.T.A. Resolution 200 would be less obnoxious as a precedent for the carriage of this traffic than would be the employment of a subsidy by the air lines which would undercut the I.A.T.A. fare to the passenger. It remains the desire of the United Kingdom Government to reach an early agreement with the Canadian Government in this matter, but in default of a mutually acceptable solution the United Kingdom authorities feel that there will be no other course open to them than to issue a directive to B.O.A.C. under Resolution 200, enabling them to carry emigrants on a fill-up basis at a fare not below £55.

In the circumstances the United Kingdom authorities hope that it may be possible for an understanding to be arrived at as a matter of urgency.

Yours sincerely,

JOHN CHADWICK

CONFIDENTIAL Ottawa, August 20, 1951

Dear Mr. Thomson,

I am replying to a letter of August 7, 1951, which, in your absence, Mr. Chadwick sent to Mr. Moran of this Department on the subject of a reduced fare for the carriage of immigrants by BOAC.

Before Mr. Chadwick's departure, we were able to inform him that any enquiries which TCA may have made with other air companies concerning charter rates for the carriage of immigrants were made on TCA's own authority and not on direction or request from any Government Department. As you know, however, our immigration authorities are most anxious to find ways of increasing the flow of immigrants to Canada from the United Kingdom. They have had to consider all possible means of providing more transportation for such immigrants and they have reviewed the possibilities of chartering aircraft for this purpose, if more desirable arrangements, such as the use of vacant seats on BOAC's westward flights can not be made. TCA have been aware of these considerations and it was probably on account of them that they made enquiries with the other air companies.

I am now able to say that the Government is prepared to agree, subject to certain conditions, to the proposal that BOAC be authorized to establish a fare of £55 for bona fide immigrants. The conditions are, in the first place, that this reduced fare be established for immigrant "fill-up" traffic only, that is, immigrants to this country occupying seats which cannot otherwise be sold at regular fares. Secondly, since we retain some doubt about the legality of basing the reduced fare on IATA Resolution 216/200, we wish to make our approval of the arrangement conditional upon its submission to, and approval by, IATA. Thirdly, since, in our view, the arrangement can be justified only by present conditions and present Canadian policies with respect to immigration from the United Kingdom, we wish to reserve the right to withdraw our approval for the arrangement should a change of policy or conditions make it no longer necessary.

TELEGRAM 1552 Ottawa, August 30, 1951

IMPORTANT

Following for Wilgress, Begins: The build-up in the United Kingdom of a large backlog of immigrants for whom no transportation is available has now reached a point where it is clear that the institution of BOAC's proposal for a £55 fare on a "fill-up" basis would be of relatively little help. The Immigration Branch have, therefore, had to make plans to provide additional space by the use of chartered aircraft. Cabinet has not yet considered the plan, but approval is likely, subject perhaps to some changes in the details of financing.

2. We have some fears that the United Kingdom authorities will not approve the use of chartered aircraft for our purpose. They have indicated that they think a charter scheme might prejudice the chances of obtaining IATA agreement for their £55 fare. Their opposition probably arises because they wish to obtain a large share of the immigrant traffic for BOAC and because they do not realize the size of the problem faced by our Immigration authorities.

3. It is urgent that charter flights begin at the earliest possible date. We would therefore be glad if an approach could be made to the United Kingdom authorities immediately at a high level to explain the present position and to obtain their agreement. Although it is realized that you are fully occupied in other ways, perhaps you could find time to make the initial approach. The matter could then be followed up by another member of your staff. We are anxious to have a final answer as early as possible, but if necessary Mr. Howe will probably be willing to follow up the question when he is in London late in September.

4. Following is a memorandum on this subject for your use. Appropriately amended it could be given to the U.K. authorities.

1. Air transportation for immigrants has taken on great importance for Canada in view of the desire of the government to increase the flow of immigration, particularly from the United Kingdom, and in view of difficulties in obtaining sea transport.

2. In the autumn of 1950, to facilitate this movement the Canadian Immigration authorities arranged for use of empty seats on regular TCA flights up to an agreed number. TCA received full trans-Atlantic passenger fare for immigrants carried on this basis, with the government assuming responsibility for the difference between the air fare and the normal sea passage fare of £55.

3. Our desire for a much larger movement of immigrants by air from the United Kingdom and the known availability of a large pool ready to come led to consideration of other supplementary plans as well. The United Kingdom Government has been reluctant to establish for BOAC the arrangement which Canadian Immigration authorities have with TCA but suggested instead a special £55 fare for immigrants to Canada travelling by BOAC. This fare would be charged under the authority of International Air Transport Association Resolution 200 and would be for "fill-up" traffic only.

4. Our aviation officials have reservations regarding the propriety of use of Resolution 200 for this purpose and also as to the effect on the delicately-balanced trans-Atlantic rate structure and upon IATA itself if this fare were introduced without full consultation in IATA. For this reason, when the matter was considered by the Cabinet, it was decided that the proposal would be approved only if submitted to and approved by IATA. We understand the matter has not yet been submitted to IATA by BOAC.

5. Meanwhile, the shortage of transportation for prospective immigrants has become much worse. The backlog of immigrants waiting for transportation has now built up to a point where it is clear that if all vacant seats on TCA and BOAC westward flights were used, only a small proportion of the backlog would be moved to Canada by the end of 1951. The number of immigrants processed and waiting for transportation in the United Kingdom at the present time is approximately 20,000. Many of these are the wives and families of immigrants who have established themselves in Canada and who are now able to provide homes for them. For reasons connected with the problem of settlement in this country, it is necessary that a substantial part of the immigrants now waiting be transferred to Canada before the end of 1951, if further long delays are to be avoided. The Canadian Immigration authorities have therefore had to consider other methods of providing air transportation, and have concluded that it would be desirable to initiate a substantial number of special charter flights from the United Kingdom for this purpose. This offers no difficulty as to the rate structure since IATA Resolution 128 makes special provision for government-sponsored immigrant movements on a charter basis.

6. Under the charter arrangement which the Immigration officials have approved TCA would act as coordinator for the government in the chartering of foreign aircraft for the carriage of immigrants. This was considered preferable to the establishment of special coordinating machinery by the Immigration Branch itself. The difficulties to be faced by the Immigration Branch in expanding its personnel and space requirements, in addition to its lack of expert knowledge of ticketing and traffic handling, would make such establishment almost impossible if it is to be effective within the time required. Further, to make the scheme self-supporting as far as the actual air transportation is concerned, it is to be based upon the use of carriers who can quote a charter rate which, when divided by the number of passengers carried, works out at roughly £55 or $160 (Canadian) per head, i.e., about the same level as sea transportation. A number of foreign carriers are in a position to offer charter services on this basis, and while no direct quotation has been received from BOAC, charges which they have made for previous recent charter flights to Canada appear to indicate that they are in a position to offer a charter rate which would satisfy this requirement.

7. It is to be clearly understood that acceptance of the charter plan will not, in the Canadian view, prejudice implementation of the BOAC proposal for a fare of £55 for immigrant "fill-up" traffic. What extra space BOAC may be able to provide in this way will be a welcome addition to the transportation facilities available for immigrants. Further, we do not consider that the use of charter services now would in any way prejudice the BOAC reference to IATA. We feel, however, that the BOAC proposal may encounter serious difficulties in IATA and that a decision by IATA is likely to take considerable time. In the meantime, it will be necessary, if the pressing need for transportation is to be met, that charter flights be instituted immediately.

8. The United Kingdom Government will probably consider that traffic between the United Kingdom and Canada is primarily a matter for the two national carriers, TCA and BOAC, and that other carriers should not be employed so long as these two carriers can cater to the traffic. We agree in principle with this attitude and are fully prepared to have BOAC play a major part in any scheme for charter flights from the United Kingdom. Assuming that they can offer a rate which is satisfactory to our Immigration authorities, on the basis described above, any charters from the United Kingdom to Canada will be offered to BOAC before any other foreign carrier is given consideration. This should result in a very substantial volume of business being available to BOAC. However, the volume of available immigrant traffic is now so large that it is clear that BOAC and TCA will not by themselves be able to handle it. It will certainly be necessary to employ other air carriers if the desired flow of immigration is to be achieved.

9. It is understood that the United Kingdom Government would desire to obtain for BOAC a substantial portion of the air immigration movement to Canada, and from this point of view they might have objections to the arrangement established by the Canadian Government with TCA last autumn. The Canadian civil aviation authorities do not believe that the Canadian Government, in making this arrangement, was acting in a discriminatory fashion under our bilateral air agreement with the United Kingdom. The practice of private organizations of purchasing fares for members and then paying for part of these fares out of general funds is well known. In this respect the role of the Canadian Government is in no wise different from a private organization, except for the size of the movement involved. Further, we fail to see why it should be considered more objectionable, than, for example, the practice of some foreign governments in paying excessive rates for the carriage of mail in order to subsidize their air carriers, a practice to which, so far as we know, the United Kingdom Government has not objected.

10. The United Kingdom Government may argue that a certain number of the immigrants who move under the Canadian Government assistance scheme by TCA would, in the absence of this scheme, travel by air anyway, but are lost to BOAC since they now wish to take advantage of the Canadian Government assistance via TCA. This could, within a limited sense, be true but we have reason to believe that BOAC has benefitted from a number of normal first class passengers who might otherwise have travelled on TCA being diverted to BOAC because of the immigrant movement on TCA. Even more important, we believe that the new scheme for immigrant charter flights will make much more additional immigrant traffic available to BOAC than to TCA. TCA is short of equipment at the moment and is unlikely to do any immigrant charter flying with TCA aircraft for at least the balance of 1951. Therefore, virtually the full volume of immigrant charter flying from the United Kingdom will be available to BOAC to the extent that BOAC is able to carry it, and BOAC will gain a definite advantage on balance.

11. To sum up, we consider that to move by air from the United Kingdom the number of immigrants required by Canada, the use of charter services on a substantial scale will be necessary to supplement any other arrangement which may be made. Secondly, we regard the BOAC proposal for a fare of £55 as a separate issue which would not be prejudiced by the immediate introduction of charter flights. Thirdly, on the rate basis indicated above, we are prepared to offer BOAC first rights on any charter flights from the United Kingdom before turning to the carriers of other countries for this purpose. The Canadian Government, considering that the immediate expansion of air immigration to Canada is a matter of urgent and national importance, would be grateful for the cooperation of the United Kingdom authorities in putting into effect as soon as possible the proposed arrangement for charter flights. Ends.

Memorandum from Economic Division

[Ottawa], August 31, 1951

CARRIAGE OF IMMIGRANTS FROM THE UNITED KINGDOM BY BOAC

Our long telegram of yesterday's date is the outcome of a meeting held last Tuesday morning in Mr. Moran's office. Mr. Laval Fortier, Mr. Baldwin of the Air Transport Board and Mr. Palmer of TCA were present, as well as Mr. Moran and myself.

2. Immigration now have a pressing problem on their hands. Arrangements for shipping space and their agreement with TCA for "fill-up" space have not met the requirements of their immigration programme with the United Kingdom. The backlog of prospective immigrants awaiting air passage now amounts to about 20,000, and TCA can move only about 6,000 per year. Use of BOAC "fill-up" space would move perhaps another 6,000 per year, but the Air Transport Board are still hostile to BOAC's proposal for a fare of £55, and anyway, it is unlikely to be approved by IATA. Immigration have, therefore, developed with TCA a scheme for chartering aircraft from whatever companies are willing to offer them at a rate which will permit charging the immigrants a fare of £55.

3. Baldwin has had a letter from Cribbett of the United Kingdom Ministry of Civil Aviation, which suggests that the U.K. Government may refuse permission for the charter aircraft to operate to the United Kingdom, and TCA have been told that BOAC will not make a bid for a share in the charter arrangement. We have therefore asked Wilgress to take up the question in London.

4. I still feel that these difficulties might have been avoided if we had consulted the United Kingdom when first putting into effect our arrangement with TCA and if we had earlier indicated our willingness to give BOAC a slice of the immigrant business. Further, I do not think we can agree with the Air Transport Board that the arrangement with TCA is in accord with our obligations under the Canada-United Kingdom Air Agreement. Now, if the U.K. wish to be difficult about the charter proposal, all that we can do is to try to mollify them and to persuade them to take a part in it.

5. At the meeting last Tuesday Mr. Fortier wanted to propose to the United Kingdom that BOAC put its £55 fare into effect immediately, subject to cancellation later if IATA disapproves. Baldwin and Palmer vetoed that. I think that their objections to the BOAC proposal for a reduced fare are reasonably sound. Nevertheless, if the United Kingdom authorities now hold up Immigration's new plans, it will not be simply because they wish to be awkward. It will be partly because we did not earlier show any interest in giving BOAC a share in the immigrant traffic, and because, to some extent at least, our arrangement with TCA is unfair to BOAC in that it will attract to TCA some traffic that might otherwise go by BOAC.

CARRIAGE OF IMMIGRANTS FROM THE UNITED KINGDOM BY CHARTER FLIGHTS

1. A memorandum has now been received dealing with the memorandum left with the Secretary of State for Commonwealth Relations on September 3, in accordance with the text given in paragraph 4 of your telegram No. 1552 of August 30.

2. In forwarding this memorandum, the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Lord Lucan, makes the following comment: QUOTE: Your memorandum has been very carefully considered, and I am now able to say that the United Kingdom Government are prepared to accept the proposal that charter services should be used to facilitate the carriage of this traffic, subject to certain conditions which are intended to safeguard the legitimate civil aviation interests of our two countries. These conditions are set out in the attached note, which has been prepared by our civil aviation authorities as a detailed reply to the points raised in your memorandum. UNQUOTE.

3. Text of memorandum from Commonwealth Relations Office, dated today, is as follows:

Memorandum begins:

The United Kingdom Government have considered with sympathy the appeal of the Government of Canada for cooperation in the acceleration of emigration from the United Kingdom and are willing to do everything possible, subject to safeguarding the legitimate interests of BOAC and TCA, to facilitate the clearance of the backlog of 20,000 emigrants by the end of the year.

2. The United Kingdom Government share the conclusion that a movement of this magnitude is beyond the capacity of BOAC and TCA and that recourse to foreign airlines to provide the balance of capacity will be necessary. They differ from the Canadian Government not in the objectives but only in the principles to be followed and the arrangements to be made to secure those objectives.

3. There are certain important basic considerations which govern the United Kingdom approach to this question, viz.

(i) Migrant traffic under United Kingdom law and under Canadian practice hitherto is reserved to the scheduled airlines BOAC and TCA, and the carriage of this traffic from the United Kingdom to Canada is governed by the terms of the United Kingdom-Canada bilateral agreement.

(ii) BOAC and TCA have primary rights of carriage of this traffic and equality of opportunity to compete.

4. In the light of these considerations it will be clear that the proposal that the Government of Canada should place contracts, even through the agency of TCA, with foreign airlines is inadmissible for the following reasons:

(a) Charter contracts of this nature would place the operations on a non-scheduled basis, contrary to United Kingdom law and the practice hitherto followed by the Canadian Government.

(b) BOAC, equally with TCA, is concerned with the placing of contracts with third parties (involving no subsidy from the Government of Canada) for the carriage of scheduled traffic originating in the United Kingdom. Accordingly it is the view of the United Kingdom Government that any foreign airline which may be employed should be the agent of both TCA and BOAC, and that these latter should be associated in the placing of the contract as they will inevitably be in supervising its performance.

5. It also follows from the considerations mentioned in paragraph 3, that the fares to be charged should be in conformity with the appropriate International Air Transport Association resolutions.

6. Since the only contribution which BOAC can make to the movement of emigrants at a fare of £55 is through the use of "fill-up" space on its normal scheduled services, the interpretation of resolution 200 assumes importance. Notwithstanding the reservations of Canadian aviation officials regarding the propriety of using resolution 200, it remains the view of the United Kingdom civil aviation authorities that this resolution is not only appropriate but may be invoked without IATA approval. In support of this view they point out that recourse to the resolution is left to the discretion of the governments and airlines concerned, without requiring IATA approval. Moreover BOAC officials concerned with the introduction of this resolution state that it was originally put forward not merely to make provision for the carriage of government staffs, but to permit traffic movements sponsored by governments in fulfilment of their policies. As paragraph 5 of the Canadian memorandum points out, the carriage of migrants by air is of great importance to the realisation of the policy of the Canadian Government. It is also clear by implication, from resolution 128 (JT 123 (2) (045)), mentioned in paragraph 5 of the Canadian memorandum, that migrants sponsored by governments are regarded by IATA as falling into a special category to which standard fares need not apply. Accordingly, the United Kingdom Government consider that there is conclusive evidence in support of their view; but, to avoid embarrassment to the Canadian Government, they are prepared unilaterally to issue a directive to BOAC. A similar directive is already in force, by agreement with the New Zealand Government, for the carriage of migrant traffic to New Zealand.

7. Turning to the Canadian proposal to invoke resolution 128 (JT 123 (2) (045)), the United Kingdom civil aviation authorities, for their part, consider that this resolution, in terms, applies only to charter (non-scheduled) operations. For reasons explained in paragraphs 3 and 4, this resolution would not be appropriate to scheduled operations on an agency basis unless the Government of Canada accepts the view that migrant traffic may be excepted from the standard fare requirement. It is appreciated that this resolution includes a proviso relating to government-sponsored migration movement, but, apart from the fact that an IATA resolution cannot override the legislation and policies of governments relating to the classification of scheduled and non-scheduled services, it is the opinion of the United Kingdom civil aviation authorities that the proviso carries two clear implications, namely:

(i) Support for the United Kingdom interpretation of resolution 200 that government-sponsored immigrant traffic may be excluded from the application of standard IATA fares, and

(ii) that migrants, but for this proviso, are regarded as members of the public reserved by United Kingdom and Canadian policies to the scheduled airlines.

8. Nevertheless the United Kingdom Government, in the conviction that resolution 200, in terms, and resolution 128 (JT 123 (2) (045)), by implication, permit the carriage of government-sponsored migrant traffic at sub-standard fares, would agree that there should be recourse to resolution 128 for the placing of agency contracts with foreign airlines, provided the Canadian Government is prepared to accept a United Kingdom directive under resolution 200. This is not intended as a conditional agreement but as a corollary of the United Kingdom view that both resolutions are equally valid, or invalid, if migrant traffic reserved to the schedule airlines is to be carried at sub-standard fares.

9. So far as the BOAC contribution is concerned, the corporation point out that they would not be able to make any significant contribution, apart from fill-up space, at fares below £80. It is their considered view that a charter operation confined to one-way migrant traffic, offering no return loads and no rights to carry other traffic, cannot be economically carried out at a rate of £48 a passenger, which is the rate suggested by the Canadian Government, after deduction of commission.

10. To sum up, the United Kingdom would be willing to accept the proposal of the Canadian Government to engage third parties to carry migrant traffic from the United Kingdom to Canada beyond the capacity of TCA and BOAC on the following basis:

(a) The recognition of the prior claims of TCA and BOAC to this traffic which is reserved by United Kingdom law to the scheduled operator.

(b) In so far as TCA and BOAC are unable to carry this traffic, contracts with third parties at sub-standard fares to be placed jointly by TCA and BOAC, as agency contracts, subject to the following reservations:

(i) Only certified migrant traffic to be carried.

(ii) No return loads from North America to the United Kingdom, either of passengers or freight, to be carried. Any infringement of either (i) or (ii) to render the operator concerned liable to immediate determination of the contract.

(c) The Canadian Government to agree that the United Kingdom Government may issue a directive to BOAC under resolution 200 for the carriage of fill-up traffic at a minimum fare of £55.

11. This solution is put forward in the belief that it will enable the Canadian and United Kingdom Governments to cooperate effectively in expediting the movement of migrant traffic, within the framework of the United Kingdom-Canada bilateral agreement, United Kingdom law governing the classification of this traffic, and the requirements of the IATA. If the Government of Canada are able to accept these proposals, it is suggested that detailed arrangements should be made directly between TCA and BOAC. Memorandum ends.

IATA — SPECIAL FARE PROPOSAL

Following for Minister of Transport and Moran from Baldwin, Begins: Learned from Cribbet yesterday that in his discussion with Hildred of IATA latter unwilling commit himself for early United Kingdom special fare proposal without formal reference IATA. This in itself indication that proposal likely to be difficult one for IATA. In circumstances, after discussion with Mr. Howe, I have today spoken to Cribbett along following lines:

(i) United Kingdom proposal to establish special £55 immigrant fare for fill-up use on regular services must, in the opinion of Canadian authorities, be referred to IATA for indication of whether IATA approves such an arrangement under the terms of resolution 200. If the United Kingdom authorities prefer to have the Canadian authorities make this reference as a result of notice from United Kingdom there may be no objection to this since this is the course which would be recommended by the Canadian authorities in any event if the United Kingdom were to give notice of proceeding unilaterally.

(ii) Since regardless of the outcome of the foregoing scheme, additional schemes will be required, it remains the desire of the Canadian authorities to proceed at once with arrangements for charter of aircraft from other carriers.

(iii) Canadian arrangements with TCA contemplate TCA employment of other carriers at a charter rate which would allow immigrants to be moved at £55 or possibly £65 per head, exclusive of commission and TCA is prepared to offer BOAC first call on any such charter flights. If, however, BOAC cannot offer flights at this rate, we would be prepared to suggest that Canadian Immigration authorities make a direct arrangement with BOAC at whatever higher rate BOAC can offer charter flights on understanding BOAC responsibility to find immigrants prepared to pay the necessary higher rate.

(iv) Foregoing would be put forward to the Canadian Immigration authorities on the understanding that at the same time, TCA would be allowed to proceed as agent of Canadian Government in charter of aircraft from other carriers at rate approved by Canadian Government and that United Kingdom Government would not object to such flights being made under TCA agency.

(v) If foregoing programme is not acceptable and charter flights may not proceed on this basis or are to be held up until after decision obtained from IATA on United Kingdom special rate proposal, Canadian authorities require early word to this effect so that arrangements may be made for movement of immigrants from points outside United Kingdom.

2. On basis of foregoing, if United Kingdom willing to go along they will probably have BOAC get in touch TCA and/or Canadian Immigration. I have made it clear foregoing suggestions only tentative and require consideration in Ottawa. Suggest meanwhile Fortier and Vachon, Air Transport Board, might wish consider implications foregoing with External, both as regards arrangements with BOAC if United Kingdom willing cooperate and as regards alternative arrangements, e.g. Shannon failing this. Suggest inform TCA also. Ends.

Following for Tudhope from Baldwin, Begins: Following Mr. Howe's return we reported to Immigration that we understood U.K. would refer special £55 fill-up rate proposal to IATA and that T.C.A. would not oppose U.K. reference, it being understood we would accept any IATA decision in this regard. Also suggested that Immigration consider feasibility of charters from BOAC at a figure equivalent to £75 or £80 per head since BOAC felt immigrants available at this figure.

2. Subsequently, Granville of BOAC came out to discuss problem with Immigration. Immigration expressed view that difficult to contemplate charges at this higher figure or in fact any figure higher than the equivalent of £65 per head in view of cost factor, possible effect on other lower potential charter rates, and fact that shipping likely to be available at these higher figures. BOAC when urged to see what charters could be provided at lower figure of up to £65 indicated little could be done on this basis but suggested it could add one regular scheduled flight eastbound per week with plane to be used for immigrant charters westbound at this lower rate but that any other charters at rate acceptable to Immigration could only be provided if an eastbound load made available, for example, on Canadian government military transport work or during the peak period next spring when regular scheduled volume eastbound higher than westbound.

3. BOAC also indicated now unwilling to refer fill-up rate proposal to IATA on grounds difficulty and delay would ensue and action would be prejudicial to BOAC previous action in using fill-up rate elsewhere to New Zealand without consulting IATA.

4. BOAC also indicated would oppose any T.C.A. attempt to charter other foreign carriers for immigrants out of the U.K. In the circumstances Immigration is planning high level approach to U.K. government (presumably through Canada House) to request permission for T.C.A. to charter other foreign carriers for immigrant charter flights. Ends.

CARRIAGE OF IMMIGRANTS BY AIR

Following for Wilgress from Heeney, Begins: Negotiations with the United Kingdom on this subject have bogged down. We have had to reject their counter-proposals (your Telegram No. 2336 of September 14th) and no compromise has been found. Please see our Telegram No. 2007 of November 9th from Baldwin to Tudhope.

2. Meanwhile, the problem has become more serious. There are increasing numbers of immigrants awaiting transport, many of them the families of immigrants now in Canada. TCA and ocean shipping are booked up for months ahead. In view of the situation Cabinet has authorized Immigration to charter aircraft through TCA to move the immigrants and has directed that a formal request be made to the United Kingdom Government to grant for aircraft under charter to TCA landing rights and rights to pick up immigrant traffic for Canada.

3. Please make this request at once, emphasizing the urgent need for additional transportation and the strong interest of the Canadian Government in providing transport for as many as possible of the waiting immigrants before the end of the year. Ends.

CARRIAGE OF IMMIGRANTS BY AIR

1. We have now received from Lord Ismay the reply to my letter of November 12† based on your telegram under reference.

2. The following is the text of Lord Ismay's letter, Begins:

"You wrote to me on November 12 formally requesting that aircraft chartered by the Canadian Department of Immigration through Trans-Canada Airlines for the carriage of immigrants to Canada should be allowed to exercise landing rights and the right to pick up immigrants in this country.

We are, of course, most anxious to cooperate with your government in facilitating the movement of immigrants from the United Kingdom to Canada, and, in consultation with the Ministry of Civil Aviation, have given sympathetic consideration to your request. We appreciate the need for urgency in moving the large numbers of immigrants at present awaiting transportation, many of whom are the families of men who have already settled in Canada. We are willing to grant rights in this country to aircraft chartered by your Department of Immigration to carry these immigrants, subject to certain conditions which are set out below and on the understanding that BOAC is permitted to carry a reasonable share of the traffic.

To make it possible for BOAC to participate in the carriage of immigrants to Canada, on a basis which we believe will be acceptable to the Canadian Government, it is proposed to place a charter contract with BOAC for the use of a stratocruiser equipped to carry 70 immigrants at a frequency of approximately one flight per week. This contract will be governed by the provisions of IATA resolution 128 (JT123(2)(045)) governing charter operations. Emigrants would be offered passages at a fare of £80.

The conditions under which we are prepared to grant rights in this country to charter operators engaged by your department of immigration are as follows:

(i) The terms of any contract made between TCA and the operator of a third country to be subject to agreement (not to be unreasonably withheld) by BOAC and the operator selected to be approved by the United Kingdom Government.

(ii) Only certified migrant traffic originating in this country for Canada to be carried by the agent operators of TCA.

(iii) No other traffic (passengers mails or cargo) originating at or destined for points in United Kingdom territory to be carried.

(iv) Any infringements of conditions (ii) and (iii) above to render the operator concerned liable to immediate determination of the contract.

These conditions do not go beyond those summarised in paragraph 10 of the memorandum sent to you by Lord Lucan on September 14, which I understand were discussed last September in London with Mr. Baldwin, Chairman of the Canadian Air Transport Board, and accepted by him as reasonable. They are, of course, designed solely to prevent any encroachment by foreign charter operators on the rights reserved under the United Kingdom/Canada Bilateral Agreement to the scheduled airlines of our two countries and to ensure compliance with United Kingdom standards of safety". Ends.

TELEGRAM 2236 Ottawa, December 14, 1951

CONFIDENTIAL. IMPORTANT.

Your 2864 of December 1st — Carriage of immigrants by air.

Are we to understand from paragraph 3 of Lord Ismay's letter that the United Kingdom Government will enter into a charter contract with B.O.A.C. for one flight a week charging £80 per immigrant, independently of any other charter arrangement the Canadian Government may make with other air carriers?

2. If the United Kingdom Government expects the Canadian Government to charter flights from B.O.A.C. at a price which would not permit us to charge the immigrants less than £80 per adult immigrant passenger, it would not be possible to reach any agreement with B.O.A.C. This was thoroughly discussed with officials of B.O.A.C. this autumn. The cost of charter must be sufficiently low to permit a charge of no more that £65 per adult immigrant passenger and half the fare for children below twelve years of age. From experience we can expect that on the average flight 20% of the passengers will be children paying only half fare.

3. Would you please explain to the United Kingdom authorities that if a charge of £80 per immigrant is made, we would be chartering aircraft which would not carry their full load and such an arrangement would be uneconomical and, therefore, unacceptable. We believe that it would be possible to charter sufficient aircraft at a cost which would permit us to fix the adult fare at £65, a price attractive to immigrants.

4. Please ascertain if pick-up rights would be granted by the United Kingdom Government to aircraft chartered by the Canadian Government, even though B.O.A.C. can not, for one reason or another, reduce its present proposed charter rate.

5. We must know definitely whether or not pick-up rights will be granted with or without B.O.A.C.'s participation in the scheme. It is most important to have the final decision of the United Kingdom authorities as we must plan our 1952 immigration programme. We will not have, in 1952, sufficient air or sea transportation to carry immigrants from the British Isles, who have been processed or who have signified their intention of emigrating to Canada. In order to proceed with our defence programme we have to recruit some technicians in the United Kingdom, and there is no use doing this unless satisfactory transportation arrangements can be made.

CARRIAGE OF IMMIGRANTS

Points raised in your telegram have been discussed with Commonwealth Relations and Civil Aviation who say we have not correctly understood letter dated November 30 from the Secretary of State for Commonwealth Relations and that the intention of the letter requires to be re-stated. It is as follows.

QUOTE.

1. The United Kingdom Government remain of the view that, whatever arrangements are made by the Canadian authorities for the carriage of migrants by air from the United Kingdom to Canada, BOAC ought not to be excluded from any opportunity of engaging in the carriage of migrants to Canada at reduced rates. Accordingly as an alternative to a charter contract between the Canadian authorities and BOAC for the carriage of immigrants to Canada, the United Kingdom Government would propose to place a contract on its own account with BOAC for the operation of an approximately once-weekly charter service between the United Kingdom and Canada. This arrangement would be additional to and distinct from any charter arrangements the Canadian Government may make with other operators for the carriage of immigrants at a lower fare than that offered by BOAC.

2. Provided the Canadian Government has no objection to the above proposal the United Kingdom Government is prepared forthwith to grant landing and pick-up rights in this country to aircraft chartered by the Canadian Government for the carriage of migrants, subject to the conditions set out in paragraph 4 of Lord Ismay's letter of November 30, 1951. It is desired that the acceptance of these conditions should be confirmed. UNQUOTE.[72]

Minutes of Meeting of Interdepartmental Committee on External Trade Policy

SECRET [Ottawa], June 28, 1951

A meeting of the Interdepartmental Committee on External Trade Policy was held on Wednesday, June 27, 1951, at 3:15 p.m. in the Privy Council Committee Room.

Present:

Mr. N.A. Robertson, Secretary to the Cabinet (Chairman),
Mr. J.G. Taggart, Deputy Minister of Agriculture,
Mr. W.F. Bull, Deputy Minister of Trade and Commerce,
Mr. H.B. McKinnon, Chairman of the Tariff Board,
Mr. David Sim, Deputy Minister of National Revenue,
Mr. K.W. Taylor, Assistant Deputy Minister of Finance,
Mr. A.F.W. Plumptre, Department of External Affairs.
Mr. R.G. Robertson, Privy Council Office, (Secretary).

Also present:

Mr. J.J. Deutsch, Department of Finance,
Mr. T.G. Major, Canadian Trade Commissioner, Trinidad, etc.
Mr. C.M. Isbister, Department of Trade and Commerce.

TRADE DISCUSSIONS WITH REPRESENTATIVES OF THE WEST INDIES

1. The Deputy Minister of Trade and Commerce said that a delegation would be arriving late that day to begin discussions the following day on Canada-West Indies trade. The delegation would consist of the following:

Hon. W.A. Bustamante,
Minister of Communications and Leader of the House of Representatives, Jamaica.
Hon. A. Gomes,
Minister of Labour, Industry & Commerce, Trinidad.
Mr. G.H. Adams,
Leader of the House of Assembly, Barbados.
Hon. W.A. Raatgever,
Member of the Executive Council, and also
Member of the Legislative Council, British Guiana.
Mr. H.E. Robinson, representing British West Indies Sugar Association, and also a Member of the Executive Council.

Mr. H.A. Youngman,
representing Incorporated Chambers of Commerce.
Mr. MacCowan,
Secretary of the Sugar Association.
Mr. R. Newton,
Financial Secretary, Jamaica, as adviser to delegates from Jamaica.
Miss Longbrilge,
Secretary to Mr. Bustamante.

It was not entirely clear just what the delegation would wish to discuss. There had originally been a proposal that the delegation should come direct to Canada, in part to voice protests over the sugar arrangement entered into with Cuba.[73] The United Kingdom had persuaded the delegation to go first to London and their visit here was en route from the United Kingdom. It was known that the British West Indies did not like the discussion of trade liberalization that had taken place in the U.K.-Canada Continuing Committee without West Indies representation.[74] It was quite possible that, after the discussion in London, the West Indies group would now attempt to sell all over again the relaxations for which there had been negotiation in the Continuing Committee. They could be expected to be particularly concerned about sugar and bananas. The preference margins which the West Indies enjoyed on molasses, sugar and cocoa beans had been reduced with the reduction in M.F.N. rates. They would undoubtedly try to have the former margins restored.

2. Mr. Major said that the 1925-26 Trade Agreement[75] had operated very favourably for the British West Indies and they would undoubtedly like to see their position under it reestablished. Under the Agreement, Canadian sales to the British West Indies before the war had amounted to over $80 million per year. Last year this had fallen to $33 million, while Canadian purchases were $67 million. The decline in Canadian exports was partly due to competition and partly to restrictions imposed against dollar imports.

3. Mr. Isbister said he thought it probable that a principal objective of the delegation would be to secure some commitment as to Canadian policy on sugar after the expiration of the 3-year arrangement with Cuba.

4. Mr. Deutsch said he thought it was essential that no commitments should be given as to what would be done three years from now. It could be made clear that the Canadian government was dissatisfied with the operation of the 1925-26 trade agreement. If trade arrangements operated successfully and satisfactorily during the next three years it might not be necessary to go further along the lines that had been adopted in the Cuban arrangement.

5. The Chairman said one thing was clear — that no hope should be held out to the delegation that there could be any increase in their preference margins through raising the rates against other countries. In any discussion on the probable result of satisfactory trade developments over the next three years, there should not be any suggestion that the status quo under the 1925-26 Agreement could be re-established. It would be a mistake to give the impression that that was a probable objective.

It seemed likely that the West Indies representatives would wish to raise questions about shipping. In that connection it would be useful to know the magnitude of the subsidies that had been given from this end. The position of T.C.A. would also be worth discussing.

So far as sugar was concerned, it seemed doubtful whether there was any way out of the present impasse except through a new general commodity agreement. The most important step would be a general revision of U.S. sugar policy. A commodity agreement of general application was clearly not a matter that could be dealt with in the present discussions but the possibility of having to come to some such solution of current problems constituted an argument against making any long-term commitments concerning Canadian policy.

6. The Committee, after further discussion, agreed that the delegation from the British West Indies be met by members of the Committee on External Trade Policy under the Chairmanship of the Deputy Minister of Trade and Commerce to discuss such matters as might be raised, regard to be had in the discussions to the points developed in the course of the Committee's discussion.

DESPATCH E-2501 Ottawa, July 3, 1951

CANADA-B.W.I. TRADE TALKS

A B.W.I. mission was in Ottawa from June 27th to 29th. It was initiated by the new Regional Economic Committee of the B.W.I. which agreed, at its first meeting, that it was urgently necessary to look into the apparent deterioration of Canada - B.W.I. trade relations and that, for this purpose, a delegation should visit first London and then Canada.

2. A list of the B.W.I. delegation and the Canadian officials who have met with them is attached.† They were welcomed by Mr. Abbott at the first meeting and had talks with the Prime Minister, Mr. Howe, Mr. Mayhew, other Ministers, Members of Parliament, and others. They also met with representatives of various Canadian fishery associations. Mr. Howe gave a luncheon, the British Commonwealth Parliamentary Association gave a tea, and Sir Alexander Clutterbuck gave a cocktail party. In Montreal, the Canadian Exporters Association are giving a banquet.

3. It is not surprising that the members of the delegation are leaving with favourable and friendly feelings about Canada! In his final talk the leader (Mr. Gomes) paid warm and obviously sincere tributes to the officials with whom they had talked and especially to Mr. Bull who was in charge of all arrangements.

4. A large number of matters were discussed. Easily the most important were:

(i) Canadian Imports of Non-Empire Sugar

The B.W.I. delegation said that the Canadian decision at Torquay to bulk purchase 75,000 tons a year of raw sugar from Cuba and a similar amount from other non-Empire sources was regarded as a very serious blow in the B.W.I. which had relied on the continuity of their market for sugar in Canada under the tariff preference.

Mr. McKinnon and Mr. Deutsch gave a very frank explanation of the reasons which had led Canada to make this arrangement with Cuba. Basically it resulted from growing criticism in certain quarters in Canada which was directed at the whole of the Canada-West Indies Trade Agreement of 1926, and particularly at the sugar preference, in view of the fact that Canadian exports to B.W.I. had been so curtailed by import restrictions and other measures. The Cubans had started by demanding complete abolition of our preference on sugar and had offered to reduce their own preferences in a way which would facilitate Canadian sales of fish, potatoes, and other products which the B.W.I. were restricting. Canada had resisted Cuban pressure most tenaciously. The bulk purchase arrangement was the least that we could get away with without precipitating a trade war with Cuba.

The B.W.I. group tried to obtain some undertaking that when the present arrangement with Cuba ran out in three years' time there would be a reversion to the original position. Canadian representatives emphasized that decisions taken in three years' time would depend on the position of trade at that time and developments in the meantime.

(ii) General Liberalization of B.W.I. Imports from Canada

Both the Canadian and B.W.I. representatives were anxious to increase the amount of Canadian exports to B.W.I. although both recognized the limitations imposed by the supplies of dollars available to the sterling area.

The existing token import scheme was reviewed. The Canadian group explained that we would prefer to see liberalization moved forward with the following priorities:

(a) Addition of new items to the list of token imports.

(b) The transfer of certain basic items, such as fish and flour, from the token import scheme to open general licenses into the West Indies.

(c) An increase from 30 to 40 per cent of base period in the quotas under the token import scheme.

There was a general measure of agreement between the two groups but the following points emerged. In the first place the B.W.I. would apparently give a rather higher priority to (c) above. In the second place they suggested that the transfer of goods from a quota arrangement under (a) or (c) to a freer competitive arrangement under (b) might not be in Canadian interests; as long as there was some sort of token import scheme for Canadian goods, Canadian exporters could feel assured of their markets in the B.W.I. The Canadian delegation vigorously disclaimed any desire for special protection in the West Indies markets. The Canadian policy was to press for the reduction and relaxation of sterling area import controls, and not for their indefinite extension.

The liberalization scheme had of course been discussed in Ottawa last month at the meeting of the Canada-United Kingdom Continuing Committee and also during the past fortnight when the B.W.I. delegation were in London. Unfortunately the United Kingdom officials do not seem to have left a very favourable impression on the B.W.I. group. However, there does not seem to be any very wide difference of view between the B.W.I. group, the United Kingdom official attitude, and our own attitude, and it seems likely that some substantial new measure of trade liberalization will be put into effect by the end of this year, if not sooner.

(iii) B.W.I. Exports of Bananas to Canada

Here again the B.W.I. questioned a Canadian action at Torquay. The Canadian tariff, which had formerly related to "bunches" of bananas, was now relating to their weight and this had admittedly resulted in some reduction of the Imperial preference on bananas. The Canadian side pointed out that relatively little use was being made of the preference and that the present tariff arrangements were bound for three years. Here again the action taken at the end of the three-year period would depend upon experience in the meantime.

(iv) Canadian National Steamship Service

The B.W.I. group strongly urged that this service should be maintained despite the deficits being borne by the Canadian Government. They had a number of particular complaints, including specific charges of inefficiency. Arrangements are being made for them to see Mr. Donald Gordon if he is in town when they visit Montreal.

Memorandum from Economic Division to Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

Ottawa, July 25, 1951

Yesterday I attended a meeting called by Fred Bull to meet representatives of the Canadian National Railways on the subject of the shipping provisions of our 1925 Trade Treaty with the British West Indies. Present were Bull and other representatives of his Department, Beattie from the Bank of Canada, Hector McKinnon, our Trade Commissioner in the B.W.I., Lessard of Transport, Donald Gordon and two of his officials from Montreal.

2. The purpose of this meeting, which was quite inconclusive, was to give Donald Gordon the opportunity to lay before our officials the fact that Canadian National Steamships must shortly make a decision on the question of renovation or replacement of their steamships in the B.W.I. service. You may remember that the 1925 Trade Treaty contains requirements for the provision of steamship service by Canada and the payment of subsidies by the Colonies; at the time the Treaty was negotiated this service was a quid pro quo for certain tariff concessions.

3. The position of Canadian National Steamships is that they cannot continue to operate their passenger steamers, mainly consisting of the two "Lady" ships because these ships are obsolescent, were run very hard during the war years and are now inefficient almost to the point where safety is questionable.

4. The point upon which Gordon needs advice is: will it be government policy to continue this uneconomical service, quite heavy deficits and consequent Canadian government subsidies in return for tariff concessions which have largely been rendered nugatory through import controls or will we extricate ourselves through renegotiation of the treaty and abandon this service to the two competitors of CNS, ALCOA and Saguenay Terminals? The past deficits of C.N.S. would be insignificant in comparison to those arising from the fixed charges for a fleet replaced at current costs.

5. The principal factor in the 1925 Treaty was sugar for which we guaranteed a preference to the West Indies. Our recent bulk purchase of sugar from Cuba has caused apprehension in the B.W.I. and it may be said that the prospects of securing liberalization of import controls against our exports to that area are helped by the pressure which the B.W.I. must be exerting on the British Government in the face of their traditional market for sugar slipping away from them. In the light of this it was the opinion of the meeting that it is in our interest to pursue delaying tactics in the matter of shipping services for a year or so by which time West Indian pressure on the British may have achieved some liberalization of import controls against our exports. Our position in the Caribbean is very favourable at present; the sugar purchase from Cuba has kindled amicable sentiments in that country and in the West Indies the bitterness engendered by the purchase has been wholly directed towards the British. There is, I gather, a lively spirit of friendliness to Canada throughout the Islands. It may well be that to precipitate the shipping issue at this time would be to overplay our hand and to give the U.K. a welcome opportunity to deflect some of the criticism they are getting towards Canada.

6. Gordon wanted to know whether there would be any objection in Ottawa to C.N.S. participating in a shipping meeting called by B.W.I. authorities and if Canadian Government officials might join in such discussions. The opinion of the meeting was that officials should not participate but that there seemed to be little objection to C.N.S. engaging in them although we did not see how the talks could be very conclusive because of the close interrelation between shipping and trade policy.

7. Gordon mentioned to me after the meeting that a U.K. shipping company had been enquiring into the possibility of undertaking management of the Service under the more liberal union regulations obtaining in the U.K. If this could be done and subsidies eliminated with the Service remaining under the Canadian flag it would seem to be an ideal solution.

8. The C.N.S. have made an analysis of recent trade with the West Indies and propose consulting the research people in the Department of Trade and Commerce about it. I do not think anything is required by this Department at present but we shall keep an eye on any developments.

IMMIGRATION FROM THE BRITISH WEST INDIES

16. The Minister of Citizenship and Immigration reported that, under the provisions which had been in effect for a number of years and which were now contained in Order in Council P.C. 2743 of June 2nd, 1949, negroes from the British West Indies were not admissible to Canada. This result was brought about indirectly under the provisions of the Order in Council. By special arrangements a few were allowed to remain in Canada, from time to time, after arrival here for school attendance or other purposes. Admissions had never exceeded 125 - 150 in any year. 97 had been admitted so far in 1951. Negroes from the United States were admissible as U.S. citizens. There had been representations by organizations in Canada about the discrimination against negroes from the West Indies and consideration was being given to the desirability of making some new provision. One approach might be to make the same categories of relatives of Canadian citizens admissible as were now admissible in the case of Asiatics. In addition, there could be a quota for married children of Canadian citizens — possibly about 50 per year — and a further quota of about the same size for non-relatives. By this means movement might be kept down to less than 200 per year. If restrictions were removed there would be a much greater influx. There were indications that resentment over the present position was increasing in the West Indies.

17. The Secretary of State for External Affairs suggested that the situation would not be improved if it became known that there was a "black" quota. On the other hand, it would not be possible to operate such a system with any advantage over the present position if the existence of a quota were to be kept confidential. If a quota were to be established it would seem preferable to have it cover all immigrants from the West Indies and not simply negroes.

18. The Minister of Trade and Commerce suggested that the best course would be to continue the present policy as long as possible and to take care of individual cases that deserved consideration by means of special arrangements.

19. The Cabinet, after discussion, noted the report of the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration and agreed that, for the time being, no modification be made in the provisions relating to immigration from the British West Indies to Canada.

NOTES ON MILITARY PROCUREMENT IN THE UNITED STATES FOR THE USE OF THE CANADIAN SECTION OF THE PERMANENT JOINT BOARD ON DEFENCE

In the Statement of Principles for Economic Cooperation signed by Canada and the United States in October, 1950, the two governments agreed to coordinate the economic efforts of their two countries for the common defense.[1] It was also agreed that the optimum use should be made of the resources and facilities of both countries. As this is the principle that should govern military procurement both in Canada and the United States, it is felt that it should form the background for any discussion on military procurement problems.

In May, 1950, the United States agreed to develop a program for reciprocal purchasing of military equipment in Canada up to $25 million for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1951 and this objective was later increased to $100 million.[2] On the accompanying table† (see Table 1) it will be noted that U.S. military purchases reached $84 million, which was not far off the American objective. Expenditures on radar, amounting to almost 40 million, formed a large part of this total, while 3 inch 50 calibre twin mounts accounted for another $23.6 million. An order for Arctic huts amounted to $5.3 million. In the ammunition and explosives field, U.S. purchases of picrite and practice bombs were around $3 million in each case.

[1] Voir/See Volume 16, Documents 775-795.
[2] Voir/See Volume 16, Documents 771 and 778.

Canada, on the other hand, put no ceiling on military procurement in the United States, and in the same period our purchases totalled $316 million (see Table 2).† The main reason for this heavy volume of purchases was the Canadian Government's decision to standardize of U.S.-type equipment and in the beginning, a large part of this has to be bought in the United States. Equipment for two Army Divisions accounted for $110 million at the end of June, 1951, while another $130 million went into the F-86 aircraft program. Orders for Beechcraft came to $14 million and for A.A. fire control (T.33) amounted to $12.5 million. Provided our defence program continues as presently planned, it is not expected that this high rate of purchasing will be maintained indefinitely. Once the initial equipment with U.S.-types is completed and as we get into production in this country, expenditures of this kind should level off.

In considering the imbalance in procurement between Canada and the United States, as shown in the accompanying tables, there are certain factors to be taken into consideration. These figures show only orders placed by the two governments. Not included in the Canadian figures are orders placed in the United States by private firms that have defence contracts from the Canadian Government. Nor do the figures show any of the Canadian orders placed through agents in Canada of U.S. firms. While the degree of under-statement of Canadian defence orders in the United States cannot be estimated, it is no doubt of substantial proportions.

The U.S. figures, on the other hand, are based on the records of the Canadian Commercial Corporation, which has acted and continues to act as the procurement agency for the U.S. Armed Services in Canada. As the Americans point out, these figures do not reflect heavy U.S. expenditures in Canada on basic raw materials such as copper, nickel, lead, etc.

As was to be expected when starting a new arrangement, some operational difficulties were encountered during the first year of reciprocal defence procurement. These difficulties have been somewhat greater in the case of Canadian firms obtaining sub-contracts from U.S. prime contractors than has been the case in direct government orders. However, one case in which the Canadian government has had some trouble was in connection with orders that involved obtaining permission to manufacture U.S.-type equipment in this country. This permission from U.S. patent holders and from U.S. authorities to make certain U.S. types of war stores was, in some cases, somewhat slow in being granted. Once manufacturing rights were cleared, there was on occasion further delay in obtaining drawings, specifications and production data. In this instance the problem was largely a mechanical one, due to the bulk and number of these items, making it difficult, for example, to gather together the several hundreds of drawings sometimes required for one contract. This situation was, however, called to the attention of the U.S. Secretary of State by the Canadian Minister of Defence Production. Since then, great improvement has been noted, although detailed information needed in the production of a number of items is still lacking.

Another problem has been that of customs duties on defence articles. This is a problem which has affected the sub-contract picture, as direct procurement by the U.S. government is allowed to enter the United States duty free. Emergency purchases of war material, if imported in the name of the one of the three Secretaries of the Armed Services or of a few other government agencies, can enter on a Duty Free Entry Permit. All other imports of military items into the United States are subject to duty at full value of the finished article and not at the value of the imported component (i.e. the value added in Canada). This has tended to discourage the letting of sub-contracts outside the United States. In Canada, all imports of war materials are subject to full duty.

Discussion on the subject of customs relaxation has taken place between officials of the two countries. Last April, Canadian officials advised the Chairman of the U.S. Munitions Board that they were prepared to recommend to the Canadian Government proposals for reciprocal free entry into the two countries of certain military end items, provided the ultimate purchaser was the Government of the United States or the Government of Canada. The suggested list was the first seven items of the U.S. list of D.O. priority ratings, viz., aircraft, guided missiles, ships, tanks and military vehicles, weapons, ammunition, and military communication equipment. The Americans indicated general agreement with the broad conclusions arrived at in Ottawa but nothing decisive has been done to date, although it is understood that the Americans are working on the problem. In a recent meeting in Washington, it was stated that an enabling amendment to the existing legislation was being drafted. It is understood that any steps toward the elimination of duty would have to be reciprocal.

Canadian firms trying to secure sub-contracts in the United States have also experienced some difficulties under the "Buy American" Act. Under this Act, all government purchases of supplies for public use in the United States, its possessions and territories, have to be made in the domestic market. There are, however, certain exceptions to the Act, which permit purchases abroad if it is inconsistent with the public interest to buy in the domestic market; if it would unnecessarily increase the cost to do so; or if the materials are not available in the United States. In such cases the Secretaries of the Departments concerned have to grant the exception. In the operation of the reciprocal purchasing program, this procedure has been found to be somewhat cumbersome and efforts are being made to have the Secretaries' authority delegated down to local procurement officers. So far this has only been done in the case of the Air Force, where the authority has been delegated to Wright Field. It has also been found that there is lack of understanding on the part of local procurement officers as to the procedure involved in applying for exemption under the "Buy American" Act and an unwillingness to consider the placing of sub-contracts in Canada. Efforts are being made in the Washington office of the Department of Defence Production to deal with this problem and to secure more definite instructions with regard to U.S. military procurement in this country.

The outlook for reciprocal military purchasing in the coming fiscal year is, on the whole, more promising. General Marshall announced recently the authorization of up to $300 million in purchases of military supplies in Canada during the present fiscal year. Under a directive issued on June 29th by the Acting Secretary of Defense, waivers of the restrictive features of the "Buy American" Act will be granted up to $100 million for each of the three Armed Services. Another important step is the decision to reactivate and expand the Joint Industrial Mobilization Committee. It is hoped that through closer personal contacts of sub committees at the working level many of the difficulties experienced in the first year of operation will be ironed out and that defence orders placed in Canada will be increased.

DEFENCE PROGRAMME; REPORT FROM CABINET DEFENCE COMMITTEE

(a) Extension of the Aircraft Control and Warning System in Canada

47. The Minister of National Defence reported that a proposed extension of the aircraft control and warning (A.C.W.) system in Canada was included in the new defence programme. This required separate consideration as it involved collaboration with the U.S. Air Force in operating a large project on Canadian soil.

Under North Atlantic Treaty arrangements, Canada and the United States had the task of defending their region and the concept developed for such defence was that areas containing the essential elements of North American war-making capacity should be protected. For this purpose, it was essential to have an A.C.W. system which could detect enemy bombers, disseminate warnings and control interceptor aircraft.

In view of the serious international situation, the U.S.A.F. had suggested extension of the authorized Canadian A.C.W. programme of nine stations in the Montreal-Ottawa-Toronto and Canadian Pacific Coast areas. The R.C.A.F. and the U.S.A.F., jointly, had prepared a plan for establishment of a larger integrated network in Canada by July, 1952, and the Permanent Joint Board on Defence had discussed a possible formula for U.S. collaboration in the network, which would operate in conjunction with the A.C.W. system in the United States.

Under the plan, there would be additional stations in the two Canadian areas mentioned, and also stations in the Lower St. Lawrence-Southern Labrador-Newfoundland, Northern Labrador, and Northern Ontario-Manitoba areas, bringing the number of stations in Canada to 31 (with an additional U.S. station in Greenland).

The formula discussed by the P.J.B.D. provided that each country would pay one-half the capital cost of 19 stations — including the 9 authorized — and that the United States would pay the capital cost of the remaining 12. This would mean an outlay for Canada of some $45 million, plus that for any necessary Canadian married quarters, which was no more than the unshared cost of the 9 stations originally planned. The total capital cost to the United States (including the Greenland station) would be about $114 million. Canada would pay one-third — about $12.5 million — and the United States two-thirds of the recurring costs of the 27 stations and the U.S.A.F. would be responsible for the recurring costs of the 4 stations in Northern Labrador. Owing to manpower difficulties, the R.C.A.F. could man initially only 13 stations, requiring about 2400 officers and men — or 960 more than the 9 authorized stations. The remaining 18 stations, which would not be near main centres, would be manned by some 2300 Americans, although Canada would reserve the right to man any of these without prejudice to the U.S. financial contributions.

The Canadian government would have title to land and immoveable property at the 31 stations and the United States could dispose of its share of moveables when they were no longer required. As much as possible of the equipment for the stations would be bought in Canada, where it was thought a substantial part of the electronic equipment could be produced. Canadian contractors, through Defence Construction Corporation, would build as many as possible of the stations, although the U.S.A.F. would construct the stations in Northern Labrador (and Greenland). Any U.S. civilian contractors employed on the network would use Canadian labour and materials as much as possible and would be subject to normal employment and taxation practices.

Cabinet Defence Committee had recommended acceptance in principle of these proposals so as to permit the Canadian section of the P.J.B.D. to participate in a Board recommendation to the two governments along these lines.

An explanatory memorandum was circulated.

(Minister's memorandum, Jan. 22, 1951 — Cab. Doc. D-271)†

The United States would consider its contributions to the project as measures of self-defence and not mutual aid to Canada. The division of costs was based on the relative importance of each station to the air defence of each country. One great advantage of the project was that Canada would not bear the responsibility alone for bombers that penetrated to the United States. Unlike earlier plans for a ring of early warning and fighter stations across the North, this scheme would be practicable and effective. Tests had been carried out at the proposed sites. The project would add vital depth to the extensive system being developed in the United States. While a system of only 31 stations could not be one hundred per cent effective, it would add greatly to the efficiency of North American defences and the equipment contemplated was likely to be the best procurable for some years. It might be desirable to make some additions to the network at a later date. A radar network had been the basis of the defence of Britain during the war. The top U.S. defence authorities attached the greatest urgency to construction of the network.

The defences of Alaska, including the A.C.W. system, were being built up. It had been considered that the most likely Soviet bomber route would be through the northeastern area of the continent but the prevailing winds would make the northwestern route attractive. The Soviets were believed to have B-29-type bombers that could make one-way raids on any part of North America but did not yet appear to have six-engine or jet bombers with long-range capabilities. Considering estimates of Soviet stocks of atomic bombs, only one or two centres in Canada would be likely to be attacked with such bombs at this stage. If the Soviets attempted to use a Canadian Arctic station as a bomber base, warning would be received and it was expected that such a base, which would have immense supply problems, could be immobilized rapidly.

Operating in conjunction with the proposed radar network, there would be, by 1954, 9 Canadian regular fighter squadrons, and also 10 reserve squadrons which could be brought to a high level of efficiency with two or three months of intensive training. These squadrons could be used elsewhere during an emergency, if the air defence position permitted.

48. The Prime Minister said that experts considered the proposed network an essential warning system rather than a static defence line; that the equipment to be used was technically sound; and that there would be forces available to make use of the "early warning" provided. The formula proposed for U.S. participation in the scheme seemed reasonable. Under new legislation the U.S.A.F. was not expected to require leases.

49. The Cabinet, after further discussion, agreed in principle to proposals discussed by the Permanent Joint Board on Defence for the creation in Canada of a Canada-U.S. aircraft control and warning system, and agreed to the Canadian section of the Board participating in a recommendation to the two governments for the establishment and operation of this system under arrangements of the type considered by the Board on January 10th, 1951.

Note du sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures pour le secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

Memorandum from Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to Secretary of State for External Affairs

TOP SECRET Ottawa, April 6, 1951

PROPOSED RADAR DEFENCE SCHEME

You will recall that the proposed radar defence scheme recommended by the Permanent Joint Board on Defence and approved by the Government provides for:

(a) Construction of thirty-one stations in Canada, nine by Canada, the remainder by the United States;

(b) the manning of thirteen stations by Canada at the outset and ultimately of all stations as personnel become available (possibly we shall go slow on manning the Newfoundland stations which are primarily for the early warning of the U.S. bases there);

(c) the sharing of operational costs on the basis of two-thirds U.S., one-third Canada;

(d) the continuance of all stations except by agreement by the two Governments.

2. When the scheme was discussed by the PJBD the Canadian Section held firmly to the line that title to sites should remain in Canada. However, the U.S. Section expressed the view that some assurance of U.S. rights might have to be given to Congress in order to obtain the necessary appropriation. The clause in the Recommendation relating to these matters reads as follows:

"(a) Canada to acquire and retain title to all sites required in Canada for the system; the U.S. to be granted such rights of access, use and occupancy as may be required for its effective participation."

3. A law officer of the USAF was recently in Ottawa arranging for contracts for construction, and during his visit officials of this Department and National Defence discussed with him, at the request of the USAF, the nature of inter-governmental agreements which might be necessary for the scheme. He felt that under existing U.S. law some security of occupancy to the stations to be constructed by the U.S. would be required before the U.S. could spend funds on new construction. Two possibilities were discussed:

(a) Assured rights of occupancy by the U.S. for twenty years (the duration of the North Atlantic Treaty);

(b) indefinite rights of occupancy.

In either case the agreement would be subject to the recommendations of the Board, under which Canada would, in fact, man and take over stations as rapidly as possible. The effect in either case would be that the U.S. would still retain formal right to occupy the stations it constructed and, presumably, title to equipment, although, in fact, it would not exercise these rights. It was agreed that the USAF official would "rough out" a draft of an inter-governmental agreement which he would send to us for our comments. Attached is the draft received from the USAF official on an informal basis.† It will be observed that it provides for indefinite rights of occupancy by the U.S.

4. My disposition would be to take a firm line and refuse to agree to any formal rights of occupancy. The U.S. Defence authorities are very anxious for the construction of the radar screen, and I am inclined to think we should take advantage of this situation. If their law requires changing to meet our position it is not our problem. I should think that the principle recommended by the PJBD, that no station can be closed down by either party without the consent of the other, ought to be sufficient assurance to Congress that funds spent on the scheme will not be frittered away or be simply a gift to another country.[3]

RE QUESTION OF PUBLICATION AND REGISTRATION OF DEFENCE AGREEMENTS WITH THE UNITED STATES, WITH PARTICULAR REFERENCE TO THE RADAR DEFENCE SYSTEM

Before discussing the general question, I will explain what has happened regarding the PJBD's Recommendation 51/1 on the radar defence system.

2. On March 9 Mr. Johnson (Assistant General Counsel, USAF) was in Ottawa and met with officials of this Department and the Judge Advocate General. He said that the USAF and the State Department thought that it was necessary and desirable to have an Exchange of Notes to confirm and supplement the Recommendation. Although we would have been content to rely on the Recommendation of the PJBD and to dispense with a formal Exchange of Notes, we suggested to Mr. Johnson that he prepare and send us informally a draft note. He has done so and we are not satisfied with some of its provisions. Enclosed for your information is a copy of Mr. Johnson's draft† and a copy of my memorandum of April 6 to the Minister explaining the objections to some of its provisions. (The Minister agreed with the memorandum). This is for your information only; we do not desire you to initiate any discussion with the State Department of Mr. Johnson's draft. In due course, when Mr. Johnson re-opens the subject in Ottawa, he will be given our views on his draft. In the alternative, it is always open to the State Department to propose a draft.

3. However, having concluded that Mr. Johnson's draft is not acceptable and having started to prepare a counter-draft, we have come squarely up against the problem of publication and registration with the United Nations. Mr. Johnson gave us to understand that the State Department had told him that the proposed Exchange of Notes would have to be registered with the United Nations. Mr. Haselton of the State Department, who was here last week, also said that registration with United Nations is contemplated.

4. It seems to us that, if the Notes are to be registered and made public, it is not desirable that they should refer to a particular Recommendation of the Board which is not being published or registered. Some parts of the Recommendation clearly must be kept secret for security reasons.

5. What we wish to know now is whether the State Department has given serious consideration to the general problem of publishing and registering U.S.-Canada defence arrangements and has definitely concluded that publication and registration are always necessary.

6. It seems to this Department, on the official level that most of the defence arrangements entered into between our two countries are not very suitable for publication and that there is no compelling reason to register them under Article 102 of the Charter of the United Nations. In fact, there are many agreements in force which have been neither published nor registered, e.g., agreements for USAF flights and exercises. There will undoubtedly be agreements in the future which must be kept absolutely secret, e.g., the "canopy" proposal with which you are familiar.[4]

7. Our thinking with regard to the radar Recommendation is that, although we are willing to have an Exchange of Notes if the United States wants one and if its terms can be agreed, it does not necessarily follow that such an agreement should be published and registered. It would seem to us more appropriate, and also safer, to limit the publicity to a general statement that the two countries are co-operating in the construction and operation of radar stations for their joint defence.

8. If you see no objection, I should be obliged if the Embassy would have an informal talk on these general problems with a high official of the State Department. I venture to suggest a "high official" because I do not think that the views of the Canadian desk would be adequate for this purpose. When we have received your report on this talk, and your views, we will endeavour to obtain a decision from our Minister and the Minister of National Defence on the question of the kind of Exchange of Notes they would accept in the case of the radar project.

RADAR DEFENCE AGREEMENT

At the PJBD meeting this week the U.S. Section informally tabled a draft Note which, we understand, was drafted by Johnson of the U.S.A.F. The text of this draft is given in my immediately following teletype. The U.S. Section indicated that the U.S. Government would like to have an Exchange of Notes in addition to the Recommendation. We also understand that it was the State Department's view that such Notes should be published and registered with the United Nations.

[4] Voir le document 688./See Document 688.

2. We understand that there will be meeting on Monday in State Department to discuss this matter further, and I should appreciate it if you could give Haselton, the contents of this telegram prior to their meeting.

3. As you know, the view of officials in this Department is that it is not (repeat not) necessary to have an Exchange of Notes at all. The Recommendation, when approved by both governments, has the same status as an agreement. However, if the U.S. Government were anxious to have an Exchange of Notes, we would not press our objection.

4. The second question is whether Exchanges of Notes on such matters should be published and registered with the United Nations. As you know from our telegram No. EX-1017 of May 9,† we think it is unwise and unnecessary to make public defence agreements of this kind. However, we have not yet submitted this point to Ministers in Ottawa.

5. Turning now to the annexed draft submitted by the U.S. Section, our principle objection to it is that paragraph 2 would give the United States more of an interest in the land than is required by the Recommendation or necessary for its implementation. It seems to us that the effect of paragraph 2 of the U.S. draft is to give the United States a continuing interest in the land of all stations constructed by the United States, this interest to continue even after a station has been taken over by the RCAF. It is the last mentioned feature which we feel is unnecessary and which goes beyond the requirements of the Recommendation.

6. We have prepared in this Department an alternative draft in a form which might be made public (but the annex to it would not be made public). Will you please give this draft to the U.S. Section, making it clear that it is simply a working draft prepared by officials in this Department.

Following is the text of our draft:

Text Begins: I have the honour to refer to the recent discussions by the Permanent Joint Board on Defence regarding the extension and co-ordination of the continental radar defence system within Canada and to record herein the Canadian Government's understanding of the arrangements which have been agreed upon:

1. The Governments of Canada and the United States will, in the interests of joint defence against air attack, construct and operate within Canada the radar stations listed in the Annex† to this note.

2. The capital costs of construction (except housing for dependents), and of equipment and communication facilities, will be shared on the basis of, approximately, two-thirds by the United States and one-third by Canada. In order to facilitate implementation of the plan and to simplify the division of costs, the United States and Canada respectively will assume financial responsibility for the construction and equipping of those stations (with their associated control facilities) allocated to each of them for the purpose in the Annex.

3. The maintenance and operating costs of all the stations will be shared, two-thirds by the United States and one-third by Canada.

4. Canada will require and retain title to all sites required in Canada for the system. The Canadian Government hereby grants and assures to the United States Government, without charge, such rights of access, use and occupancy as may be required from time to time by the United States for its effective participation in the system.

or

4. Canada will acquire and retain title to all sites required in Canada for the system. The Canadian Government hereby grants and assures to the United States Government, without charges, such rights of access, use and occupancy as may be required:

(a) for the construction of stations by the United States pursuant to paragraph 2 of this Note, and

(b) for the operation of stations by the United States pursuant to paragraph 6 of this Note.

5. So far as practicable, construction of the installations required by the plan will be carried out by Canadian agencies and contractors with Canadian labour and materials, and electronic and other equipment manufactured in Canada will be used.

6. The stations will be manned and operated initially by Canada and the United States respectively according to the division set forth in the Annex. Canada may, at times to be mutually agreed upon, take over from the United States the manning and operation of stations previously manned and operated by the United States.

7. Neither government will discontinue the operation of any station or any part of the system without the prior concurrence of the other government.

8. All possible measures will be taken to ensure that the system will be operating by the target date set forth in the Annex.

9. Within the sites made available to the United States, the United States, so far as may be consistent with the laws of Canada, may do whatever is necessary or appropriate to the carrying out of its responsibilities in Canada in connection with the construction and operation of the continental radar defense system, in accordance with this Note including:

(a) Construction, installation and operation of the necessary structures, facilities, and equipment;

(b) Improvement of the sites as may be required to fit them for their intended use;

(c) Stationing of personnel under the control and command of United States military authorities.

10. Ownership of all property brought into Canada or purchased in Canada by the United States and placed on the sites, other than structures permanently affixed to the realty, shall remain in the United States. The United States, subject to para. 7 of this Note, shall have the unrestricted right of removing or disposing of all such property, PROVIDED that removal or disposition takes place within a reasonable time after the date on which, by agreement of the two governments, the operation of the particular station has been discontinued.

11. In accordance with the principles stated in this Note, details concerning the manning, operation and financing of the system in Canada shall be settled by subsequent agreement between the appropriate authorities of Canada and the United States.

12. The capabilities of the system will be kept under constant review in the light of current developments.

If the foregoing is acceptable to your Government, this Note and your reply shall constitute an agreement, effective from the date of your reply. End of draft. End of telegram.

1. The views contained in your teletype under reference were communicated to Haselton this morning before the State Department meeting on this subject. We told Haselton that our first preference would be to rely on the board's recommendation rather than on an exchange of notes. If there were to be an exchange of notes we would prefer that it not be published or registered with the United Nations. In any case, we would not wish the publication or registration of this exchange of notes to set a precedent for future agreements in the defence field between the United States and Canada. With particular reference to Johnson's draft, we drew Haselton's attention to the fact that paragraph 2 seemed to go further than the recommendation of the board. We said that if the exchange of notes were to be in any detail we thought that the note should follow as closely as possible the recommendations of the board.

2. We have now been given a brief account of the State Department meeting on this subject this morning. The U.S.A.F. are apparently convinced that an exchange of notes formalizing the agreement is necessary to meet possible Congressional criticism of the joint project. Assuming an exchange of notes, the legal staff of the State Department maintain that registration with the United Nations is essential.

3. United States authorities are, however, prepared to proceed on the basis of our revised draft as contained in your teletype under reference and to spell out the major recommendations of the board, eliminating of course the reference to the location of the facilities. They believe that it would be inappropriate to refer in the main note (which would be published and registered with the United Nations) to a classified annex. For this reason they would prefer that the phraseology "as mutually agreed" should be substituted where the "annex" is referred to. They agreed that paragraph 2 of their draft went further than the recommendations of the board, and would be prepared to substitute for it paragraph 4 of your draft. Other minor textual amendments to your draft will also be suggested.

4. It is my understanding that Johnson will be in Ottawa tomorrow for detailed discussions with MacKay on this subject. I thought, however, you might wish to have some advance notice of the United States reaction to our suggested revisions.

CONTINENTAL RADAR DEFENCE SYSTEM

Below is a new draft note, in a form which might be made public, worked out at a meeting in the Department May 15 attended by Bliss of the Embassy and Johnson of the USAF. It has not been cleared at any higher level. It was agreed with Bliss that the next move was up to the U.S., and that we would not secure clearance at higher level until Johnson had at least cleared with his Department. Since Comptroller of Treasury here has agreed to release funds to meet outstanding bills on construction projects being undertaken by Defence Construction Limited for USAF, it is felt that we are not impeding progress of radar scheme in any way. Please inform State Department accordingly and give them copy of draft. Johnson is taking back copies for the USAF.

Draft begins:

I have the honour to refer to the recent discussions by the Permanent Joint Board on Defence regarding the extension and co-ordination of the continental radar defence system within Canada and to record herein the Canadian Government's understanding of the arrangements which have been agree upon:

1. Subject to the availability of appropriated funds, the Governments of Canada and the United States will, in the interests of joint defence against air attacks, construct and operate within Canada an extension of the continental radar defence system, (hereinafter referred to as "the extension").

2. The costs of construction (except housing for dependents), equipment, and operation of the extension will be shared on the basis of approximately two-thirds by the United States and one-third by Canada. In order to simplify the division of costs in accordance with this principle, the United States and Canada will each assume financial responsibility for construction, equipment and operation of those stations (with their associated control facilities) respectively allocated to each of them by agreement between the appropriate authorities of the two Governments. Neither Government will discontinue the operation of any station or any part of the extension without the prior concurrence of the other Government.

3. So far as practicable, construction of the installations required for the extension will be carried out by Canadian agencies and contractors with Canadian labour and materials. Electronic and other equipment manufactured in Canada will also be used, so far as practicable.

4. Canada will acquire and retain title to all sites required in Canada for the extension. The Canadian Government hereby grants and assures to the United States Government, without charge, such rights of access, use and occupancy as may be required for the construction, equipment and operation of stations allocated to the United States pursuant to paragraph 2 of this Note.

5. Within the sites made available to the United States pursuant to paragraph 4 of this Note, the United States, so far as may be consistent with the laws of Canada, may do whatever is necessary or appropriate to the carrying out of its responsibilities in Canada in connection with the construction, equipment and operation of the extension in accordance with this Note, including:

(a) Construction, installation and operation of the necessary structures, facilities, and equipment, and such improvement of the sites as may be required to fit them for their intended use, PROVIDED that all major construction and all installations of major equipment shall have the prior approval of the appropriate Canadian authorities and

(b) stationing of personnel under the control and command of United States military authorities.

6. Ownership of all property brought into Canada or purchased in Canada by the United States and placed on the sites, other than structures permanently affixed to the realty, shall remain in the United States. The United States shall have the unrestricted right of removing or disposing of all such property, PROVIDED that the removal or disposition shall not impair the operation of any station whose discontinuance has not been agreed upon by both Governments, and PROVIDED further that removal or disposition takes place within a reasonable time after the date on which, by agreement of the two Governments, the operation of the particular station has been discontinued.

7. The stations will be manned initially by Canada and the United States respectively according to arrangements agreed upon by the appropriate authorities of the two Governments. Canada may, at times to be mutually agreed upon, take over the manning of stations initially manned by the United States.

8. In accordance with the principles stated in this Note, further details concerning the construction, equipment and operation of the extension shall be settled by subsequent agreement between the appropriate authorities of the two Governments.

9. The capabilities of the extension will be kept under constant review in the light of current developments.

PUBLICATION OF DEFENCE AGREEMENTS

1. Yesterday we discussed with Tate, the acting legal adviser, and other officers of the State Department the question of publication and registration of United States-Canada defence agreements.

2. We pointed out to Tate that what we were anxious to know was the general United States attitude on the following points:

(a) Whether in all cases formal agreements were necessary, and

(b) If in those cases where formal agreements were necessary they should be registered under Article 102.

We pointed out that, in our opinion, for some of the agreements registration, even in an abbreviated form, would be impossible and in some others the registered agreement would have to omit various details of importance.

3. Tate said that in the opinion of the State Department it was not possible to lay down a general rule governing publication and registration of all agreements on defence arrangements. Tate agreed that informal arrangements which would not constitute formal agreements would, wherever practicable, be satisfactory. This could take the form of acceptance of P.J.B.D. recommendations by both governments or of inter-service correspondence. At times, however, for various reasons a formal agreement might be necessary. He pointed out that he had first thought acceptance by the two government of the P.J.B.D. recommendation concerning the radar defence screen would be adequate. Subsequently, however, he was convinced by the legal officers of the air force that under their legislation and also for the purpose of obtaining appropriations from Congress a formal agreement would be required.

4. He suggested that in each case where a formal agreement was required the procedure followed in the radar case should, where possible, be adopted, i.e., an agreement worded in such a way that it could be published and registered with the United Nations should be worked out, and he thought this could be done in most cases where a formal agreement was required.

5. The general impression gained at this interview was that Canadian and United States thinking on the problem was not far apart. The United States will not press for formal agreements except where they are required for some practical purpose. They do not consider that any hard and fast rule should be adopted as to publication and registration, but will be ready to consider each case individually.

RE PROPOSED EXCHANGE OF NOTES WITH THE UNITED STATES REGARDING RADAR DEFENCE SYSTEM

You requested further information on the following points:

(1) the insistence of the United States on having an Exchange of Notes to supplement the PJBD Recommendation; and

(2) the United States wish that the Exchange of Notes be registered with the United Nations.

2. Officials of this Department and National Defence have discussed these questions over a period of many weeks with Mr. Johnson, the solicitor for the United States Air Force. In addition our Embassy in Washington discussed them with the Acting Legal Adviser of the State Department. We have been unable to move the U.S. officials from the position that an Exchange of Notes is necessary and that it should be registered with United Nations. The difficulty about refusing to accede to their wishes in the matter is that Defence Construction Ltd. has been unable to get a firm commitment from the USAF pending agreement by us to the terms of an Exchange of Notes. As the commencement of the construction could not be delayed, Defence Construction Ltd. has, I understand, incurred heavy expenses without any legal assurance so far that the USAF will actually make the expected contract with them.

Reasons for Having an Exchange of Notes

3. The first U.S. argument is that the Recommendation is in terms which need to be completed by some other document, i.e., the Recommendation is not "self-executing". For example, the Recommendation says that "the United States to be granted such rights of access, use and occupancy as may be required for its effective participation." Mr. Johnson says that these words, even when approved by the two governments, do not themselves "grant" the rights to the United States; some additional document is needed to constitute the actual "grant".

4. United States officials also contend that the Recommendation is incomplete in another sense. It does not cover the question of eventual disposal of moveable property, nor does it spell out what the U.S. may do on Canadian soil; these two matters are covered in paragraphs 5 and 6 of the proposed Exchange of Notes.

5. In general the USAF lawyer argues that, as it will be necessary for the USAF to obtain funds not only at the beginning but every year for a long period for the operation of stations, it is necessary to have something that looks like a contract to show to Congressional Committees and the Bureau of the Budget. He is convinced that the USAF would run into serious difficulties if it carried on solely on the basis of the Recommendation.

6. The insistence on having an Exchange of Notes comes from the USAF rather than the State Department, although the State Department now agrees with the USAF that an Exchange of Notes is necessary.

Reasons for Registering the Exchange of Notes with the United Nations

7. Although it was the USAF that insisted on having an Exchange of Notes, it is the State Department that insists that any Exchange of Notes must be registered with the United Nations and therefore must be in a form which can safely be made public. The basis of the argument is of course Article 102 of the Charter which reads as follows:

> "Every treaty and every international agreement entered into by any Member of the United Nations after the present Charter comes into force shall as soon as possible be registered with the Secretariat and published by it.
> "No party to any such treaty or international agreement which has not been registered in accordance with the provisions of paragraph 1 of this Article may invoke that treaty or agreement before any organ of the United Nations."

8. The State Department's attitude is that every effort should be made to comply with Article 102, although they do not deny that there will be some defence agreements which must be kept completely secret for security reasons. In the present case, the proposed Exchange of Notes would in fact contain only part of the true agreement — locations of stations will be omitted for security reasons. Apparently the conscience of the State Department is not troubled by the registration of an Exchange of Notes which is incomplete.

9. The lawyer for the USAF said that the Pentagon would be glad on principle to see all defence agreements kept secret, but he feels that the draft form of the Exchange of Notes does not contain anything that will be harmful to security if made public.

10. You may be interested in looking at our letter D-1593 of April 17 to the Embassy in Washington and at WA-2178 of May 23. The latter reports a discussion with the Acting Legal Adviser of the State Department which took place as a result of our letter D-1593.

11. I doubt whether further argument will move the USAF from the position that an Exchange of Notes is necessary for their purposes. It is possible that further argument with the State Department, at a level higher than the Legal Adviser, might move the State Department from the position that the Exchange of Notes should be registered with the United Nations. However, as stated earlier in this memorandum, the objection to engaging in further debate with the U.S. officials is that the delay in reaching some kind of agreement is increasingly embarrassing to Defence Construction Limited.[5]

Mr. Pearson is of the opinion that we should not accede to the demand of the U.S. State Department that the proposed Exchange of Notes should be registered with the United Nations pursuant to Article 102 of the Charter. In this connection, I enclose for your information a copy of our letter D-1593 of April 17 to the Canadian Embassy in Washington and a copy of WA-2178 of May 23 from the Embassy; WA-2178 reports a discussion with the Acting Legal Adviser of the State Department which took place pursuant to the request contained in our letter D-1593. Also enclosed for your information is a copy of my memorandum of May 29 to Mr. Pearson discussing the U.S. arguments in favour of registering the Exchange of Notes with U.N.

Enclosed is a draft telegram† to the Embassy in Washington on the subject of registration with United Nations of the proposed Exchange of Notes. RE RADAR DEFENCE AGREEMENT Annexed is a copy of the draft telegram† to Washington which you sent Mr. Claxton on May 30. We have just received the following letter dated May 29 from Mr. Claxton addressed to our Minister:

> "With reference to the proposed exchange of notes with the United States regarding the radar defence system, I have serious doubts as to the desirability of having an exchange of notes particularly if it is considered that this might involve the necessity of registration with the United Nations, as I would regard this course as thoroughly objectionable.
> "Also, paragraph five seems to me to spell out in an undesirable form rights given to the U.S.
> "All this is implicit from the general arrangement and it should not be necessary to spell it out."

Presumably Mr. Claxton had received the draft Exchange of Notes from A/V/M James and had been told by him of the U.S. insistence on (a) having an Exchange of Notes and (b) registering the Notes with the United Nations.

2. The objections contained in Mr. Claxton's letter of May 29 go much further than those which our Minister finally settled on. It would appear that Mr. Claxton does not want an Exchange of Notes even if the demand for registration is dropped. Also Mr. Claxton objects to paragraph 5 of the draft Note.

3. I am puzzled as to how we should proceed with a view to bringing matters to a conclusion. The principal objection to our embarking on a renewed debate with U.S. officials is that it would mean more delay in obtaining final agreement between the two governments. In the meantime, as we mentioned in the memorandum of May 29 to the Minister (copy of which was sent to Mr. Claxton), Defence Construction Ltd. is going on with work and expenditure on behalf of the U.S. Air Force without any kind of assurance that the USAF will ever make a contract with D.C.L.

4. I wonder whether we would be justified in suggesting to the Minister that a meeting be arranged with Mr. Claxton to be attended by A/V/M James, the Judge Advocate General, and possibly the President of Defence Construction Ltd. In the alternative, you might like to speak with Mr. Claxton in order to see whether he would accept the draft telegram to Washington.[7] [8]

SECRET Ottawa, June 6, 1951

My dear Colleague,

I received your letter of May 29† regarding the radar defence agreement with the United States, and have also seen your letter of June 1 to Mr. Heeney.†

We are in complete agreement in regarding as objectionable the United States proposal to register the proposed Exchange of Notes with the United Nations (or to make it public in any other way). I am hopeful that the State Department could be persuaded to drop this request.

On the question of whether there should be an Exchange of Notes at all, or whether the approved PJBD Recommendation should be the only written agreement, I share your preference for the latter solution. However, it seems to me that the USAF have an arguable case in favour of an Exchange of Notes. In any case, we can hardly dispute their statement that they will encounter serious financial difficulties with Congressional committees — in years to come if not at the outset — if they do not have a diplomatic agreement in addition to the PJBD Recommendation. In view of the desirability of bringing matters to a conclusion, I think that we should acquiesce in the U.S. request for an Exchange of Notes.

The remaining question is the wording of paragraph 5 of the draft Note and particularly the provision for the "stationing of personnel under the control and command of United States military authorities". Although the provisions of paragraph 5 were not in the Recommendation, I am advised that it was taken for granted by the PJBD that, so long as the United States had the right to man a station, the personnel would be under the immediate command of U.S. authorities. Of course, it is expected that the higher command in Canada of all air defence forces on Canadian soil will be vested in a Canadian (who may in turn be subordinate to a higher "North American" commander of U.S. nationality with headquarters in the U.S.).

[8] Note marginale :/Marginal note:
Mr Wershof Please R.A.M[acKay].

I do not think that the words of paragraph 5 relate to more than the immediate command of U.S. personnel, and suggest that it would be sufficient if this understanding were clearly stated to the U.S. when accepting the wording. Furthermore, I am going on the assumption that the State Department will agree not to register or publish the Exchange of Notes.

In general I think that it is desirable to avoid long delay in reaching an agreement with the United States. I am told that the USAF has refused to give Defence Construction Ltd. any commitment towards a contract pending agreement on the terms of the Exchange of Notes, and feel that D.C.L. should not be left in this position very much longer.

I should be glad to know whether, in view of the above, you might accept the draft telegram† to Washington (which accompanied Mr. Heeney's letter of May 30).

From Heeney, My EX-1143, May 25,† Radar Defence Agreement.

Our Minister and the Minister of National Defence are willing to accept the draft Note.

2. They do so with some reluctance, as they share the official view that the United States Government should have been satisfied with the PJBD Recommendation which, having been approved by both governments, is just as binding as any agreement.

3. Neither Mr. Pearson nor Mr. Claxton, however, are disposed to agree that the Exchange of Notes should be registered with the United Nations (or published in any other form). Having considered your WA-2178 of May 23, I do not consider that there is a good case for registering with United Nations bilateral defence arrangements, especially those which are made through the PJBD. It has not been the practice to register approved PJBD Recommendations with United Nations and the fact that this particular Recommendation is to be repeated in an Exchange of Notes does not really alter the position.

4. I should be grateful if you would immediately discuss the matter with the State Department pursuant to the Minister's views. As we have met the United States on the point of having an Exchange of Notes at all, I hope that the State Department may find it possible to drop the insistence on registration.

5. To avoid misunderstanding, the present status of the draft Note is as follows. It has been approved by Mr. Pearson and Mr. Claxton but may have to go to Cabinet for formal approval after the question of registration has been settled.

RADAR DEFENCE AGREEMENT

1. Tate, the Assistant Legal Adviser at the State Department, asked Ignatieff to see him today to inform him of the results of State Department efforts to convince the United States Air Force that the P.J.B.D. recommendation provides sufficient basis for the implementation of agreed arrangements for the continental radar defence system and that no further written agreement is necessary. He said that he was aware of the views of Mr. Pearson and Mr. Claxton which had been given orally to Haselton, as set out in your EX-1239 of June 9th. He said that personally he agreed with the view that a P.J.B.D. recommendation was sufficient. However, he could not share the view that once an exchange of notes was agreed upon, it would be possible to avoid registering this exchange with the United Nations. He said that from the legal point of view a distinction had to be drawn between P.J.B.D. recommendations (which are not contractual obligations in law, but more in the nature of parallel statements of intent), and an exchange of notes which clearly constitute an international agreement. He pointed out that the draft note now under consideration specifically states that the exchange of notes "shall constitute an agreement". In his opinion, all international agreements have to be registered with the United Nations. He fully agreed at the same time, that, as far as possible, defence arrangements between Canada and the United States should be the subject of more informal procedures such as P.J.B.D. recommendations. He said that he had put all these considerations to the U.S.A.F. as cogently as he could.

2. The U.S.A.F., on the other hand, explained that they are under obligation to the Committee of the Congress, (considering their request for the appropriation of funds necessary to implement their part of the agreement) to submit a written agreement to support their claim for funds. Considering the large amount involved, (about $100 million), the members of the Congressional Committee apparently would insist upon having some firm agreement before recommending the authorization of the appropriation.

3. Tate then went over three possible ways of dealing with this situation:

(a) That we maintain the position that the P.J.B.D. recommendation is sufficient. In this case the State Department would have to go to the Appropriations Committee of the Congress and assume the responsibility for explaining the nature of the P.J.B.D. and the significance of its recommendations. This would involve going into a good deal of detail about the background of the P.J.B.D. and the nature of Canadian-United States defence relationships. This might also involve embarrassing discussions relating to the responsibilities assumed by the executive branch of the United States Government (as distinct from the legislative branch) in respect of defence arrangements with foreign governments.

(b) We for our part, might maintain the position indicated in your EX-1239 of June 9th, that we would agree to the exchange of notes, but would not agree to their registration. This position, for the reasons indicated in paragraph 1 above, Tate would regard as untenable. However, he suggests that we might consider a postponement of registration with the United Nations, in which case it might be arranged to show the exchange of letters in executive session to the members of the appropriation committee.[9]

(c) The third possibility would involve our agreeing to the registration of the exchange of notes and their publication. If we were to agree, the State Department would recognize that this was an exception based upon the merits of the case considering the amount of money involved and the congressional requirements referred to above.

4. The discussion which ensued was inconclusive. Ignatieff again referred to the definite views expressed by ministers and officials alike which had already been put to the State Department. He pointed out that it was urgently desirable to bring this whole matter to a conclusion as soon as possible and that the present discussion did not seem to advance matters very much. He undertook to bring the views of the State Department to your attention and to seek your further guidance.

RE RADAR DEFENCE AGREEMENT WITH THE UNITED STATES

Annexed for convenient reference is a copy of our EX-1239 of June 9 to Washington and a copy of the draft Note referred to therein. We told Washington in that telegram that you and Mr. Pearson had reluctantly decided to accept the draft Note but did not agree to its registration with the United Nations (i.e., to publication). I now enclose WA-2753 of July 6 from Washington indicating that the State Department is adamant on registration if there is an Exchange of Notes, and that the USAF is adamant on the need for an Exchange of Notes.

Paragraph 3 of the telegram lists three possible ways of dealing with this situation. I suggest that the third course may have to be accepted, i.e., we may have to agree to registration of the Exchange of Notes in this particular case. There is nothing in this particular Exchange of Notes that will be dangerous from the security point of view. The continuance of the present deadlock will be increasingly embarrassing, especially to Defence Construction Ltd. which is spending money on USAF account without any assurance that the USAF will make a contract.

I should be grateful for your guidance. If you decide to agree to registration, we will prepare and submit to you a draft memorandum to Cabinet covering the proposed Exchange of Notes.[10]

Although I am recommending, with reluctance, that we acquiesce in the United States insistence on registration, I do not think that we should pass over in silence the State Department's legal view, referred to in paragraph 1 of WA-2753, that PJBD Recommendations "are not contractual obligations in law, but more in the nature of parallel statements of intent". This is not the view that has been held in the Department of External Affairs, and we are working on a memorandum for you on this particular point.

RADAR DEFENCE AGREEMENT WITH THE UNITED STATES

Following for the Minister from Reid, Begins: The proposed Exchange of Notes is still hanging fire. The USAF feel that an Exchange of Notes is necessary if they are to get their funds from Congress, especially since the agreement calls for annual payments for recurring costs over an indefinite period. The State Department insists that if there is an Exchange of Notes it must be registered with the United Nations, although they would be prepared to hold registration in abeyance for some time.

2. We have discussed the matter at length with Mr. Claxton, and he has requested us to give you his views.

3. As you know, he has been opposed to an Exchange of Notes, but he reluctantly agreed to this provided there were no registration. He still feels strongly against registration, and on reconsideration against even an Exchange of Notes which he feels would lead to a good deal of publicity in Congress. We said that we thought that even if the United States accepted the Permanent Joint Board on Defence Recommendations as a satisfactory form of agreement discussions on appropriations might in any case take place in Congress or at least in Congressional committees; that, in short, the form of the agreement might not make much difference with respect to publicity.

4. On reconsideration Mr. Claxton is now inclined to feel that the whole arrangement might prove undesirable in that recurring discussions might take place in Congress because annual appropriations would be required. Further, since the radar sites are in Canada the impression might get abroad that Congress was being asked to spend funds for the defence of Canada, although in fact the additional radar sites are being established at U.S. request.

5. He suggests therefore that it would perhaps be preferable for Canada to undertake to pay the full cost of the radar network in Canada. It is estimated that the U.S. share of capital costs would be of the order of $105 millions and of recurring annual costs of the order of $22 millions.

6. There might be some offset to this expenditure. Mr. Claxton, for example, has suggested that we might propose to the U.S. that they make offshore purchases in Canada out of MDAA funds equivalent to what they would save on capital construction of radar sites in Canada. I am not sure, however, that this would be feasible since quite different U.S. governmental authorities would be concerned. Assuming that some sort of formula for equalizing defence burdens emerges from the NATO burden-sharing exercises, which seems probable, we would no doubt be credited with any expenditures made in Canada on defence.[11] Whether we would in fact get full credit for expenditures for the U.S. share of the radar net, were we to undertake it, or whether in fact we could reduce correspondingly our contributions to SHAPE and European infrastructure remains to be seen.

7. Since Defence Construction Limited has advanced a considerable sum to start construction on the U.S. sites and since the USAF apparently take the view that they cannot enter into contracts without a firm international agreement, presumably covered by an Exchange of Notes, there is some urgency about the matter. No doubt you will wish to be present when a decision is to be taken in Cabinet, but in the meantime Mr. Claxton thought you should be informed about the situation.

8. I think I should point out that we have gone no higher than the Legal Adviser of the State Department in getting an opinion on registration of Exchange of Notes. It might be that a direct approach to Mr. Acheson might lead to a different conclusion. I feel that any decision to undertake the full cost ourselves should not be taken merely on the grounds of difference of opinion over registration. It is of course another question whether we should undertake the full cost on the ground of long-run national interest.

RADAR DEFENCE AGREEMENT WITH THE UNITED STATES

Following from the Minister, Begins: My views on this matter remain similar to those of Mr. Claxton, but we must be careful not to get into a position of obstructing, or appearing to obstruct for formal reasons, works which are necessary for the defence of North America. Washington, whose position in insisting on a formal exchange of notes is not, I think, strong, could easily put us into this kind of false position. Because of this, and for other reasons, I am much attracted by the idea of accepting financial responsibility for the construction and maintenance of the stations. I think that we should examine carefully the financial implications of this. I don't think off-shore purchases in compensation would be very easy to arrange, but I do think we should get NATO credit for this expenditure and possibly reduce other NATO contributions accordingly.

2. While investigating this matter further, I think that we should ask the Ambassador in Washington to take up on a high State Department level, if possible with Acheson himself, the arguments against a formal exchange of notes and their registration. I don't think we should accept as final the rejection of our position by the legal adviser. Ends.

RADAR DEFENCE AGREEMENT WITH THE UNITED STATES

Following for Under-Secretary from Wrong, Begins: As Reid points out, the suggestions now made by Mr. Claxton go further than the arguments which we have been discussing with the State Department. Indeed, if they were to be accepted, it seems to me that they lead logically to the conclusion that we should refuse to permit any United States funds to be spent on the installation and operation of defence establishments in Canada except in the leased bases. His central difficulty is the publicity likely to attend consideration by Congress of appropriations for activities in Canadian territory and the possibility of a resulting misconception that Canada is depending on the United States to finance installations required for Canadian defence. In this context the form of the radar agreement becomes unimportant.

2. I had thought of taking up with Mr. Acheson our differences of view over the twin issues (a) of recording the agreement in an exchange of notes and (b) of subsequent registration (perhaps after an interval of a year or so) with the United Nations, but I have been waiting for further guidance from Ottawa. I have doubts that an approach to Mr. Acheson would resolve these problems, particularly as the Department of Defense, which will have to go before congressional committees to seek appropriations to carry out the United States share of the joint radar scheme, has come to the conclusion that an intergovernmental agreement is essential to support its request for appropriations.

3. We have now learned that similar intergovernmental agreements exist with other countries, including the United Kingdom and France, in whose territories the United States is constructing military facilities involving expenditures of the same order of magnitude as in the case of the joint radar net. These agreements have been or will be shown to congressional committees in strict secrecy, but I understand that it is the intention of the United States to register them with the United Nations when it becomes necessary or convenient to do so. Satterthwaite should be able to give fuller information when he is in Ottawa next Monday, July 30th.

4. As to possible misleading publicity following discussion in congressional committees in executive session of the appropriations for the radar chain, one can be sure that the Defense Department in its testimony will be very anxious to point out that the expenditures are required for the defence of the United States, as this will be an essential factor in their presentation. Furthermore, people in such border cities as Detroit, Cleveland and Buffalo are well aware that they can be given some assurance against surprise air attack only from radar installations in Canada.

5. It is also problematical whether any publicity would emerge from evidence given in closed sessions on secret projects undertaken outside United States territory; the radar chain will be considered in company with a number of other projects. It should not be difficult in any event to satisfy public opinion in both Canada and the United States that the radar agreement serves the interests of both countries and to cope with any suggestions that it would involve some derogation of Canadian sovereignty.

6. I have a feeling that it would be a retrogressive step in the general NATO context to withdraw from the approved recommendation of the PJBD. For one thing we are encouraging the pooling of national resources in the common defence, and effective early warning systems must, with aircraft of present speeds, be sited with little regard to frontiers. Another consideration is that the North Atlantic Treaty is a long-term engagement which has so far been concerned principally with the defence of Western Europe and not with the North American segment of the North Atlantic area; the strategic factors, however, may change during the term of the treaty by, for instance, the further development of long-range weapons, and there may come a need for expenditures in Canada far beyond the capacity of Canada alone.

7. I share Reid's doubts about the suggestion that Canada might be compensated for assuming the United States share of the cost of the radar network by United States off-shore purchases of equipment in Canada. I think it would be impossible to develop a satisfactory scheme. Ends.

SECRET. IMMEDIATE.

RADAR DEFENCE AGREEMENT

Following from the Under-Secretary, Begins: As you know, this problem has been reviewed actively in Ottawa during the past few days at the urgent instance of Mr. Howe. Much as we dislike the idea of registering the proposed exchange of notes with the United Nations (and thereby making them public), we realize that the debate on this point with the State Department could go on for some time without agreed result. That would create an impossible situation for Defence Construction Ltd., which has been spending large sums on USAF account (and is facing the immediate requirement of further finance) without any assurance that the USAF will make a contract. Our understanding is that USAF has declined to give Defence Construction Ltd. even a "letter of intent" pending settlement between the governments of the question of an "agreement" in acceptable form, that is to say an exchange of notes.

2. Because of the grave practical problem faced by DCL, and on the direct instructions of Mr. Howe as Acting Prime Minister, it has now been decided to waive our objections and to accept the procedure suggested by the State Department in para. 3(b) of your telegram WA-2753 of July 6. That is to say, we agree to an exchange of notes to be registered with United Nations and published at that time, on the understanding that registration and publication will not be effected in the near future but delayed for some time. In the meantime, of course, the notes may be shown in executive session to the appropriate Congressional Committees. We will rely on the State Department to consult us well in advance of the time of any proposed registration and publication.

3. We trust that you will make it clear to the State Department that our agreement to the registration of the notes with United Nations, and for that matter our agreement to have notes at all supplementing the PJBD Recommendation, relate only to this particular case and are without prejudice to our position in future cases. We are accepting the U.S. Government's requirements in this instance simply because the work cannot be delayed and we are not in a position here to provide financial authority.

4. We trust that the notes can now be exchanged immediately in the wording approved by all parties some weeks ago and sent to you in EX-1516 of July 27.† In the circumstances, we suggest that the notes be exchanged in Washington.

5. It should be clearly understood that, immediately upon signature and exchange of the notes, the USAF will give a suitable letter of intent to Defence Construction Ltd., and will then proceed to make a contract.

6. For your own information Mr. Howe decided to instruct me in the above sense because of the serious results of any further delay. He felt that if a firm commitment from the USAF were not obtained immediately he would have no option to cancellation of the Canadian contracts before further financial obligations were incurred by the Canadian Government.

7. Please act upon these instructions at once and report to us as soon as possible. Ends.

TELEGRAM EX-1530 Ottawa, July 31, 1951

SECRET. IMMEDIATE.

Following from the Under-Secretary, Begins: My EX-1526, July 30, Radar Defence Agreement. As I told you by telephone yesterday, there is another aspect of this problem to which Mr. Claxton attaches great importance.

2. The Canadian Government does not receive aid from the United States and considers it important to avoid the appearance of being a recipient of aid. One reason why Mr. Claxton dislikes the idea of an exchange of notes, and even more the idea of registration and publication, is that this procedure may contribute to Congressional and public misunderstanding of our position.

3. The radar network is a project which the USAF considers essential for the protection of the U.S., and at the same time it is in the interests of Canada. It is truly a cooperative defence project in the interests of both countries and it would be grotesquely wrong to have it interpreted by anyone as "U.S. aid to Canada".

4. Will you please try to arrange with the State Department that the Exchange of Notes should be accompanied by a letter from you to Mr. Acheson expressing our hope and indeed our understanding that this agreement will not result in Canada being incorrectly classified by any U.S. Government agency among countries receiving aid from the U.S. However, this proposal of a letter is not repeat not a condition of the completion of the exchange of notes.

5. If there is time, please clear with me, in advance of the Exchange of Notes, the text of the letter you will send to Mr. Acheson.

6. You will of course delay action on this telegram until receipt of the Cabinet clearance mentioned in EX-1527,† that is expected this afternoon.

RADAR AGREEMENT

Following for Heeney from Wrong, Begins: I am making arrangements (subject to final Cabinet approval) for the exchange of notes on the radar agreement to take place tomorrow afternoon. The State Department believes there will be no difficulty in meeting us on the points mentioned and are in touch with the air force to secure action promptly on a letter of intent.

2. I have drafted the following letter to Mr. Acheson to give effect to the points in your EX-1530. The State Department expects to give verbal assurance in the sense desired tomorrow, to be followed by written confirmation. Draft begins:

SECRET July 31, 1951

Dear Mr. Secretary:

In connection with today's exchange of notes constituting an agreement between our governments for the establishment of a radar chain in Canadian territory as part of the defences of the North American continent, I have been asked to bring to your attention a question regarded as of considerable importance by the Canadian Government. The Canadian Government does not receive financial or economic assistance from the United States and is anxious to avoid the appearance of being a recipient of aid. The radar network is a project which the defence authorities of the United States consider to be essential for the protection of the United States; at the same time its construction is in the interests of Canada. It is thus a co-operative defence project which is being undertaken in the interests of both countries, and it would be completely incorrect if it were to be interpreted as constituting in any way United States aid to Canada.

The understanding of the Canadian Government is, therefore, that the conclusion of this agreement in no way implies that Canada can be regarded as becoming a recipient of aid from the United States. I should be glad if you would confirm that you share this understanding, and also if you would take steps to ensure that, as a result of the agreement, Canada will not be incorrectly classified by any agency of the United States Government as one of the countries receiving aid from the United States. Draft ends. Ends.

RADAR DEFENCE AGREEMENT

1. I exchanged with Mr. Perkins this afternoon, notes concluding the agreement between Canada and the United States on the extension and co-ordination of the continental radar defence system.

2. I outlined to Mr. Perkins our concern over the registration and publication of the exchange of notes, stressing that it was our hope that it would be unnecessary to register or publish the notes for at least a year's time. Perkins agreed that registration could be delayed and promised to consult us in advance of any proposed registration and publication. Incidentally, as the notes are both classified as Confidential, United States authorities are, in any case, obliged to consult us before changing this security classification and thus before registration or publication.

3. Perkins also agreed with our interpretation that this exchange of notes, supplementing the P.J.B.D. recommendation, should not be regarded as a precedent for future arrangements based on the Board's recommendations.

4. During our discussion, Hayden Raynor, who also was present, said that the State Department had today received a letter from the U.S.A.F. confirming that they would submit a letter of intent to Defence Construction Limited and proceed with the contract as soon as the exchange of notes was effected.

5. I also gave Mr. Perkins a letter addressed to the Secretary of State, as set out in my WA-2984 of July 1st, concerning Canada's position with respect to United States aid. Raynor, whom I had previously told of our concern on this score, said that the legal adviser of the State Department had agreed that Canada, by virtue of the Radar Defence Agreement, could not be regarded as a recipient of United States aid. He said that a letter from the Secretary of State to this effect would be forthcoming and that the State Department would take steps to ensure that Canada would not be so classified by any United States Government agency.

6. Copies of our note, which is identical with that contained in EX-1516 of June 27th,† and the State Department's reply signifying the United States Government's acceptance, will be forwarded to you by tomorrow's bag.[13]

RADAR DEFENCE AGREEMENT

In accordance with your request that the first convenient opportunity should be taken to inform Mr. Tate, Assistant Legal Adviser of the State Department, that we disagree with his interpretation of the legal effect of PJBD regulations (as reported in our WA-2753 of July 6, relating to the Radar Defence Agreement) Ignatieff sought to have an interview with Mr. Tate but found that he was absent on leave. However, he had a talk with Mr. Norris Haselton, the officer in charge of Commonwealth Affairs of the State Department, who had been present at the interview on July 6 last, at which Mr. Tate had expressed his opinions. Mr. Haselton had apparently noted Mr. Tate's comment on the legal effect of PJBD recommendations and had been concerned that it might give rise to possible misunderstandings because of an apparent difference in interpretation of PJBD recommendations between the Legal officer of the State Department and ourselves. He had, therefore, on his own account, sought an explanation from Mr. Tate of his remark to the effect that

[13] Voir Canada, Recueil des Traités, 1951, N°. 31./See Canada, Treaty Series, 1951, No. 31.

PJBD's recommendations "are not contractual obligations in law, but more in the nature of parallel statements of intent". He had received a memorandum in reply, which sets out Mr. Tate's clarification of what he had in mind, two copies of which are attached.

2. It will be observed that Mr. Tate considers that anything that can be defined as an "international agreement" must be registered with United Nations without exception to comply with Article 102 of the Charter.

3. It appears that Mr. Tate is striving to find a basis upon which approved recommendations of the PJBD can be distinguished from international agreements. For this reason he states that recommendations "when approved on either side constitute unilateral undertakings to carry out such recommendations ... the undertakings are made in good faith and with the intention of being carried out".

4. There would appear to be dangers in pressing too hard against this interpretation of the nature of PJBD recommendations, since if we were successful in having the legal officers of the State Department concede that a contractual relationship in international law is created by the approval of PJBD recommendations by both governments, they would then be forced to contend that all such recommendations should be registered with United Nations. It may well be best to accept the rather vague definition of the nature of the obligations created without pressing our point.

5. In commenting upon Mr. Tate's memorandum, Mr. Haselton remarked that it follows from this opinion of the Legal Division, that if approval of the recommendations is notified to the other governments by an inter-governmental communication such as an exchange of notes, an international agreement exists and would have to be registered. However, if approval of the recommendation is notified through PJBD channels (either through the respective Chairmen of the two sections or the Secretaries) it would be regarded only as a record of unilateral undertakings and therefore would not require registration.

6. In the light of Mr. Tate's memorandum to Mr. Haselton and Mr. Haselton's comments, we await your further guidance before discussing the matter with Mr. Tate.

Article 102 of the Charter of the United Nations requires that every treaty and every international agreement entered into by any member of the United Nations shall, as soon as possible, be registered with the Secretariat and published by it. It will be noted that there are no exceptions to this obligation undertaken by member states of the U.N. and consistently therewith it is the view of this office that all such agreements must be registered. In view of the universality of this obligation, the Department, on occasion, has so drafted intergovernmental agreements as to limit them to the basic rights, duties and obligations of the parties and to leave out implementing details which may be of a highly classified nature. The United States has attempted in good faith to live up to the registration requirements of the Charter and will continue to do so.

This office is not prepared to admit that recommendations of the Permanent Joint Board on Defence-U.S. and Canada are intergovernmental agreements in the sense that they create a contractual relationship. Rather, the recommendations of the Board when approved on either side constitute unilateral undertakings to carry out such recommendations, and the undertaking on one side is not necessarily contingent on the undertaking on the other side, although both sides understand that the undertakings are made in good faith and with the intention of being carried out.

This office does consider, however, that when recommendations of the PJBD are made the subject of the inter-governmental agreement between the United States and Canada, that agreement must be registered with the United Nations Secretariat.

DESPATCH D-3110 Ottawa, October 17, 1951

STATUS OF RECOMMENDATIONS OF THE PERMANENT JOINT BOARD ON DEFENCE

1. We have been devoting further study to the status of PJBD Recommendations. We still hold the view that the Recommendations of the PJBD, once approved by both Governments and when each Government's approval is communicated to the other, constitute an international contract as valid as any other kind of international agreement. Nevertheless, we have decided not to press further on the State Department at this time our interpretation of the validity of PJBD Recommendations.

2. For your own information, the main reason for avoiding further negotiations on this question is that we believe that PJBD Recommendations should not be subject to registration at the United Nations. Since a large proportion of them is classified, it would clearly be impossible to register the Recommendations in their present form. If we were to insist on the view that the Recommendations were binding international agreements, the State Department would probably feel itself obliged to attempt some form of registration. This would produce endless complications in connection with past agreements and might well inhibit the work of the Board in the future.

NEWFOUNDLAND LEASED BASES AGREEMENT

Note du secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures et du ministre de la Défense nationale pour le Cabinet

Memorandum from Secretary of State for External Affairs and Minister of National Defence to Cabinet

CABINET DOCUMENT NO. 81-51 Ottawa, March 15, 1951

UNITED STATES NEWFOUNDLAND BASES
RECOMMENDATIONS OF THE PERMANENT JOINT BOARD ON DEFENCE, AND PROPOSED LEGISLATION

Brief History

1. In April, 1950, Cabinet Defence Committee and Cabinet considered the PJBD's Recommendations of March 30, 1950.[14] The question of revision of the Leased Bases Agreement had been referred to the PJBD following the sending of a request by the Canadian Government to the United States Government for modification of the Bases Agreement. In particular the Canadian request referred to income tax exemptions, customs and excise exemptions, postal privileges, and jurisdictional rights enjoyed by the U.S. under the Bases Agreement. It was the desire of Canada that the rights enjoyed by the U.S. at the Bases should be brought as nearly as possible into line with the Joint Defence Statement issued by the two governments on February 12, 1947 (Treaty Series, 1947, No. 43).

2. Cabinet Defence Committee on April 25, 1950, noted the Board's Recommendations with approval. Cabinet on April 27 indicated that the necessary legislation should be drafted before formal approval was considered.

3. The President of the United States approved the Recommendations on August 1, 1950.

Brief Summary of the Recommendations (fuller summary in Cabinet Document D243)†

Income Taxes

4. On June 12, 1950, a new Double Taxation Convention between Canada and the U.S. was signed. When it comes into force it will replace certain exemption provisions now in the Bases Agreement. In addition the Board recommends that the U.S.

[14] Voir/See Volume 16, Document 826.

waive exemptions on contractor's profits, U.S. civilian employees and their families.

COMMENT—This will place income tax exemptions of U.S. personnel in Newfoundland on the same basis as in the rest of Canada.

Customs and Excise

5. The U.S. to waive duty and tax exemptions on:

(a) contractor-owned equipment,

(b) personal belongings and household effects of contractors and their U.S. employees other than on first arrival,

(c) individual purchases in Canada by U.S. personnel.

6. Customs and excise exemptions for Post Exchanges and Service clubs to continue, it being understood that the U.S. authorities will endeavour to increase purchases for these institutions in Canada and will take special steps to prevent abuse of privileges.

COMMENT—With the exception of privileges for PX's and Service clubs, this recommendation in effect meets the Canadian Government's request.

Postal Privileges

7. Originally Canada asked for replacement of U.S. military postal facilities by Canadian Post Offices. This request was not met, but under the Board's Recommendations the U.S. will not establish normal civilian postal offices and will limit the use of the APO system strictly to mail destined to U.S. territory or to other U.S. APO's.

Jurisdiction

8. (i) The U.S. to waive all rights of jurisdiction, permitted under the Bases Agreement, over British subjects and over aliens other than U.S. personnel;

(ii) The U.S. to suspend for five years exercise of rights of jurisdiction over U.S. civilian personnel, subject to revival on notice thereafter or in event of war or other emergency;

(iii) The Canadian Government to seek to amend the Visiting Forces (USA) Act to permit of compulsory attendance of witnesses;

(iv) The Canadian Government to seek legislation to protect security interests of the U.S. forces in Canada, as required under the Bases Agreement.

COMMENT—The Board's Recommendation will permit of the extension of the Visiting Forces (USA) Act as revised to Newfoundland and will remove probably the most objectionable feature of the Bases Agreement, namely, the right of jurisdiction by U.S. courts over Canadian citizens. Revival of the rights of jurisdiction by U.S. Service courts over "followers of the camp" who are U.S. citizens can probably be met when the time comes, if ever.

Outline of Legislation Required to Carry out the PJBD's Recommendations

9. Following Cabinet's consideration in April, 1950, the Departments of External Affairs and National Defence have been engaged in working out draft legislation, in consultation with the other interested Departments. The drafts were shown informally to the U.S. Section of the PJBD in February, 1951. The texts of the draft amendments† are annexed to this memorandum, although they have not yet been officially cleared with the Department of Justice and will no doubt undergo further drafting changes. Following is an outline:

Customs
(In consultation with Department of National Revenue; not yet approved by Department of Finance)

10. Item No. 708 of the Customs Tariff (which gives free entry to military supplies of the "Imperial Government") would be replaced by a new Item No. 708 applicable to any government, on condition of reciprocal treatment and subject to authorization by the Governor in Council. This is, it is submitted, a desirable amendment quite apart from the PJBD Recommendations.

Postal Privileges
(In consultation with the Post Office Department)

11. In order to legalize the U.S. military post offices in Newfoundland, it is proposed to add a new item (y) to Section 7 of the Post Office Act. This would authorize the Postmaster General to make regulations governing postal services of Allied Forces in Canada.

Jurisdiction
(In consultation with officials of the Department of Justice)

12. Almost every Section of the Official Secrets Act would be amended in order to extend its protection (limited at present to Canadian Government and Provincial Government secrets) to secrets belonging to other Commonwealth Governments or to an "associated state". The phrase "associated state" means any state that enters into an agreement with Canada relating to security and that is designated by the Governor in Council (e.g., any North Atlantic Treaty country). It is submitted that these amendments are desirable quite apart from the PJBD Recommendations.

13. A new Section 541A would be added to the Criminal Code to protect the property of "His Majesty's forces, or any forces co-operating therewith". This Section is desired for the benefit of Canadian forces, quite apart from the PJBD Recommendations.

14. A new section would be added to the Visiting Forces (USA) Act to provide for compulsory attendance of witnesses before U.S. courts-martial, under regulations to be made by the Governor in Council, in the same manner as now applies to courts-martial of the Canadian forces.

General Observation re Legislation

15. It is not necessary to decide now how many Bills will be necessary. The amendment to the Criminal Code, for example, could be included in the usual annual Criminal Code Amendment Bill.

Exchange of Notes

16. If Cabinet approves the Recommendations and agrees in principle to the introduction of the necessary legislation, the Secretary of State for External Affairs proposes to enter into an Exchange of Notes with the U.S., as contemplated in the Recommendations, to record officially what the U.S. is giving up and what the Canadian Government will do. A draft of the Notes will be submitted to Cabinet in due course.

Letter to Newfoundland Government

17. An important condition of the Recommendations is the following:

"That the Canadian Government, as a condition precedent to the waiver and suspension of the exercise of rights under Article IV and to the extension to Newfoundland of an amended Visiting Forces (USA) Act, give satisfactory assurances that the U.S. officials in Newfoundland will have a degree of jurisdiction comparable to that which they now in fact exercise. In this connection, the U.S. Section would regard the proposed letter from the Government of Canada to the Government of Newfoundland, with a reply from the Newfoundland Government that jurisdictional conditions would remain substantially as now exercised, as the basis for satisfactory assurances to be given by the Canadian Government."

18. The draft letter referred to reads as follows:

"It is contemplated extending the Visiting Forces (USA) Act to the Province of Newfoundland, including the U.S. Leased Bases. Although the present Act does not interfere with the jurisdiction of Canadian courts and law enforcement authorities, it is the hope of the Government of Canada that those charged with law enforcement may rarely find it necessary to bring members of United States forces before Canadian courts. In particular, it is hoped that, when an offence is by its nature essentially prejudicial to the discipline of the United States Armed Forces, when an offence is committed within the Leased Areas, or when an offence involves only members of United States forces or only the property of the Government of the United States, the Canadian authorities will find it desirable to leave the wrong-doer to be dealt with by United States Service courts and authorities.

"I hope that your Government will bring the Act to the attention of law enforcement authorities. I should be glad to learn the views of your Government on the question discussed in the preceding paragraph."

The wording of the letter is similar to the wording of a communication sent to all provincial governments in July, 1947 when the Visiting Forces (USA) Act was passed.

19. The Attorney General of Newfoundland indicated informally some time ago that such a letter would receive a satisfactory reply.

Recommendations for Decisions by Cabinet

20. (1) To approve the PJBD Recommendations and to authorize the notification of this approval to the U.S. Government;

(2) To approve the proposals for introduction of legislation as set forth in this memorandum, subject, of course, to official consideration of the drafts by the Department of Justice;

(3) To authorize the Secretary of State for External Affairs to enter into an Exchange of Notes with the U.S., subject to submission of the draft Notes to Cabinet;

(4) To authorize the Minister of Justice to send the suggested letter to the Attorney General of Newfoundland, at a time to be settled by the Ministers of Justice, National Defence, and External Affairs; this exchange of letters to be followed by a Note to the U.S. Government giving the required assurances.[15]

Note de la 1ère Direction de liaison avec la Défense pour le chef de la 1ère Direction de liaison avec la Défense

Memorandum from Defence Liaison (1) Division to Head, Defence Liaison (1) Division

SECRET Ottawa, January 18, 1951

COMMENTS ON DRAFT GOOSE BAY LEASE
DATED JANUARY 12, 1951

Form of the Lease

The draft takes the form of an Exchange of Notes to which is annexed an actual lease to be signed by the Minister of National Defence for Canada. I never could see the point of using such a form i.e., of having two documents for signature, one of which is drawn up along the lines of an ordinary commercial lease. The United States officials no doubt like this form. In the Leased Bases Agreement of 1941, there was a covering diplomatic agreement and also a number of leases in commercial form. My view is that the commercial form is not appropriate to transactions of this kind — it would be appropriate if the Canadian Government were simply leasing an ordinary building to the United States Government. The proposed lease is in no sense an ordinary property transaction; it is rather an agreement between the Governments relating to their joint defence.

Although no particular harm will result from the form followed in the draft, my recommendation would be to alter the form as follows:

(1) Delete the last sixteen words of the first paragraph of the Note and substitute the following — "the Government of Canada is prepared to and does hereby grant such a lease subject to the detailed terms set forth in the Annex hereto."

---

[15] Approuvé par le Cabinet, le 21 mars 1951./Approved by Cabinet, March 21, 1951.

(2) Add a final clause in the following form—"This Note and your favourable reply will constitute an agreement, to come into force on (date to be inserted)."

(3) Strike out the first page of the draft lease and substitute something along the following lines:

"ANNEX"

"The Canadian Government (hereinafter called the Lessor) hereby leases to the United States of America (hereinafter called the Lessee) those certain parcels or tracts of lands and premises, (hereinafter ...", and then carry on with the remaining pages of the draft lease. This kind of annex will not require any signature. The effective binding agreement would be the Exchange of Notes.

Detailed Reference to Privileges

On Page 3 of the draft Note, beginning with the words "Subject to enactment of the necessary legislation", there is set forth in some detail the privileges to be given. It is not necessary to set these forth and, as this Exchange of Notes will presumably be published, it may stir up unnecessary criticism in Canada if the privileges are spelt out in the Note. On the assumption that the Canadian Government will approve the recommendations of the P.J.B.D. on this subject, it is only necessary to say in the present Note that the question of Customs and Excise privileges, jurisdiction and postal privileges, will be governed by the recommendations of the P.J.B.D. which have been formally accepted by both Governments. When a recommendation of the P.J.B.D. is formally accepted by both Governments, it is just as binding as anything put in an Exchange of Notes and it is not really necessary to repeat the recommendation in an Exchange of Notes.[16]

Option for Renewal

The draft lease provides specifically that the United States may renew the lease for one further term of 20 years. This wording is obviously based on the language used at the P.J.B.D. meeting in March, 1950, when the Canadian members said that proposed lease would be for 20 years "with an option for renewal".[17] If it is now desired to grant something less than a clear option for renewal, it would be necessary to delete the 8 lines dealing with renewal and substitute something along the following lines:

"The Lessee may, by notice in writing to the Lessor not less than six months prior to the expiration of the said term, request a renewal of the lease for a further period of not more than 20 years. If such a request is made, the Lessor undertakes to consider it sympathetically in the light of the mutual interest of Canada and the United States of America in the security of the North Atlantic area."

[17] Voir/See Volume 16, Document 826.

Storage of Explosives or Special Weapons

The draft contains no restriction other than the one relating to accepted safety standards. If nothing is to be in the lease on the subject of explosives or special weapons, the Canadian Government will not have under this document any control over the storage of explosives or special weapons at Goose Bay. I gather that such control may be guaranteed in some other document.[18]

PROPOSED EXCHANGE OF NOTES BETWEEN CANADA AND THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA RELATING TO GOOSE BAY, PROVINCE OF NEWFOUNDLAND[19]

I

The Secretary of State for External Affairs of Canada to the United States Ambassador

Excellency,

I have the honor to refer to discussions which have recently taken place between representatives of our Governments on the Permanent Joint Board on Defense concerning a proposed lease to the United States of America of certain lands (hereinafter referred to as Leased Areas) situated within Royal Canadian Air Force Station Goose Bay in the Province of Newfoundland for military purposes and to inform you that in view of the mutual interest of Canada and the United States of America in the security of the North Atlantic area the Government of Canada is prepared to execute such a lease in the form annexed hereto.

The Government of Canada proposes that the following arrangements shall be in effect at Goose Bay:

(1) The United States of America, without prejudice to the sovereignty of Canada, shall have quiet enjoyment of the Leased Areas, subject at all times to the right of free access by the Commanding Officer, Royal Canadian Air Force Station Goose Bay, to any part of the Leased Areas.

(2) United States military personnel outside the Leased Areas shall be under the exclusive control and command of United States authorities in military matters but in all other matters shall be subject to the laws and regulations applicable to Canadian military personnel. The United States Air Force Commanding Officer at Goose Bay shall be responsible for the observance of Royal Canadian Air Force Station Standing Orders by all United States military personnel at Goose Bay outside the Leased Areas.

(3) The United States of America shall have the right to use the airfield at Goose Bay for the operation of United States military aircraft, subject to air traffic control by the Royal Canadian Air Force. Prior notification of all expected arrivals shall be given to the Royal Canadian Air Force at Goose Bay.

(4) The United States of America shall have free and uninterrupted use of all roadways at Goose Bay outside the Leased Areas, subject to any limitations that may be imposed by the Commanding Officer, Royal Canadian Air Force Station Goose Bay, in the interests of the efficient operation of the station.

(5) The United States of America may have the use, for the transportation of petroleum products, of all pipes, pipelines, pumps and valves installed at Goose Bay by the Government of Canada and forming a part of the interconnected pipeline system, provided that the United States of America shall be responsible for any damage or injury suffered by others in consequence of the negligence of the members of its armed forces or of its officers, employees, or agents in connection with such use.

From time to time the United States of America may be authorized to use additional areas, sites and locations at Goose Bay and, in the absence of agreement to the contrary, such use shall be subject to the same terms and conditions as pertain to the Leased Areas. The United States may also be authorized to use such rights-of-way at Goose Bay and in the vicinity thereof as may hereafter be agreed upon, and may construct, maintain and operate thereon, as may be required for the support of United States military operations at Goose Bay, wire and radio communications facilities and transportation facilities.

The United States of America will not be required to pay any tax or fee in respect of registration or licensing of motor vehicles for use within Royal Canadian Air Force Station Goose Bay.

Subject to enactment of the necessary legislation by the Parliament of Canada, it is the intention of the Government of Canada that the following recommendations of the Permanent Joint Board on Defense shall be given effect at Goose Bay:

(1) Application of customs/excise privileges identical to those recommended for the Leased Bases on the Island of Newfoundland (that is, the same privileges as are operative in other provinces, together with a right to continue PX's and similar institutions);

(2) Application of the Visiting Forces (USA) Act and of the legislative amendments and administrative arrangements contemplated in Section G of Part I of the minutes of the special meeting of the Permanent Joint Board on Defense at Montreal, Quebec, March 28-30, 1950;

(3) Application of military postal privileges identical to those recommended for the Leased Bases on the Island of Newfoundland.

Draft Lease

SECRET January 11, 1951

LEASE

THIS INDENTUREmade in duplicate this _____ day of January in the year of our Lord, one thousand nine hundred and fifty-one BETWEEN:

HIS MAJESTY THE KING in right of Canada, represented herein by the Honourable the Minister of National Defence (hereinafter called the Lessor)

OF THE FIRST PART

AND

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA (hereinafter called the Lessee)

OF THE SECOND PART

WITNESSETH:

THAT WHEREAS by Notes exchanged on the _____ day of January, nineteen hundred and fifty-one, between the Secretary of State for External Affairs of Canada and His Excellency the Ambassador of the United States of America at Ottawa, the Governments of Canada and the United States of America have expressed their mutual desire to give effect to the recommendations of the Permanent Joint Board on Defence relative to the leasing of certain lands within Royal Canadian Air Force Station Goose Bay, in the Province of Newfoundland, to the United States of America for military purposes;

NOW THEREFORE, in consideration of the premises, the Lessor hath demised and leased and by these presents doth demise and lease unto the Lessee ALL AND SINGULAR those certain parcels or tracts of land and premises (hereinafter referred to as Leased Areas) situate, lying and being within Royal Canadian Air Force Station Goose Bay, in the Province of Newfoundland, described as follows:

TO HAVE AND TO HOLD the same for and during the term of twenty years to commence on the date hereof, free from the payment of all rent and charges; PROVIDED that the Lessee may at its option, without further consideration, by notice in writing to the Lessor not less than six months prior to the expiration of the said term, renew this lease for a further term of twenty years upon the same conditions as herein contained.

The Lessee shall have the right of free access to and egress from the Leased Areas and shall have within the Leased Areas, in accordance with the said Notes, all the rights which are necessary to support the operation of United States military aircraft at Goose Bay, including, inter alia, the right, power and authority:

(a) to occupy and control the Leased Areas and to undertake such internal security measures as may be deemed necessary by the Lessee;

(b) to construct, install, improve and maintain in the Leased Areas personnel housing, hangars, warehouses, shops, hardstands, parking aprons, storage and distribution facilities for aviation gasoline and other petroleum supplies, communications facilities and navigation aids (including meteorological systems), radio and radar apparatus and electronic devices of any desired power, type of emission and frequency, and any other type of building, facility or improvement deemed necessary by the Lessee, PROVIDED that all new major construction in the Leased Areas shall have the prior approval of the Commanding Officer, Royal Canadian Air Force Station Goose Bay.

All buildings, structures and improvements permanently affixed to the realty by the Lessee at Goose Bay shall remain the property of the Lessee for the duration of this lease. Any such buildings, structures, and improvements situated at Goose Bay upon the termination of the lease shall thereupon become the property of the Lessor without compensation to the Lessee. The ownership of all other property, including removable improvements, equipment, material, supplies and goods, brought into Canada by the Lessee in connection with its operations at Goose Bay shall remain in the Lessee during and after the termination of this lease, and the Lessee shall have the unrestricted right of removing or disposing of all such property.

The Lessee shall observe accepted safety standards at Goose Bay for the protection of life and property.

The Lessee shall not install, maintain or operate at Goose Bay any lights or other visual aids to navigation of aircraft without the approval of the Commanding Officer, Royal Canadian Air Force Station Goose Bay.

The Lessee shall not at any time cause the waters of the Hamilton River to be polluted by disposal of sewage or otherwise.

The Commanding Officer, Royal Canadian Air Force Station Goose Bay, shall at all times have free access to any part of the Leased Areas.

The Lessee may not assign or sub-let nor may it part with the possession of the whole or any part of the Leased Areas.

IN WITNESS WHEREOF, etc.

Note de la 1ère Direction de liaison avec la Défense

Memorandum by Defence Liaison (1) Division

SECRET Ottawa, January 22, 1951

RE GOOSE BAY LEASE

The points in my memorandum to Mr. MacKay dated January 18 were discussed at a meeting on January 19 of the Canadian members of the PJBD.

Form of the Lease

General McNaughton liked the idea of having merely an Annex to the Exchange of Notes instead of a formal lease to be signed by the Minister of National Defence. The Air Force representatives, however, thought that U.S. officials might not be happy about making such a change in form at this stage of negotiations.

Detailed Reference to Privileges

The Air Force representatives thought that the U.S. would be anxious to have these privileges specifically mentioned in the lease. At the meeting General McNaughton and Mr. MacKay thought that we might try out on the Americans the idea of omitting these items from the lease, but in the discussion after the meeting Mr. MacKay and I came to the conclusion that it might be better to leave them in.

Option for Renewal

General McNaughton said, when he used the phrase, "option for renewal", at the meeting in March, 1950, it never occurred to him that it meant an absolute right of renewal. All that he meant to convey was that the Canadian Government would be glad to talk in good faith about renewal when the time came. The consensus of opinion was that we should try to get the Americans to accept a general clause instead of an absolute option for renewal. I read out the clause I had put in my memorandum of January 18, and Wing Commander McLearn read out the following clause:

> "Provided that this lease shall at the option of the lessee, by notice in writing to the lessor not less than six months prior to the expiration of the said term, be renewed without further consideration for one additional term of twenty years, and the conditions herein contained shall, if still mutually satisfactory, continue to apply; but otherwise the said conditions shall be subject to such modifications as, in the light of experience, are agreed by the parties hereto to be necessary or desirable."

It was agreed that we should try to get acceptance on my clause, but that W/C McLearn's draft should be tried as a second choice.

Storage of Explosives or Special Weapons

Everyone agreed that there was nothing in the lease to give the Canadian Government control in the matter. If the Canadian Government insists on having such control, it will have to be stated in some other document, not to be made public.

Conclusion

It was agreed that I should prepare a revised version of the lease on the basis of this discussion, in consultation with McLearn and Rettie of the Legal Division, with a view to having something which the Canadian members could take to the PJBD meeting in the United States next week.

Note du sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures pour le secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

Memorandum from Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to Secretary of State for External Affairs

TOP SECRET Ottawa, January 26, 1951

RE PROPOSED GOOSE BAY LEASE

Mr. Claxton examined the draft lease today with General McNaughton, and is anxious that your personal approval should be obtained before the Canadian Section leaves early Monday morning for the PJBD meeting in Alabama. If you agree, Mr. Claxton is willing that the draft lease should be discussed at the meeting, on the understanding, of course, that no decision has yet been taken by the Canadian Government; still less has the Government examined the annexed draft. Following is the background and some explanations.

2. In March 1950, with informal approval from Mr. Claxton, Mr. Garson and yourself, the Canadian Section told the Permanent Joint Board on Defence that, if satisfactory arrangements could be made with respect to the 1941 Leased Bases Agreement, the Canadian Section would recommend to its Government an arrangement to include the following:

"(1) The lease by the Canadian Government to the U.S. Government of a portion of the present Goose Bay area to accommodate U.S. installations and housing.

"(2) This lease to be for a period of twenty years, at a rental to cover any costs to the Canadian Government, with an option for renewal.

"(3) Application to the proposed U.S. area at Goose Bay of customs/excise privileges identical to those recommended for the leased bases on the Island of Newfoundland (that is, the same customs/excise privileges as are operative in the other provinces together with a right to continue PX's and similar institutions).

"(4) Application to the U.S. area of the Visiting Forces (U.S.A.) Act and of the legislative amendments and administrative arrangements contemplated in Section G of Part 1 of these Minutes.

"(5) Application to the U.S. area of military postal privileges identical to those recommended for the leased areas on the Island of Newfoundland.

"(6) All proposed U.S. construction projects in the U.S. area to have the prior approval of the Commanding Officer, R.C.A.F. Station, Goose Bay.

"(7) All proposed U.S. Service projects in Canada, based on the U.S. area to have the prior approval of the Canadian Government."

3. The Board's Recommendations regarding revision of the 1941 Agreement have not yet been formally approved by the Canadian Government, pending drafting of legislation. Since this drafting has now been done, it is proposed to lay those Recommendations before the Government shortly. (A memorandum on this will be sent to you after the PJBD meeting next week).

4. In the meantime, as you know, the U.S. has been enquiring whether we could proceed with the Goose Bay lease in order to enable them to secure appropriations for construction from Congress, and a definite decision from Cabinet may be required soon (even before the revision of the 1941 Agreement has been completed).

5. Legal officers of the U.S. and the R.C.A.F. recently prepared a first draft of the lease, and this has been revised in the Department of External Affairs, and Judge Advocate General's office. The revised version takes the form of an Exchange of Notes and is much simpler than earlier versions. The annexed copy incorporates the latest changes made by Mr. Claxton.

6. May I call your attention to the following points:

Para. 2(a). There will probably be four main areas leased — (1) the "housekeeping" area — hangars, barracks, etc.; (2) special weapons storage area; (3) and (4) global communications centres. Only area (1) would be delimited in the public annex; the other areas would be delimited in a secret letter concurrently with the lease.

Para. 4. This renewal clause may come as a shock to the U.S. officials, who took literally the phrase "option for renewal" used in March, 1950, which to a lawyer would mean an unconditional right to renew for twenty years.

Para. 5. It is, we are told, legally impossible for the U.S. to give the Canadian Commanding Officer access to areas (2), (3) and (4). It is proposed to say this in a secret exchange of letters.

Privileges. The U.S. officials want a provision in the lease itself, but we will try to get them to agree that it should go in a separate letter, which need not be tabled. Attached to the enclosed lease is the text which the U.S. wanted in it, and which we have deleted.

7. Finally, there is nothing in the Note (which will become public) giving the Canadian Government any control over the uses to be made of the base for special weapons. I understand that you wish the State Department to provide secret written assurances on this point before the lease is signed. This will not, of course, be discussed at the PJBD.

Projet d'échange de notes

Draft Exchange of Notes

SECRET January 23, 1951

PROPOSED EXCHANGE OF NOTES BETWEEN CANADA AND THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA RELATING TO GOOSE BAY, PROVINCE OF NEWFOUNDLAND

(To be made public in due course)

The Secretary of State for External Affairs for Canada to the United States Ambassador

Excellency,

I have the honour to refer to discussions which have recently taken place between representatives of our Governments on the Permanent Joint Board on Defence concerning a proposed lease to the United States of America of certain lands (hereinafter referred to as Leased Areas), situated within Royal Canadian Air Force Station Goose Bay in the Province of Newfoundland, for military purposes, and to inform you that in view of the mutual interest of Canada and the United States of America in the security of the North Atlantic area the Government of Canada is prepared to grant such a lease subject to the terms set forth in this note.

2. The Leased Areas shall consist of

(a) the lands lying and being within Royal Canadian Air Force Station Goose Bay, in the Province of Newfoundland, described in the annex to this note (For security reasons, it has been suggested that only one Leased Area should be described in this document and that concurrently the Canadian Government should by secret letter authorize the use of other areas involved. The above draft would be suitable for this purpose as one area could be listed in the annex (to be made public). It has been suggested, alternatively, that no description should be given in this document as it would be easy, from a drafting point of view, to put the description in a secret appendix); and

(b) such additional areas as may from time to time, in a manner to be determined in each case by the Government of Canada, be made available, other than on a temporary basis, to the United States of America upon its request and for its exclusive use.

3. The term of the lease shall be twenty years, free from the payment of all rent and charges.

4. The United States of America (hereinafter called the Lessee) may by notice in writing to the Government of Canada (hereinafter called the Lessor) not less than six months prior to the expiration of the term of the lease, request a renewal of the lease for a further period of not more than twenty years. If such request is made, the Lessor undertakes to consider it promptly, sympathetically and in good faith, in the light of the mutual interest of Canada and the United States of America in the security of the North Atlantic area. When consulting together on a request for renewal, the parties will consider what modifications if any in the terms of the lease would be necessary or desirable in the light of experience.

5. The Lessee, without prejudice to the sovereignty of Canada, shall have quiet enjoyment of the Leased Areas, subject at all times to right of free access by the Commanding Officer, Royal Canadian Air Force Station Goose Bay, or such officer as may be designated by him, to any part of the Leased Areas. (It is understood that there will have to be a concurrent exchange of letters (perhaps between the respective Chiefs of Staff), to be kept secret, excluding certain specified places from the right of free access.)

6. The Lessee shall have the right of free access to and egress from the Leased Areas, subject to the right of the Lessor to prescribe the routes to be used, and shall have within the Leased Areas, subject to the terms of this note, all the rights that are necessary to support the operation of United States military aircraft at Goose Bay, including, inter alia, the right, power and authority:

(a) to occupy and control the Leased Areas and to undertake such internal security measures as may be deemed necessary by the Lessee;

(b) to construct, install, improve and maintain in the Leased Areas, personnel housing, hangars, warehouses, shops, hard stands, parking aprons, storage and distribution facilities for aviation gasoline and other petroleum supplies, and any other type of building, structure or improvement deemed necessary by the Lessee, PROVIDED that all new major construction in the Leased Areas shall have the prior approval of the Commanding Officer, Royal Canadian Air Force Station Goose Bay; and

(c) subject to the approval of the Commanding Officer, Royal Canadian Air Force Station Goose Bay, to construct, install and operate in the Leased Areas communication facilities and navigation aids (including meteorological systems), radio and radar apparatus and electronic devices of any desired power, type of emission and frequency, PROVIDED that the Lessee shall not thereby cause interference with any other similar installation or operation at Royal Canadian Air Force Station Goose Bay.

7. All buildings, structures and improvements permanently affixed to the realty by the Lessee within the Leased Areas shall remain the property of the Lessee for the duration of this lease. Any such buildings, structures, and improvements situated at Goose Bay upon the termination of this lease shall thereupon become the property of the Lessor without compensation to the Lessee. The ownership of all other property, including removable improvements, equipment, material, supplies and goods, brought into Canada by the Lessee in connection with its operations at Goose Bay shall remain in the Lessee during and after the termination of this lease, and the Lessee shall have the unrestricted right of removing or disposing of all such property, PROVIDED that removal or disposition takes place within a reasonable time.

8. The Lessee may not assign or sublet, or part with the possession of the whole or any part of the Leased Areas.

9. United States military personnel outside the Leased Areas, in relation to the performance of their military duties, shall be under the exclusive control and command of United States authorities but in all other respects shall be subject to the regulations and orders applicable to Canadian military personnel. The United States Air Force Commanding Officer at Goose Bay shall be responsible for the observance of Royal Canadian Air Force Station Standing Orders by all United States military personnel at Goose Bay outside the Leased Areas.

10. The United States of America may, jointly with the Government of Canada, have

(a) the right to use the airfield at Goose Bay for the operation of United States military aircraft, subject to air traffic control by the Royal Canadian Air Force and prior notification of all expected arrivals to the Royal Canadian Air Force at Goose Bay;

(b) free and uninterrupted use of roadways at Goose Bay outside the Leased Areas, subject to any limitations that may be imposed by the Commanding Officer, Royal Canadian Air Force Station Goose Bay, in the interests of the efficient operation of the station;

(c) the use, for the transportation of petroleum products, of all pipes, pipelines, pumps and valves installed at Goose Bay by the Government of Canada and forming a part of the interconnected pipeline system; and

(d) the use of such dockage installations and facilities as may from time to time be installed at Goose Bay,

PROVIDED that the United States of America shall be responsible for any damage or injury suffered by others in consequence of the negligence of the members of its armed forces, employees or agents in connection with anything done or omitted under paragraph 10.

11. The United States of America may be authorized, in such manner as the Government of Canada determines, to use such rights of way at Goose Bay, outside the Leased Areas, as may hereafter be agreed upon, and may construct, maintain and operate thereon, such communication and transportation facilities as may be required for the support of United States military operations at Goose Bay.

12. The Lessee will not be required to pay any tax or fee in respect of registration or licencing of motor vehicles for use within the Royal Canadian Air Force Station Goose Bay.

13. The Lessee shall observe, both within and without the Leased Areas, accepted safety standards at Goose Bay for the protection of life and property.

14. The Lessee shall not install, maintain or operate at Goose Bay, whether within or without the Leased Areas, any lights or other aids to navigation of aircraft without the approval of the Commanding Officer, Royal Canadian Air Force Station Goose Bay.

15. The Lessee shall not at any time cause the waters of the Hamilton River to be polluted by disposal of sewage or otherwise.

16. Subject to enactment of the necessary legislation by the Parliament of Canada, it is the intention of the Government of Canada that the following recommendations of the Permanent Joint Board on Defence shall be given effect at Goose Bay:

(a) Application of customs and excise privileges identical to those recommended for the Leased Bases on the Island of Newfoundland, that is to say, the same privileges as are in effect in other provinces, together with the right to operate Post Exchanges and similar institutions; (Is it necessary to make reference to "similar institutions"? What are they?)

(b) Application of The Visiting Forces (United States of America) Act and of the legislative amendments and administrative arrangements contemplated in the Board's recommendations of March 28th - 30th, 1950;

(c) Application of military postal privileges identical to those recommended for the Leased Bases on the Island of Newfoundland.

17. In order to avoid doubt, I am instructed to state that my Government intends that the laws of Canada shall continue to apply throughout Royal Canadian Air Force Station Goose Bay, including the Leased Areas.

18. If the foregoing is acceptable to your Government, this note and your reply shall be regarded as constituting a lease agreement in force from the date of your reply.

RE PROPOSED GOOSE BAY LEASE

In case the Minister of National Defence raises this in Cabinet today, annexed is a copy of the latest draft† of the lease, dated February 15. This draft incorporates the changes made as a result of discussions at the PJBD meeting on February 2, and also incorporates some drafting changes made subsequently. The most important difference between this version and the one sent to you at the beginning of February is the deletion of the description of the boundaries of the leased areas. This was done for security reasons; at least 3 of the 4 main areas should not be delimited in a public document, and it was thought best to delete all boundaries. The three are the weapons storage area and the global communications areas.

[20] Cette date risque fort d'être inexacte. Ce devrait être probablement le 20 février 1951.
This date is most likely inaccurate. It probably should be February 20, 1951.

Para. 3

This has been reworded pursuant to your suggestion, in order to make it clear that the lease expires 20 years from the date of coming into force, regardless of the time when certain areas may be brought into the lease.

Para. 5

As stated in my memorandum to you of January 26, it is legally impossible for the U.S. to give the R.C.A.F. Commanding Officer access to the special weapons storage area and the global communications areas. It is proposed to say this, on the insistence of the Americans, in a secret exchange of letters between the respective Chiefs of Staff, concurrently with the signing of the lease.

Para. 9

You asked about the phrase "as may be appropriate" in line 5. Some R.C.A.F. regulations would not, I am advised, be appropriate for U.S. personnel, e.g., a regulation prohibiting attendance at political meetings!

Privileges and Immunities

The U.S. officials argued strongly for the inclusion in the lease of clauses setting forth privileges and immunities. When we made it clear that we did not wish to put them in the lease, they urged that these matters should be covered in a letter, concurrently with the signing of the lease, setting forth our intentions, and the Canadian Section of the PJBD agreed to recommend this course.

General Note

As you know, the lease does not give the Canadian Government any power to control or even advise upon the kind of military use to be made of the Leased Area, e.g., for special weapons. The U.S. have proposed a separate exchange of notes covering other bases as well as Goose.[21]

Apart from paragraph 3, there have been a few drafting changes made during the last week at the request of the U.S. officials. These changes are indicated by underlining. We are satisfied that none of the changes is important; they have been seen by General McNaughton and Mr. Claxton.

II. GOOSE BAY LEASE AGREEMENT

5. The Minister of National Defence, referring to the discussion in Cabinet on October 25th, 1950, noted that members of the Committee were familiar with the proposed agreement regarding the lease of lands at Goose Bay, Labrador, to the United States Government. The draft agreement provided for the lease of areas within the R.C.A.F. Station, Goose Bay, subject to appropriate Canadian control. In view of this proposed agreement, the U.S. Government was prepared, as recommended by the Permanent Joint Board on Defence in March, 1950, to make concessions with respect to certain of its rights at the leased bases on the Island of Newfoundland. He therefore recommended approval of the draft lease agreement.

6. The Prime Minister said that, while the draft appeared satisfactory, such terms as "Goose Bay" and "R.C.A.F. Station, Goose Bay", used in it, appeared to require definition. In general, the U.S. authorities should have a clear understanding of the meaning of the terms of the agreement into which they were entering. Further, while the draft agreement did not accord any privileges for U.S. vehicles outside of the R.C.A.F. Station (there being no roads outside of the base at present), it would have to be borne in mind that, if it were ever desired to grant such privileges, steps would have to be taken to ensure that there were suitable advance arrangements with the Province of Newfoundland.

7. Mr. Claxton said that the opening paragraph of the latest draft explained that "Goose Bay", used in subsequent paragraphs, was merely a short form of "R.C.A.F. Station, Goose Bay".

8. The Committee, after further discussion, approved the draft agreement for the lease of lands at Goose Bay, Labrador to the United States Government, on the understanding that the term "R.C.A.F. Station, Goose Bay" would be defined in the documents to be exchanged with that Government.[22]

[22] Cette décision a été approuvée par le Cabinet plénier, lors de ses réunions des 21 et 22 février 1951. This decision was endorsed by the full cabinet at its meetings on February 21 and 22, 1951.

L'ambassadeur aux États-Unis

LETTER NO. 19 Washington, January 3, 1951

TOP SECRET

Reference My Letter No. 3088 of December 2, 1950.[23]

PROPOSED U.S. STRATEGIC AIR COMMAND PROJECTS

1. Mr. R. Gordon Arneson of the State Department, following up the talk which he had in my office as reported to you in my Letter No. 3088 of December 2, 1950, visited me on January 3rd in order to put forward a specific proposal for simplified procedure for prior consultation or notification between the Canadian and United States Governments in connection with the staging of aircraft of the U.S. Strategic Air Command to overseas areas. On this occasion Mr. Arneson was accompanied by Major General R.L. Walsh, the United States Air Force member of the P.J.B.D., and Mr. Joseph Chase of the State Department. Mr. Ignatieff was also present at this meeting.

2. Mr. Arneson explained that the Secretary of State had received on January 2nd a formal request from the Secretary of Defense that the Canadian Government be approached at the highest political level in order to reach a general agreement to govern the deployment of the units of the U.S. Strategic Air Command, the storage of weapons including atomic weapons, the construction of facilities for their storage, and the over-flight of Canadian territory which this deployment involves. Specifically, the proposal involves the use of Harmon Airfield as well as of Goose Bay. Before the eventuality of war, the U.S. Joint Chiefs of Staff desire to use Harmon and Goose Bay for training purposes, as well as to make necessary preparations for their use as staging bases for actual missions in wartime.

3. Mr. Arneson brought with him a paper drafted in the Pentagon (two copies of which are attached, numbered 1 and 2) which sets out the proposed substance of a communication to be sent by the Secretary of State to the Canadian Government on this question. He asked that this paper should be studied by the Canadian Government with a view to arriving at an agreed exchange of notes which would constitute a general agreement between the two governments.

[23] Voir/See Volume 16, Document 837.

4. General Walsh made some explanatory comment in elaboration of what Mr. Arneson had said. Two considerations accounted for the earnest desire of the Pentagon for this agreement with the Canadian Government. First, there was a need for the utmost secrecy in any communications which pass between the two governments arising out of the need for prior consultation and notification. There was also the need, however, for swift action to enable the U.S. Strategic Air Command to undertake a strategic air offensive for the mutual defence of Canada and the United States if, as the Pentagon papers says, "war is joined by the North Atlantic Treaty Organization nations". What the U.S. Department of Defense is seeking, as General Walsh put it, is a "canopy" of an agreement reached at the highest political level which would enable the U.S. Chiefs of Staff, acting under the authority of the Secretary of Defense, to take prompt action, through channels of maximum security, such as from General Vandenberg to Air Marshal Curtis, to notify the Canadian authorities involved of any particular action to be taken under the terms of the general agreement.

5. The facilities desired by the U.S. Strategic Air Command for the staging of aircraft are those enumerated in paragraph 2 of the Pentagon paper. In answer to a query about what was involved in "the over-flight of Canada on training missions", General Walsh explained that this was intended to cover training flights under agreed conditions to Harmon and Goose Bay in the Northeast and also the over-flight of Canadian territory by units of the U.S. Strategic Air Command to Alaskan bases in the Northwest. The flights in the Northwest would not involve any use of Canadian airfields, but a request has been submitted by the U.S. Strategic Air Command, on which I have written to you separately, for early permission to make an over-flight of Canadian territory from Great Falls, Montana, to Ladd Field, Alaska, using the inland route rather than the coastal route to avoid dangerous icing conditions. These aircraft would be carrying atomic weapons without nuclear components, in line with the advance deployment arrangements now being planned by the U.S. Strategic Air Command.

6. I enquired from General Walsh about the reference in paragraph 3 of the Pentagon paper to the defects of the "present prior consultation procedure". General Walsh explained that if correspondence had to be undertaken in the case of every activity contemplated by the U.S. Strategic Air Command, both timing and security might be jeopardized. If a general agreement were reached between the two governments on a political level, detailed arrangements for consultation procedures directed to the economizing of time and providing for the utmost security would be worked out, presumably between the Defence headquarters of the two countries. This, he said, was the meaning of the reference to "appropriate Service agencies" in paragraph 5 of the Pentagon paper.

7. Mr. Arneson gave some explanatory comment on the reference in paragraph 2 of the Pentagon paper to the "prior deployment — of atomic weapons". He said that under the procedure authorized by the President for the disposition of atomic weapons, Presidential approval was required at each of these stages in the process of transferring atomic weapons from the custody of the Atomic Energy Commission to the U.S. Strategic Air Command for operational use. The first stage is the delivery of the atomic weapons to the U.S.A.F. without their nuclear components.

The second stage is the transfer of the nuclear components to the U.S.A.F. The third stage is the authority to employ the assembled weapons.

8. Mr. Arneson suggested that I should inform the State Department through him as soon as possible of the comments of the Canadian Government on the Pentagon paper. On the basis of these comments, a letter would then be drawn up for Mr. Acheson's signature in terms which would be satisfactory to the Canadian Government. The reply to Mr. Acheson's letter from the Canadian Government would then constitute the agreement.

9. I said, having in mind the comments contained in your message EX-2735 of December 30th,† that the channel which I would employ for transmitting this proposal to the Canadian Government would be civilian rather than military. I added that it would be necessary for the Prime Minister as well as some other members of the Cabinet to be consulted, and, having in mind the Prime Minister's participation in the Commonwealth meeting of Prime Ministers in London, the earliest date on which a reply could be expected from Ottawa would be after mid-January. General Walsh and Mr. Arneson said that that would be fully understood, but they hoped that an agreement satisfactory to both countries could be reached on this matter as soon as possible, and preferably before the end of this month.

10. General Walsh explained that the U.S. Joint Chiefs of Staff considered that the P.J.B.D. should not be employed for the discussion of the projects referred to in the enclosure and any related matters concerning the use of special weapons. I think that if further information is required on the plans of the Strategic Air Command in this connection, it could easily be arranged for a qualified officer of the U.S.A.F. to proceed to Ottawa on short notice. General Walsh, however, informs me that Air Marshal Curtis, Air Vice Marshal James, and two or three other senior officers of the Air Force are familiar with these plans.

PROPOSED SUBSTANCE OF A COMMUNICATION WITH THE CANADIAN GOVERNMENT

1. The United States Joint Chiefs of Staff agree on the desirability of using Harmon and Goose Bay in Canada, if war is joined by the North Atlantic Treaty Organization nations for staging aircraft to overseas areas. Such use of these two bases would be a decisively important element in a strategic air offensive initiated for the mutual defence of our nations.

2. The use of Harmon and Goose Bay for the above purpose involves: prior deployment of Air Force units and atomic weapons, storage of weapons and construction of facilities for storage, and over-flight of Canada on training missions and, in event of war, actual missions.

3. Much of the above activity would be in the nature of operations outside the areas leased to the United States and therefore is subject to prior consultation with

Canada. However, the unsettled world situation may dictate the initiation of operations in such an emergency that the present prior consultation procedure would seriously jeopardize the effectiveness of the action. Under the circumstances, it is highly desirable that a simplified prior consultation or notification procedure be developed providing for maximum secrecy and minimum delay.

4. If the Canadian Government agrees to the general principle involved, the most feasible procedure appears to be a very general agreement including prior approval for such air movements, staging and strikes. It is suggested that the general agreement authorize the development of a procedure whereby advice will be given at the proper time that these activities will be carried out. In every case, the maximum prior notice will be given and especially in the case of training or advance preparatory deployments.

5. Upon acceptance of the general principle outlined above, it is suggested that the operational commanders concerned or other appropriate Service agencies be authorized to develop the details of the consultation and notification procedure.

TOP SECRET Ottawa, January 8, 1951

CONSULTATION BETWEEN GOVERNMENTS ON THE POSSIBLE USE OF THE ATOMIC BOMB

When Mr. Attlee was in Ottawa after his talks last month with President Truman, I believe you discussed with him the assurance which President Truman had given Mr. Attlee that he would keep Mr. Attlee informed of developments which might lead to the use of the bomb. There have been one or two recent exchanges between the U.S. and Canadian Governments of which you should know in case you have further private discussions on this subject with Mr. Attlee in London.

On Mr. Acheson's instructions, the State Department has told our Embassy in Washington in writing that the assurances which President Truman gave Mr. Attlee also apply to you. In other words, the President will keep you informed of any developments in the world situation which may lead to the use of the bomb. The State Department have explained to us informally that President Truman cannot undertake to consult Mr. Attlee and yourself because the U.S. Joint Congressional Committee on Atomic Energy insist that there should be no limitation upon the President's decision and that he must not be committed, as was the case in the original Quebec Agreement of 1943, to consult any other government before deciding to use the bomb. For this reason, the State Department have explained, the President can only undertake to keep us informed — an undertaking that could be interpreted very loosely.

As you will see from the attached copies of Mr. Wrong's Despatches of December 13th and January 3rd, the U.S. Government are also proposing to approach the Canadian Government formally at the highest political level in order to reach a general agreement to govern the use of Goose Bay and Harmon Airfield as launching bases for atomic attacks in the event of war, and as storage and training bases in peacetime. We do not know with certainty whether the U.K. Government have granted or intend to grant the U.S. Government any facilities for the use of bases in the U.K. by the U.S. Strategic Air Command. If, as we assume, the U.K. Government has granted the U.S.A.F. base facilities for strategic as well as tactical purposes, the U.K. Government face much the same problem as the Canadian Government.

In any event, you may consider it worthwhile pursuing this delicate mater personally with Mr. Attlee. In the opinion of the officials of this Department, at least, the U.S. Government have not as yet been very forthcoming in describing frankly and fully their plans and intentions, and still less in giving us any assurance that we will be adequately consulted before irrevocable decisions are taken by another government involving the use of bases in Canada.

TOP SECRET. URGENT. Ottawa, February 8, 1951

CONSULTATION BETWEEN UNITED STATES AND CANADIAN GOVERNMENTS ON THE ATOMIC BOMB, AND THE USE OF BASES IN CANADA

I understand there is to be a discussion on this subject this evening between the Prime Minister, Mr. Howe, Mr. Claxton and yourself. For this purpose we have circulated the relevant papers to the Ministers concerned, and I have also sent them a copy of this memorandum. The most important document is the Pentagon draft of a note from the United States Government to the Canadian Embassy in Washington which, with the Canadian Government's reply, would constitute a "canopy" agreement under which service arrangements could proceed. The draft is attached to Mr. Wrong's letter No. 19 of January 3.

2. The policy questions for discussion resolve themselves, I think, into two categories:

(a) Does the Canadian Government want to be consulted or kept informed, by the U.S. Government?

(b) Should the channel of communication between the U.S. and Canadian Governments on policy matters connected with this subject be civil or military?

3. The first question was discussed in a memorandum which I sent to the Prime Minister on January 8, in your absence, in case he wished to discuss the matter with Mr. Attlee during his visit to Ottawa. Copies of my memorandum to the Prime Minister have been circulated. Whether or not it is decided that some form of consultation is desired by the Canadian Government, I would suppose that we should at least insist on being kept fully informed as to the general plans and intentions of the U.S. Strategic Air Command, and as to any immediate plans which may be formulated for the use of Goose Bay or Harmon as launching or staging fields should an emergency situation arise.

4. The second question was, I believe, briefly discussed between the Prime Minister, Mr. Claxton and yourself at the end of December. We have advised Mr. Wrong of your view at that time that the Government would prefer the civil to the military channel for all consultations on policy. If this decision is confirmed this evening, we should also be in a position to indicate to the U.S. Government what the Canadian Government would regard as "matters of policy", as distinct from purely service arrangements carried forward under an agreed policy.

5. Whatever channels are used, and whether the Canadian Government is to be kept informed or consulted, it may well become necessary for our communications staffs in Ottawa and Washington to be put onto twenty-four hour watch, at least on a stand-by basis. At present, both National Defence and External Affairs Communications Sections close down entirely during the night, although someone is always available on call for "Most Immediate" messages.

UNITED STATES STRATEGIC AIR COMMAND PROJECTS

1. In thinking about the desire of the United States Government to secure a "canopy" agreement with Canada which would cover the use of Goose Bay and Harmon Field for the deployment of atomic weapons, it occurred to me that it would be useful to seek information about any arrangements which may have been made between the United States and United Kingdom with regard to similar projects at the United States bases in England. I therefore asked Mr. Ignatieff to raise this issue with Mr. Arneson when he next had an occasion to see him. Mr. Ignatieff saw Mr. Arneson on February 28th at the latter's request, and I enclose a note which he has given me of their discussion about the arrangements made with the United Kingdom. From this it would appear that no formal agreement has been concluded, although Mr. Attlee has given his consent to arrangements worked out between the Chiefs of Staff of the two countries.

2. You will notice that Mr. Arneson told Mr. Ignatieff that shortly after this visit Mr. Acheson, in answer to a question at a secret session of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, said that the United States Government did not have to obtain the consent of any other government before using atomic weapons. This revives my apprehension that the results of the conversations between Mr. Truman and Mr. Attlee last December may become the subject of misunderstanding between the United Kingdom and the United States. In my Despatch No. 3121 of December 13th, 1950, I mentioned an account of the discussions between Mr. Truman and Mr. Attlee on the use of atomic weapons which had been given to me on a personal basis by Sir Oliver Franks, and said that the British Ambassador had asked me not to report what he had told me unless I found it necessary to do so in order to be sure that the Prime Minister and Mr. Pearson understood the position. Although you have not asked me to forward this information and I have not been informed what account of these discussions was given to Mr. St. Laurent by Mr. Attlee in Ottawa, I think that it is advisable to send you at this time a copy of the record which I made on December 13th, 1950, of my talk with Sir Oliver. This is also enclosed herewith.

3. It certainly appears from this as though the British Government is satisfied that there will be prior consultation before any use of atomic weapons by the United States. Publicly, however, the United States Government is bound to do no more than to transmit information. The issue, of course, is whether the private and verbal assurances given to Mr. Attlee by Mr. Truman continue to be in effect or whether they have been superseded by the more cautious language used in the joint communiqué of December 8th. Is there, in short, a satisfactory meeting of minds on the interpretation of the words used in the communiqué in which the President undertook "to keep the Prime Minister at all times informed of developments"? If this is accepted as equivalent to the President's assurances to Mr. Attlee that there should be prior consultation, no later difficulties should arise, unless prior consultation is taken in London to mean that the weapon will not be employed without the consent of the United Kingdom — and also of Canada, since we have been officially informed that Canada is in the same position as the United Kingdom.

4. My observation may seem to have a semantic flavour, and I do not see readily how a higher degree of precision can be secured covering every circumstance in which the use of atomic weapons might become an immediate issue. Indeed, considering the range of circumstances which might arise and the extreme rapidity with which in certain conditions a decision might have to be taken, I think that we should leave the question of the interpretation of the Truman-Attlee understanding where it is.

5. Let us assume that some atomic weapons, probably without nuclear components, will be dispersed at bases used by the Strategic Air Force at Goose Bay and Harmon Field as well as at United States bases in England, Alaska, the continental

United States and possibly one or two points elsewhere. Under the proposed "canopy" agreement we would receive notice through Service channels of the transfer to the two Canadian fields of any nuclear components to complete the weapons, and once the desirability of the deployment to these fields of the weapons has been accepted there would be no solid ground for objecting to their completion. The critical stage, of course, comes later when an immediate decision might have to be taken to use the weapon. We are assured that we shall be informed of the developments respecting its use not only from Canadian fields but anywhere. (Indeed, I think that the point of departure of the carrier aircraft is a matter of small importance provided that there is a simultaneous entry into a state of war of the United States and the country having territorial sovereignty over the base employed outside the United States.)

6. Mr. Arneson outlined on December 6th last to Mr. Ignatieff the various conditions under which in his judgement questions of the use of the atomic weapon might arise, ranging between an overt Soviet attack directly against the United States and an attack by satellite forces only on a country not party to the North Atlantic Treaty. If the Russians were to employ the Pearl Harbour method to open war with the United States, the most that we could expect would be to receive information that retaliation with atomic weapons was being ordered. One can imagine the possibility that the Secretaries of Defense and State and the Chairman of the Atomic Energy Commission might be called to the White House from their beds to advise Mr. Truman on making an instant decision which would be put into effect without delay. In other cases where the time factor was not so pressing the obligation of the United States to keep the United Kingdom and Canada informed might well in effect amount to prior consultation and possibly to the reaching of a joint decision.

Note d'une conversation entre M. Ignatieff et M. R. Gordon Arneson

Memorandum of Conversation between Mr. Ignatieff and Mr. R. Gordon Arneson

TOP SECRET [Washington], February 28, 1951

Apparently no "canopy" agreement of the sort proposed to the Canadian Government exists or is at present contemplated between the United Kingdom and United States Governments.

2. The arrangements which permit the location in United States bases in the United Kingdom of atomic weapons and the equipment and personnel required for their delivery have grown out of a series of consultations originating from inter-service contacts and have been given an informal approval by the U.K. Government through the Prime Minister.

3. As far back as 1948, Marshal of the Air Force Lord Tedder, then the U.K. Chief of the Air Staff, was approached by General Vandenberg with a request to agree to the installation of certain buildings in U.S. bases in East Anglia which were required in connection with the detonating mechanism used in atomic weapons. Lord Tedder gave his consent without seeking ministerial concurrence, as he considered it a matter within his competence. In the following year, a further approach was made to Lord Tedder by General Vandenberg, asking for permission for the transfer of equipment by the Strategic Air Command connected with atomic weapons; this was at the time of the Berlin blockade. On this occasion, Lord Tedder replied that he had to seek the consent of the Government and apparently consulted the Prime Minister and the Minister of Defence. Permission was granted.

4. The next move came when Mr. Attlee visited Washington in December of last year. The Prime Minister was accompanied by Field Marshal Slim as well as the Marshal of the Air Force Slessor, and the visit of these two Chiefs of Staff of the U.K. provided an opportunity for further consultations with the U.S. Joint Chiefs of Staff. These conversations included discussions on the disposition of the Strategic Air Command in the United Kingdom for purposes connected with atomic weapons. Agreement was reached, and the conclusions were referred to Mr. Attlee for his approval. While Mr. Arneson was unable to give any indication of what these conclusions were, it was his understanding that there was no written "canopy" agreement of the type now under discussion between the Canadian and United States Governments.

5. Mr. Arneson added a point of interest in connection with Mr. Churchill's recent request for the publication of the Quebec Agreement.[24] He said that this request was almost certainly connected with his concern about the lack of any formal agreement which would require the United States to seek the consent of the United Kingdom Government before using atomic weapons, even if this involved their delivery from U.S. bases in the United Kingdom. Recalling what he had told us previously of the understanding reached between Messrs. Attlee and Truman on the question of "consultation" prior to the use of atomic weapons by the United States (see our despatch 3121 of December 13th, 1950), Mr. Arneson said that after Mr. Attlee's departure from Washington Mr. Acheson had made an appearance before the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations in secret session. He had been closely questioned about the Attlee-Truman talks and had been asked whether any agreement had been entered into between the two governments. Apparently, Senator Hickenlooper asked the direct question: "Did the United States Government have to obtain the consent of any other government before using atomic weapons?" Mr. Acheson had made the reply: "No, certainly not." In speaking to Mr. Arneson about this matter after the meeting Mr. Acheson made the interesting observation that, had Senator Hickenlooper been brighter, he might have followed up with a more embarrassing question, such as: "Does the United States Government have any obligation to seek the consent of another government in the case where bases or facilities to be employed by the United States are located in another country?" Mr. Arneson remarked that this question would be far more difficult to answer, particularly in view of the uncertainty over the conditions which will govern the use of Goose Bay by the Strategic Air Command.

TRUMAN-ATTLEE DISCUSSIONS ON ATOMIC QUESTIONS

I showed Sir Oliver Franks this morning the record of the two discussions between Ignatieff and Arneson. I said that I thought that the account given by Arneson to Ignatieff on December 11th of what went on in the talks must be incomplete in some important respects. Although I imagined that Mr. Attlee, when he was in Ottawa, had filled in the gaps during his discussion with Mr. St. Laurent, I would welcome such information as he could give to guide me in reporting to Mr. Pearson.

Sir Oliver said that he would give me, on a personal basis, an account of what went on, with the understanding that I would be free to pass on what part of it I thought necessary in order to ensure that the Prime Minister and Mr. Pearson understood the situation.

Mr. Attlee had raised the matter with Mr. Truman in a private conversation before one of the meetings and had particularly requested that there should be consultation with the United Kingdom and Canada before any decision was taken to employ atomic weapons. Mr. Truman had given him verbally a full assurance in the sense desired. The advisers were then called in and Mr. Truman repeated this assurance in their presence. The assurance of prior consultation had been written into the first drafts of the Communiqué and had not been questioned on the U.S. side during several revisions of these drafts. On the last day of the meetings, however, while Mr. Attlee and the British party were waiting for the final approval of the Communiqué, Mr. Acheson called Mr. Attlee and Sir Oliver into the President's office and explained why it was undesirable that the Communiqué should include a commitment for prior consultation, for reasons similar to those given Mr. Ignatieff by Mr. Arneson. He added that he was sure that it would prejudice the prospects of a successful resumption of the tripartite negotiations if the language of the Communiqué were not changed. He then produced a draft of his own, which was so reserved in language that Sir Oliver said that it sounded minatory instead of reassuring. Finally, they worked out the language employed in the Communiqué.

Sir Oliver said, however, that the verbal assurances given in very explicit terms by the President were not withdrawn and that therefore the phrase used, "to keep the Prime Minister at all times informed of developments which might bring about a change in the situation", really meant that there would be prior consultation with the Governments of the United Kingdom and Canada before a decision was taken to employ atomic weapons.

Mr. Attlee's endeavour is to stick to the line that his discussions with the President on this point were, as he said in Parliament yesterday, completely satisfactory without giving his interpretation of this passage in the Communiqué. Sir Oliver thinks it likely that he has informed Mr. Churchill in strict confidence of what actually transpired, and he hopes that Mr. Churchill will therefore use his influence to prevent further pressure on Mr. Attlee in the House of Commons.

U.S. STRATEGIC AIR COMMAND PROJECTS

I have read with interest the very important draft letter attached, and I think that it, generally, covers the ground.

The delicacy and difficulty of this matter has been driven home to me again by the communications received from Washington, and which are attached to your draft. There is a very real risk, I think, of a misunderstanding between the United States on the one hand, and the United Kingdom and ourselves on the other, as to the nature of the commitment already given by President Truman to Mr. Attlee — and extended to us — regarding the use of atomic bombs by the United States. There is no doubt that the United Kingdom feel that there is a specific commitment for consultation. There is no doubt also that the United States is satisfied that there is no commitment in regard to prior consent from any other government before atomic weapons are used. Mr. Acheson was quite specific on this point in his secret statement to the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. The misunderstanding which may arise will be over the relationship of "consultation" to "consent". In our case that misunderstanding may be more difficult to avoid because of the agreed occupation by the United States of Canadian bases from which an attack could be mounted. How can we agree to this without the reservation that we too must be at war! But if we are not going to permit the United States to fly atomic bombs from Canadian bases without prior agreement (except in the case of an immediate retaliation against an atomic or air assault), then, to us, prior consultation does, in certain circumstances, really imply consent. I agree, however, with Mr. Wrong that it is going to be difficult to impose specific conditions on the United States in regard to this matter. What we must do, however, is to make it absolutely clear that each side knows what the other side means by any implied commitments.

[25] Note marginale :/Marginal note:
Mr. MacKay, Mr. George: Please consider further revision, and report. Mar 20 A.D.P.H[eeney]

Your draft letter touches on these difficulties in paragraphs 4 and 9. I am just wondering whether it would be wise to expand these paragraphs a little. For instance, the last sentence in paragraph 4 might refer more definitely to the assurances that President Truman gave to Mr. Attlee. You state in this paragraph that we are not inclined to distinguish sharply between an operation to be mounted or staged from Canadian territory, and one from the continental United States. I am a little worried about this, because I cannot remove from my mind the impression that there should be some such distinction. Also, I am wondering whether paragraph 9 should not be put near the beginning of our communication.

There are one or two other points of detail. In paragraph 3, you refer in lines two and three to "consultation and information", while the other references in the same paragraph are to "consultation or information". Why the distinction?

In paragraph 7, is there not an inconsistency in the last three lines where you say prior notification would be made through the diplomatic channel, and then go on to add, "We assume that the service channel might also be employed."? Or does this merely mean that there can be notification through the two channels.

UNITED STATES STRATEGIC AIR COMMAND PROJECTS

1. At a meeting on February 9, Mr. Pearson and Mr. Claxton discussed the subjects raised in your letter No. 19 of January 3 and the draft enclosed with your letter of a United States Government communication with the Canadian Government, which, with the Canadian Government's reply, would constitute a "canopy" agreement under which Service arrangements concerning the deployment of units of the U.S. Strategic Air Command could proceed. Mr. Robertson, General Foulkes, A/V/M James, and I were also present.

2. It was agreed during the discussion that the Government would be prepared to make available, as part of the Canadian contribution to the common defence of the North Atlantic area, facilities in Canada for the use of the U.S. Strategic Air Command. These facilities would include the use of bases in Canada for the purposes and on the conditions to be indicated in the proposed agreement. The Canadian Government would like to see the U.S. Government's note drafted in terms that would place the exchange of notes squarely under the agreed North Atlantic Treaty arrangements whereby the United States has been given, on behalf of all NATO countries, responsibility for strategic air bombing, in accordance with the principle of balanced collective forces elaborated in NATO Document SGM 267-50.† We therefore suggest that a reference might be written into the first paragraph of the U.S. note to our common obligations under the Treaty, to the special responsibility of the United States for strategic air bombing, and to the agreement of the North Atlantic Deputies that "member nations should ... agree to give immediate and special attention to ... granting these requirements (for base facilities) as appropriate". We are not suggesting that the text of the U.S. note need necessarily quote the above passage from Document D-D/183† concerning Military Operating Requirements within the North Atlantic area. Rather, we suggest that the language of the note should reflect the agreed North Atlantic policies under which both the Canadian and United States Governments would be acting.

3. It was also agreed that a sure distinction should be drawn between "consultation" and "information" concerning circumstances which might lead to the imminent use of the bomb, and consultation or information concerning any other arrangements under the proposed agreement. The Ministers regard any information or consultation concerning operational employment of the weapon as fundamentally different and distinct from information or consultation concerning arrangements which might be made between the two Services on Government authority for such matters as deployment of aircraft, storage facilities, construction and training programmes. As regards the latter, what might be termed the non-operational feature of our co-operation, the Ministers see no objection to accepting a procedure whereby arrangements of this kind would be made through senior Service channels, under the general "canopy" agreement proposed.

4. As regards any communication between Governments as to a possible strike, the Ministers consider that diplomatic channels should be used. By this they mean that the State Department would communicate with the Canadian Embassy in Washington which would act as the channel to the Department of External Affairs and the Government. The Ministers are not inclined to distinguish sharply between an operation to be mounted or staged from Canadian territory and one from the continental United States. In either event, the Prime Minister would assume that he would be kept informed by the President. This was indicated in the letter of December 11 from Mr. Arneson to Mr. Ignatieff sent on Mr. Acheson's instructions. It informed the Canadian Government that the assurances which President Truman had given to Mr. Attlee also applied to the Canadian Government.

5. In a separate letter, I shall explain how we would propose to establish a channel of communication which could function with the utmost speed and security in such an eventuality. Although I realize, from your letter No. 3088 of December 2,[26] that you have already told Mr. Arneson that you thought the Prime Minister would prefer the civil to the military channel for this purpose, you can now be quite specific in saying that the Government wish the diplomatic channel only to be used for this purpose.

[26] Voir/See Volume 16, Document 837.

6. As we have said, the Government have no objection to the employment of Service channels for notification of detailed Service arrangements for non-operational activities.

7. There is a third category of communications for which we would prefer that diplomatic channels should also be used. As we understand it, nuclear components would never be carried on training flights, although bombs, less their nuclear components, might be; the only purposes for which nuclear components would have to be flown across Canadian territory would be to take them to Goose Bay or Harmon Field for storage, or, when mounted, on a strike. As the movement of nuclear components to advance bases such as Harmon and Goose might, in fact, be the earliest indication of the U.S. Government's appreciation of the seriousness of the situation, the Ministers would like it understood that any movement of nuclear components over Canadian territory, or to or from a base in Canadian territory, would require prior notification through the diplomatic channel. In such cases, we assume that the Service channel might also be employed.

8. The procedures for consultation and notification discussed in paragraphs 4 and 6 above would, of course, apply only up to the time of the initial decision of the United States Government to use atomic weapons. Further questions of policy concerning the possible extension of atomic warfare might arise subsequently which would require consultation between Governments. As yet, however, we have made no attempt to study this question.

9. There is one further general observation that I think should be made, although it is one which I realize that you could not raise with the U.S. Government at this time. Throughout this letter, we have not attempted to distinguish between being consulted and being kept informed. We appreciate the President's difficulty in giving any undertaking that would be acceptable to Congress and constitutionally valid, to the effect that he would consult any Government before authorizing the use of the bomb. Equally, the Canadian Government could not ask for less than to be consulted on a matter of such importance. It is realized, however, that any advance notification the Canadian Government were given, even on the basis of being "kept informed", would open the way for a reply by the Canadian Government which would in effect mean consultations between the two Governments. No document could ensure the effectiveness of such consultations, which would in the final analysis depend on mutual confidence and good faith at the top political level.

10. While you were in Ottawa, you suggested that a draft should be prepared in the Department of the proposed communication of the United States Government to the Canadian Government, in order to enable you, quite informally, to suggest in concrete fashion exactly what we had in mind. We tried our hand at such a draft, but decided that it would serve no real purpose at this stage and until we have your comments on this communication when you have had another talk with the Americans.

TOP SECRET Ottawa, March 29, 1951

UNITED STATES STRATEGIC AIR COMMAND PROJECT

You will recall commenting about ten days ago on a draft letter to Mr. Wrong on the above subject. You noted in your memorandum of March 20 on this draft that there was a real possibility of misunderstanding between the United States and the United Kingdom with regard to the commitments given by Mr. Truman to Mr. Attlee about consultation prior to the use of the A bomb and that it was essential that both the United States and ourselves should clearly understand what the undertaking was with regard to use of facilities in Canada for strategic air operations. You also expressed some apprehension that the letter made no distinction between the use of Canadian facilities and facilities in the United States or elsewhere. Mr. Heeney gathered that the sense of the meeting of February 9 (attended by yourself, Mr. Claxton, Mr. Robertson, General Foulkes, A/V/M James) was that there was no real distinction. However, officials of the Department were rather worried about this lack of distinction and agreed with you that there should be such a distinction.

2. The letter to Mr. Wrong has accordingly been completely redrafted, I hope in accordance with your views. The draft states that the Canadian Government must be consulted at the highest level before storage of fissionable material in Canada or overflight of Canadian territory with fissionable material or strikes from Canadian bases. As you note, consultation may, in fact, imply consent, but Mr. Heeney appears to be rather doubtful that we can press the United States Government into agreeing that the Canadian Government must give express consent before such use is made of facilities in Canada, especially in the case of Harmon Field, since the Bases Agreement makes no provision for any such procedure.

3. The letter has also been altered to indicate that the views expressed are Mr. Heeney's rather than those of the Canadian Government, and instruct Mr. Wrong to give our comments orally to the State Department rather than in writing. The reason for this change is purely tactical, since it was felt that it would be preferable to "try out" these views on the United States authorities rather than for the Government as yet to take a really firm position on the matter.

4. Mr. Heeney signed the letter, but left instructions that it should have your approval before it goes.

UNITED STATES STRATEGIC AIR COMMAND PROJECTS

The United States proposal for a "canopy" agreement concerning the use of facilities in Canada by the Strategic Air Command was discussed at a meeting with Mr. Pearson, Mr. Claxton, Mr. Robertson, General Foulkes, A/V/M James and myself. The subject has also been discussed with the Minister several times and the Prime Minister. The comments which follow are based on these discussions, but they should be regarded as my own, since it is felt that the matter should be kept on this more or less informal basis for the present.

2. As you have suggested, we should consider the United States request for a "canopy" agreement in the broader setting of the talks between President Truman and Mr. Attlee about the use of atomic weapons. I quite agree with your view that there is a very real risk of misunderstanding arising between the United States and the United Kingdom as to the nature of the commitment which was given by President Truman. The United Kingdom Government apparently feels that a specific commitment for consultation in advance of use of the bomb has been made by the President. On the other hand, Mr. Acheson was quite specific in his secret statement to the Senate Foreign Relations Committee that there was no commitment to any government regarding prior consent. A close examination of the press communiqué issued after these talks and the memorandum of the conversation between Mr. Ignatieff and Mr. Arneson on December 11, 1950, would seem clearly to support Mr. Acheson's statement. The concluding sentence of the memorandum of the conversation with Mr. Arneson, if a correct statement of the United States Government's views, clearly indicates that the United States Government has committed itself only to consultation "on the developing international situation and the military measures which it called for, rather than upon the use, in a particular situation, of atomic or any other kind of weapons". Canada is assured of only equal treatment in this respect.

3. The draft canopy agreement forwarded with your letter No. 19 of January 3, if accepted by us in its present form, would constitute, in effect, advance consent to the use, subject to notification, of facilities in Canada by Strategic Air Command in preparing for carrying out operations in atomic warfare. Although the phrase "consultation and notification procedure", is used in the final paragraph, it is fairly clear from the text as a whole that the "consultation" envisaged would not necessarily entitle the Canadian Government to refuse. In short, the canopy agreement as outlined would seem to leave the Canadian Government with little, if any, more control over the use for operational purposes by Strategic Air Command of facilities in Canada than it has over policy under the Truman-Attlee formula.

4. The desire of the United States authorities in view of responsibilities under NATO for strategic air operations, to have a free hand, subject to notification, for the Strategic Air Command to overfly Canada and to use Goose Bay and Harmon Field for operational purposes is fully appreciated. At the same time, if the Canadian Government agree to such an arrangement, it might well forego any opportunity it may have of influencing policy in the use of atomic weapons by reason of Canada's geographical location. In the event of an all-out war, it would perhaps be unrealistic for the Canadian Government to hope that it could really exercise an effective influence on such policy. But it would clearly seem unwise for it to "throw in its hand" in advance.

5. Such an argument, of course, can scarcely be put to the United States authorities. It might, however, be pointed out to them that although the United States has a responsibility under North Atlantic Treaty arrangements for strategic air operations, and although the Canadian Government would not wish in any way to hinder the United States in the fulfillment of these responsibilities, it is felt that it would be improper for Canada as a sovereign nation to permit unrestricted use in peacetime of facilities in Canadian territory for these operations, even on assurance of notification in advance of use.

6. The above observations apply particularly to the storage of fissionable components on Canadian territory, to the overflight of Canadian territory by planes carrying fissionable components, and to strikes from bases in Canada. These are matters on which it is felt the Canadian Government should be consulted in each case at the highest political level. The channel for such matters should be civil rather than military. The normal procedure would be for the State Department to make its request to you, and for this request, on receipt here, to be relayed at once to the Minister or the Prime Minister. (I shall write you separately suggesting a procedure for assuring security and speed).

7. Emergency situations may be envisaged when the utmost speed in dealing with a request would be required, but I do not think the procedure suggested would mean any more delay than if the request were forwarded through military channels. I cannot quite foresee the Government being prepared to authorize the military authorities here to decide on such a request. There should be no more delay in getting a decision from the Ministers if a request were to come through diplomatic channels than if it were to come through military channels.

8. Arrangements could, I think, be made for handling other than the above matters on a Service-to-Service basis. I have in mind such matters as training programmes, the provision of storage facilities, the deployment of aircraft, and even such matters as movement and storage of bombs without fissionable components. Having agreed to facilities in Canada for the Strategic Air Command and having agreed to the division of responsibility under NATO, which leaves responsibility for strategic air operations to the United States, I do not see any objection to purely Service questions such as the above being settled directly between the RCAF and the USAF at whatever level they agree upon.

9. In conclusion, should the United States wish to proceed with negotiations for a canopy agreement, I suggest the agreement should be placed squarely upon agreed arrangements under the North Atlantic Treaty. A reference might be written into the introductory part of the United States Note to our common obligations under the Treaty, to the special responsibility of the United States for strategic air operations, and to the agreement of Treaty nations through the Council Deputies that member nations should agree to give immediate and special attention to the granting to the United States of appropriate facilities for fulfillment of its responsibilities (Document DD/183).† I am not suggesting that the text of the Note need refer to this Document or quote its language, but that it should reflect agreed North Atlantic policies under which both the Canadian and United States Government would be acting.

10. I suggest that you present these views orally to the State Department. We have tried our hands at a redraft of their proposed Note enclosed in your letter No. 19 of January 3, but with unsatisfactory results. In any case it is perhaps preferable to let them do their own redrafting in the light of our comments, should they wish to proceed with the proposed note.

UNITED STATES STRATEGIC AIR COMMAND PROJECTS

1. On receipt of your two letters, I arranged for Mr. Arneson of the State Department to receive your comments orally from Mr. Ignatieff and myself.

2. I explained that it was recognized that the United States has responsibility under North Atlantic Treaty arrangements for strategic air operations and that the Canadian Government would not wish to hinder the fulfilment of these responsibilities. We could not agree, however, to permit unrestricted use in peacetime of the facilities in Canadian territory by giving approval for all such activities in advance subject to Service notification. Preparatory arrangements which the Strategic Air Command might undertake in Canada and which would not involve the use of fissionable materials, such as training programmes, provision of storage facilities and the deployment of aircraft, as well as the movement of non-nuclear components, might be handled on a Service-to-Service basis. On the other hand, for any activity which involved the movement, storage or use of fissionable components or the nuclear core of atomic weapons, it was our view that the Canadian Government should be consulted in each case at the highest political level, and that the channel should be civil rather than military. Arrangements would have to be made to permit such consultation to take place at very short notice in the event of an emergency. If the U.S. authorities wished to proceed with negotiations for a canopy agreement, it was our view that the terms of the agreement should be placed squarely within the framework of the North Atlantic Treaty. I also drew Mr. Arneson's attention to the agreement concerning the channels of communication between the United States and Canadian Governments on defence matters, which is set forth in Appendix No. 3 of the Journal of the P.J.B.D. for June 3rd and 4th, 1948.[27]

3. Mr. Arneson made notes of the points which I had made and said that he would first consult Mr. H. Freeman Matthews, Deputy Under-Secretary of State, who is conversant with this problem; he will also probably later consult Mr. Acheson and officials of the Defence Department. Mention was made of the possibility of a meeting between Canadian and United States representatives on a high level, including Mr. Pearson and Mr. Acheson as well as representatives of the Chiefs of Staff of both countries, as a prelude to any agreement.

4. Mr. Arneson fully recognized the risk of a misunderstanding arising between the United States, Canada and the United Kingdom as to the nature of the commitment which has been given by President Truman for consultation in advance of the use of the atomic bomb. He said that agreement on this point was the real key to the whole question. It appears, however, that since Mr. Attlee's visit further consultations with the British have reduced the risk of misunderstandings on the lines mentioned in my Letter No. 764 of March 3rd.

5. He said that whatever more extensive verbal assurance may have been given by President Truman to Mr. Attlee had been superseded by the communiqué issued at the conclusion of these talks.[28] The United States Government has committed itself only to consultation (as you note in your letter) "on the developing international situation and the military measures which it called for, rather than upon the use, in a particular situation, of atomic or any other kind of weapons". Mr. Acheson's assurance to the Joint Congressional Committee was accurate, and no commitment has been undertaken by Mr. Truman which would bind the United States Government to consult with any foreign government before the President decides upon the use of the atomic bomb. Mr. Acheson, however, in his talk with the Joint Congressional Committee had not touched upon the question of consent for the use of facilities in foreign territory for the employment of atomic weapons.

6. Mr. Arneson also recalled the procedure which has been laid down before a decision is made by the President to deploy or to use both nuclear and non-nuclear components of atomic weapons. A separate decision is required in each case and this decision is made upon the advice of the Secretaries of State and of Defense, as well as the Chairman of the Atomic Energy Commission. These three meet as a committee of the National Security Council. So far no decision has been made by the President to deploy any nuclear components of atomic weapons except for tests. The custodian of all nuclear components is, of course, the United States Atomic Energy Commission.

7. The United States Government has committed itself only to consult with Canada and the United Kingdom on the circumstances in which the atomic weapons might be used. Following the Attlee-Truman talks, further discussions took place in Washington when Air Marshal Slessor visited Washington last January. A main purpose of this visit was to find out from the U.S. Joint Chiefs of Staff what their strategic plan was for the use of the bases in the United Kingdom of the Strategic Air Command. The U.S. authorities gave Slessor their general ideas on strategic deployment and possible use of these bases, but apparently did not express any specific views on the possible use of atomic weapons. Informal consultations have continued through meetings in the State Department between Sir Oliver Franks, General Bradley, and Messrs. Matthews and Nitze. They again have been concerned with the strategic circumstances which might give occasion for the use of atomic weapons, especially the political and military situation in Eastern Europe and the Middle East. There has been no definition forthcoming from the U.S. side of the conditions in which the atomic bomb would probably be employed. Mr. Nitze has been under instructions to make it clear that the United States Government could not agree to any definition of the word "consultation" which would enable the United Kingdom Government to withhold consent to the employment of atomic weapons.

8. Thus the arrangements which exist between the United States and the United Kingdom Government apparently boil down to an agreement to have continuing consultations on the circumstances which might give rise to the employment of the atomic weapon. The United States has clearly reserved the sole right to decide upon the use of the atomic bomb, particularly in the event of an attack upon the United States.

9. Some thought has been given to the possibility of defining more clearly the circumstances in which atomic weapons might be used. Mr. Arneson said that he had tried to work out some consistent criteria. Apart from coming to very general conclusions such as that atomic weapons should be used only in the event of a general war, he had found it impossible to establish any criteria which could be applicable to all cases. Indeed, considering that the value of the atomic bomb as a deterrent rests partly on the uncertainties in any potential aggressor's mind as to how, when or whether it could be used, any definition of the occasions for its employment would remove some of the deterrent value. Mr. Arneson's preliminary conclusion was that it could be said almost with certainty that any attack upon the United States or another NATO country would result in retaliatory action by the United States with atomic weapons.

10. In concluding our conversation, Mr. Arneson explained why the United States Government attaches prime importance to the use of Goose Bay by the Strategic Air Command. It was possible, in the event of an emergency, that nuclear components would not have been deployed to Strategic Air Command bases in the United Kingdom or to other strategic locations along the periphery of the probable targets. If such deployment had not taken place, the United States Government would wish to use Goose Bay as the base from which initial strikes against the enemy would take place. As the take-off of the heavy aircraft employed consumes large quantities of fuel, their fuel supply would have to be replenished in the air by tanker aircraft. A bomber laden with an atomic weapon would take off at Goose Bay and refill its tanks over Harmon Field, or possibly another field in Newfoundland, before proceeding on its mission. On completion of its mission it would seek to land in the United Kingdom or at some base in the European theatre. In the event that nuclear components had been deployed overseas in advance of the emergency, Goose Bay would be regarded as an important staging area in the movement of aircraft of the Strategic Air Command to and from more advanced bases.

11. Do you think that it would be unreasonable for the Canadian Government to give prior consent in advance to strikes with atomic weapons from Goose Bay or Harmon Field in the event of a clearly-established Soviet air attack on North American territory, subject to as much prior notification as might be possible in the circumstances? It seems to me that we could not reasonably refuse our agreement to the use in such conditions of Canadian facilities or airspace, and that we would in fact be anxious to see a counter-offensive undertaken with the minimum of delay. Furthermore, we might find in such an event that wire communication between Washington and Ottawa was severed and that it would take some time to discover alternative means of communication. If this concession were made, it might be easier for the United States Government to agree to our desire for political consultation before the use of Canadian territory for the delivery of atomic weapons in circumstances not involving a direct attack on North American territory.

12. I shall be sending you a further report as soon as Mr. Arneson informs us of the preliminary reaction of the United States Government to your comments.

UNITED STATES STRATEGIC AIR COMMAND PROJECTS

1. Mr. Arneson came to the Embassy on Thursday, April 12th, to tell Mr. Ignatieff and myself about Mr. Acheson's reactions to your preliminary comments on the proposed "canopy" agreement. He said that Mr. Matthews, Deputy Under-Secretary of State, and Mr. Nitze, Director of the Planning Staff in the State Department, had been present when he had reported to Mr. Acheson.

2. After informing Mr. Acheson of the points made in your Letter No. D-1407 of April 2nd, he had repeated to Mr. Acheson the comments which he had made to me on the meaning and extent of consultation envisaged in the Truman-Attlee communiqué as it is understood by the United States Government. Mr. Acheson had approved his interpretation as given to us last Saturday.

3. I learned from Mr. Arneson that Mr. Acheson was visited earlier this week by Sir Oliver Franks, who wished to have an informal talk with him on the same question. Sir Oliver had brought with him an appreciation by the United Kingdom Chiefs of Staff of the various circumstances which might give rise to consideration of the use of atomic weapons. He had said that the United Kingdom Government fully recognized that there was a wide variation in the shades of meaning which could be ascribed to the term "consultation"; he realized that the U.S. Government could not accept a definition "at the extreme end of the spectrum" which would always involve obtaining consent from the U.K. Government before atomic weapons were used. Sir Oliver had wondered whether it would be possible to work out some clarification of the circumstances in which atomic weapons might be used. Mr. Acheson had told him that it would be difficult for the U.S. Government to adopt any rigid definition of these circumstances, and had gone on to suggest that the most useful way in which progress could be made was to continue on a regular basis the consultations which had already begun between Sir Oliver and Mr. Nitze (in which General Bradley has participated from time to time) on the developing international situation and on the conditions which might lead to a general war. Mr. Acheson had recognized that it would be difficult to arrive at a joint agreed appreciation of every situation examined, but thought that such continuing consultation, carried on through the diplomatic channel and aided with such military advice as might be appropriate, would result in a common understanding of international dangers as they arise. They would also provide a means of giving prior notification to the United Kingdom of any circumstances which might give rise to the use of atomic weapons by the United States.

4. Mr. Arneson said that Mr. Acheson had instructed him to offer to us informally the same arrangement as had been offered to the United Kingdom. As to the method of consultation, Mr. Arneson suggested that there might be periodic meetings between Mr. Nitze and myself, at which General Bradley or others might at times be present. These meetings could be arranged on a tripartite basis, but difficulties might be foreseen with the French Government, and possibly with other signatories of the North Atlantic Treaty, should it become known that such consultations were being carried on between the U.K., the U.S. and Canada. Mr. Arneson therefore suggested that it might be better if there were two sets of bilateral consultations of a continuing nature. Mr. Acheson would like to have our reaction to this proposal.

5. I asked Mr. Arneson how this proposal was related to the proposed "canopy" agreement; consultations on worldwide politico-strategic issues might fulfil the agreement to keep Canada as well as the United Kingdom "at all times informed of developments" which might "call for the use of the atomic bomb", but they would not cover the use of Canadian territory for specific activities in connection with the possible delivery of atomic weapons. Mr. Arneson replied that the United States authorities would still prefer to have an agreement which would permit the United States Air Force to do specific things in certain emergency situations, such as the employment by the Strategic Air Command of the facilities at Goose Bay, subject to prior notification of actual use and subject also to the continuing consultation on the developing international situation.

6. As to the different circumstances which might give rise to the use of atomic weapons, Mr. Arneson pointed out that in the event of a direct attack on any part of the North American Continent it would almost certainly be necessary for the President to order immediate retaliation. I think that we must foresee the possibility of communications being interrupted between Ottawa and Washington under the most extreme conditions of direct attack on this continent. It may therefore be necessary to agree, in advance, that in such an event immediate retaliation on the part of the United States would be justified for the purposes of self-defence under the North Atlantic Treaty or the Charter of the United Nations.

7. Mr. Arneson remarked that the British Government was interested rather in the conditions giving rise to the use of atomic weapons than in the bases from which the first atomic strikes were delivered. It was possible that the first strikes would be by carrier-borne aircraft.

8. Mr. Arneson also touched upon the question of the deployment of nuclear and non-nuclear components of atomic weapons. It could be expected that the Strategic Air Command may wish to deploy to Goose Bay non-nuclear components, i.e., the weapon without its nuclear core, as had been done last summer. He asked what procedure we would wish to be followed. I suggested that pending a more general agreement such requests should be submitted through me by the State Department, in sufficient time to enable Ministers to give the matter proper consideration. He said that the possibility should not be overlooked that the Strategic Air Command might also have to deploy nuclear cores in advance of any decision for their use. He explained that constant attention was required to keep atomic bombs in readiness for use because of the electrical equipment powered by batteries which is an essential part of the mechanism. The fitting of the nuclear cores is a comparatively simple operation which would be done at the last moment. (It was actually done in the air after take-off in the case of the first bomb dropped at Hiroshima.) It was possible that the nuclear cores might not be distributed to bases such as those at Goose Bay and in the United Kingdom in advance of a decision to employ the weapons; on the other hand, it might be thought desirable to have enough material on the spot to enable the weapons to be completed without awaiting the arrival of cores from the United States. He proposes to have further discussions with the U.S. Air Force and others on this question.

9. In conclusion Mr. Arneson proposed that we continue an exchange of views on these issues through the same channels. He repeated his hope that the lack of a general covering agreement would not impede the execution of any arrangements that might be desired by the Strategic Air Command, with of course the approval of the President, to deploy to Goose Bay atomic weapons without the fissionable elements. I mentioned to him that I had heard that the U.S. Air Force desired to secure facilities for use in the event of war at Torbay and Gander in addition to the facilities at Goose and Harmon Field. He proposes to find out from the Air Force whether their desire to have access to these fields is related to the use of atomic weapons.

10. The main point on which I should like your views as soon as possible is whether it is agreed that I should participate in continuing consultations of the character outlined in paragraphs 3 and 4 of this letter. If these consultations were to be conducted frankly and freely, they should provide a valuable additional source of information on the world situation and the policies of the United States, and I believe that we could avoid any risk that they would give rise to a belief in Washington that the Canadian Government was accepting implicit military commitments through them. I should also like to be able to inform Mr. Arneson that we are prepared to agree that suitable Service channels should be used to clear the deployment to Goose Bay of atomic weapons without nuclear components and similar arrangements, such as the over-flight of Canadian territory by aircraft carrying these weapons from the United States to Alaska.

U.S. STRATEGIC AIR COMMAND PROJECTS

1. We have been considering carefully your reports of the reactions of Mr. Acheson and Mr. Arneson to our preliminary comments on the proposed "canopy" agreement.

2. Mr. Acheson's suggestion that there should be regular consultations between Sir Oliver Franks and Mr. Nitze, and his offer to make similar arrangements for you, is a most interesting one. We agree that continuing consultations, such as you describe in paragraphs 3 and 4 of your letter, could provide a valuable additional source of information on the world situation and on the circumstances which might lead to consideration of the use of atomic weapons. You may tell Mr. Acheson that you would be glad to participate. If you think it necessary or desirable, you may indicate that, in authorizing you to attend, the Canadian Government would not, of course, be accepting any implicit commitments of any kind.

3. In reply to Mr. Arneson's enquiry as to whether we think such consultations should be on a bilateral or a trilateral basis, it seems to us there might be advantages in trilateral discussions. As we assume that such consultations would be entirely private and that even the existence of such meetings would not be known to others (such as the French), we would see no reason for asking Mr. Nitze or General Bradley to go over with you separately the same ground as they were covering with Sir Oliver Franks. Furthermore three-way discussions might afford less temptation perhaps to the Americans to discriminate in any way between the information made available to us and that going to the United Kingdom.

4. We should like it to be quite clear that the general discussions Mr. Acheson is proposing would not take the place of, but would be in addition to, the specific consultations outlined in my letter No. D-1407 of April 2. We welcome the opportunity of your having continuing discussions with Mr. Nitze, but we trust that it is understood that we want nevertheless to be consulted (whatever the form of words used) through diplomatic channels at the highest political level on:

(a) possible strikes from bases in Canada;

(b) storage of fissionable components on Canadian territory;

(c) overflight of Canadian territory by planes carrying fissionable components.

5. It may happen, of course, that specific consultations, of the kind mentioned above, would be begun through the same channels as the general consultations proposed by Mr. Acheson. We take it, however, that specific requests through diplomatic channels would normally be addressed to you by Mr. Arneson.

6. We are willing to modify the position set forth in my letter No. D-1407, in the two respects you have recommended. In paragraph 11 of your letter No. 1164, you ask whether we do not think it would be reasonable for the Canadian Government "to give prior consent in advance to strikes with atomic weapons from Goose Bay or Harmon Field in the event of a clearly-established Soviet air attack on North American territory subject to as much prior notification as might be possible in the circumstances." The Minister has discussed this point with the Prime Minister and Mr. Claxton, and it has been agreed that we would not object to immediate retaliation by the U.S. Strategic Air Command with all available means and from all available bases, in the event of a major outright Soviet attack against continental North America. In these circumstances, we would not insist on prior consultation, but would, of course, wish to have as much prior notification as possible, provided communications between Washington and Ottawa had not been severed.

7. You may also inform Mr. Arneson that we are prepared to agree (as an exception to the P.J.B.D. Recommendation of June, 1948) that suitable Service channels should be used to clear the deployment of atomic weapons without fissionable components, to bases in Alaska requiring the overflight of Canadian territory en route. However, as stated in paragraph 4 above, we still expect diplomatic channels to be used for clearing any movement of fissionable components to bases in Canada or over Canadian territory.

8. I hope that you will be able to let us have before long the State Department's comments on the substance of our proposals summarized in Paragraph 4 of this letter, as modified in Paragraphs 6 and 7.

Note du chef de la 1ère Direction de liaison avec la Défense pour le sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

Memorandum from Head, Defence Liaison (1) Division, to Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

TOP SECRET Ottawa, May 16, 1951

U.S. STRATEGIC AIR COMMAND PROJECT

Discussion with Mr. Arneson

1. On his return from visiting Chalk River with the members of the Canadian and United States Sections of the PJBD, Mr. Gordon Arneson visited Ottawa on May 12th in order to discuss with you the stage reached in the State Department's thinking on the proposed "canopy" agreement between the Canadian and United States Governments concerning the use of Canadian bases by the U.S. Strategic Air Command in the deployment of their forces to these bases or over Canadian territory. This memorandum is intended to serve as a record of the discussion which was attended by Mr. Robertson, Mr. MacKay, Mr. Ignatieff and Mr. George.

U.S., U.K. Canadian Co-operation

2. Mr. Arneson began by reviewing the background of the co-operation between the United States, United Kingdom, and Canadian Governments on atomic matters generally. He referred to the "McMahon Act" as the "original sin" which has impeded the kind of co-operation which scientists and many government officials in all three countries know to be both necessary for the best use of scientific research and desirable in the interests of national security in all three countries. A State Department attempt to secure an amendment to the McMahon Act more than a year ago had foundered because, as we could now see by benefit of hind sight,

(a) the U.S. were proposing too tough a bargain for the U.K. Government to accept,

(b) the U.S. Joint Congressional Committee was not prepared to take as broad a view of the national interests of the United States in regard to atomic co-operation as they might have done, and,

(c) the arrest and trial of Fuchs made it politically impossible to propose giving more atomic information to the U.K. at that time.

3. The way may now be clearing, he thought, for a resumption of the Combined Policy Committee talks in a month or so. The U.S. Atomic Energy Commission was the bottle-neck at the moment, but it was expected that they would agree shortly to a proposal initiated by the Defence Department for an amendment to the McMahon Act which would permit the exchange of technical information among the three countries as barter deals made in the interests of the national security of the U.S. at the discretion of the Secretaries of State and Defence, and the Chairman of the Atomic Energy Commission.

Consultation on the World Situation

4. Apart altogether from the fairly good prospects for a successful meeting of the C.P.C., Mr. Arneson said that he hoped we would be able to give Mr. Wrong instructions fairly soon which would permit him to accept Mr. Acheson's request that he take part in consultation with Mr. Paul Nitze and General Bradley. The State Department conceives of these consultations as being held at frequent (rather than at fixed) intervals and absolutely informal in character. When pressed as to the regularity with which such consultations might be held, he said that he thought they should be held at least once a week. It was suggested that, from our point of view, it might be preferable, in order to avoid any unnecessary waste of time involved in briefing the Canadian and United Kingdom Ambassadors separately, to have the discussions on the developing world situation held on a tripartite basis. However, Mr. Arneson feared that if any formal arrangements were made for meetings between representatives of the three countries, they would lose much of their value as purely informal candid exchanges of view. He expressed the hope that the consultations would be a "two-way street" and that Mr. Wrong would say what was in our minds as well as hearing what was in theirs. There was a danger, he thought, that if the talks were to be on a tripartite basis, the two Ambassadors might come with advisors and fixed positions would be taken up by the three governments. What the State Department had in mind was much more informal and flexible and they were inclined to feel that this could be realized best on a bilateral basis. He agreed, however, that if the talks were to commence on a bilateral basis, the possibility of extending them to three-way discussions should not be excluded. On our side, it was agreed that we would not exclude the commencement of bilateral talks on this understanding.

5. Mr. Arneson went on to outline what kind of consultation the State Department had in mind. He said that at long last serious attention was being given in the Departments of State and Defence to an analysis of the world situation in terms of a catalogue listing the critical areas and situations all around the periphery of the Soviet bloc. Headway had already been made in discussions with the United Kingdom representatives on points of friction in Europe, and the State Department had found that the views of the United States and United Kingdom Governments on most of these points were close. No agreement had yet been reached, however, on the cataloguing of Far Eastern points of danger or on what could or should be done about them. We gathered that the United States study of this question is in a very preliminary stage at present. We pointed out that Canadian interests and knowledge were more limited in scope than those of either the United Kingdom or the United States, but we would be glad to discuss these questions with them, on the understanding that we might not, in all cases, have much to contribute.

6. Coming to the particular problem under discussion, of how to deal with the U.S. Strategic Air Command request for the use of facilities in Canada and for permission to overfly Canadian territory, Mr. Arneson said that the State Department's approach to the problem was necessarily conditioned by the constitutional inability of the President to enter into arrangements with any other government which would in effect give another government the right to veto the President's decision to use the bomb. The basic problem is broad terms, as it seemed to the State Department, was of reaching agreement with the United Kingdom and Canadian Governments as to the seriousness of the overall world situation at a given time, rather than one of working out procedures for consultation or notification as to whether the bomb should be used in a given crisis.

7. If the United States, the United Kingdom, and the Canadian Governments had consulted frankly and freely on all possible circumstances which they could foresee in which the bomb might have to be used, the final decision of the United States Government could be taken on very short notice indeed. It might have to be taken while bombs were falling on Washington. Then there would be no question of delay for consultation or even for notification. From this extreme example, the spectrum of possibilities ranged all the way from a direct Soviet attack on a member of the North Atlantic Treaty to an attack by Soviet or satellite forces on United States troops outside the North Atlantic area. As we pointed out, we could not possibly agree in advance to regard any attack, even a direct Soviet attack on U.S. forces outside the North Atlantic area, as necessarily a reason for using atomic bombs. Mr. Arneson made it clear that no such automatic decisions in advance were being contemplated by the U.S. Government.

8. Recognizing frankly that in some cases the U.S. Government would automatically and immediately decide upon retaliation with atomic weapons, Mr. Arneson argued that it would be very difficult to reach an agreement in writing between the two governments as to where the line should be drawn. If we agreed that it was unrealistic to expect even prior notification in the case of an attack on the continental United States, would we be prepared to agree that notification without consultation was sufficient in the case of Soviet attack on a NAT member? — or upon the forces of a member outside the North Atlantic area? Such questions, he realized, were almost impossible for us to answer. He wondered, therefore, if instead of trying to draw up a list of hypothetical contingencies, to which both governments would find it difficult to subscribe, it would not be preferable to proceed by means of frequent informal consultations such as he had described, rather than attempting to negotiate a written agreement.

9. He also questioned the desirability of defining as sharply as our comments on the original U.S. proposals for a "canopy" agreement had indicated, the distinction between the deployment of bombs without nuclear components and the deployment of nuclear components. He explained that, although the decision to deploy nuclear components was set out in U.S. procedure as a separate step (requiring the separate authorization of the President on the recommendation of the Secretaries of State and Defence, and the Chairman of the Atomic Energy Commission), officials in Washington concerned with such matters were coming more and more to the conclusion that the distinction between the deployment of bombs and the deployment of their nuclear components was not a very real one. He thought the military had to be trusted to respect the law that only the President could authorize the use of the bombs and he did not believe it was realistic to suspect that the military would attempt to trespass on this authority. Some people were much too fearful, he thought, about what would happen if the military were given custody of complete bombs which it was very desirable should be dispersed where they could not be knocked out at a single blow. The deployment of nuclear components meant a further state of readiness, and it was in the interests of all that the USSAC should be as ready as possible for any eventuality. Hours might be of great importance in the event of a crisis. He therefore hoped that we would not make too much of the distinction. We pointed out, however, that it nevertheless did represent the penultimate stage in the President's decision to use the bomb and, as such, was of very considerable importance to us as an indication of the seriousness of the situation.

10. Mr. Arneson also asked whether it was our wish that questions of deployment of bombs and overflight of Canadian territory by the SAC should be handled through diplomatic rather than Service channels, to which we replied emphatically in the affirmative. With this he appeared to be quite in agreement.

11. After the conclusion of the meeting with you, Mr. Arneson remarked to the others that he wanted us to know that the State Department was on the same side of the fence as we were — in favour of civil control over the military.

Comment

12. I am inclined to think that we were perhaps led into blurring the distinction between use of Canadian facilities and overflight of Canadian territory and strikes from bases in the U.S. or countries other than Canada.

Rapport d'une réunion

Report of a Meeting

TOP SECRET Ottawa, May 22, 1951

DISCUSSION OF USSAC PROJECTS ON MAY 17
HELD IN THE MINISTER'S OFFICE

On May 17, 1951 a discussion was held in the Minister's office arising from the meeting with Mr. Arneson of the State Department in Mr. Heeney's office on Saturday, May 12. There were present Mr. Pearson, Mr. Wrong, Mr. Robertson, Mr. Heeney, Mr. MacKay, Mr. LePan and Mr. Kirkwood. There were on hand a report on the discussion with Mr. Arneson which had been prepared by Mr. George for the Under-Secretary and also Mr. Ignatieff's notes on the same talk (copies of the latter attached).

New Orientation of U.S. Thinking

2. It was agreed that the most significant feature of what Mr. Arneson had said was the revelation that in Washington it was now assumed that (a) the only prospect of a major war is in the occurrence of open hostilities between the U.S. and the U.S.S.R., (b) such hostilities would inevitably mean a major war, and (c) in the event of such a war the atomic bomb would be used, but only in such an event. The important question now is what circumstances would lead to open hostilities between the U.S. and the U.S.S.R.

3. It was agreed that the Canadian Government must accept the assumption that, in the event of such a major war under the present conditions, the atomic bomb would be used. After discussion it was also agreed that it would be very difficult to challenge this assumption at some future time unless the strategic balance should alter radically in the interim, and probably even in that case.

The Problem for Canada

4. It was agreed that, in view of the foregoing, Canada might still retain a technical right to refuse permission to the U.S. to launch atomic strikes from bases in Canada, but that in fact this right was little more than academic. If a war should break out and the bomb be used, Canada would be fully involved from the outset. Thus our only effective participation in decisions governing the use of the bomb must consist in our exercising what influence we can in discussion of the circumstances leading to the outbreak of war. We can, for instance, state at any particular time that we do not consider the existing circumstances to justify the conclusion that war with the U.S.S.R. is imminent. Even if our conclusion differed from that of the U.S., it might have some deterrent effect.

The Proposal for a "Canopy" Agreement

5. Our letter No. D-1819 of May 4 to Washington made use of the distinction between nuclear and non-nuclear components of the bomb. It was suggested that this distinction is no longer of particular significance, and that in reaching any agreement with the U.S. on paper it should be played down somewhat.

6. It appeared, however, that a more fundamental issue had been brought out in the talk with Mr. Acheson. Under the McMahon Act the President had the ultimate responsibility of deciding on the use of the bomb. The Administration were therefore most unwilling to be put in the position where they would have to say to Congress, if asked, that other governments had to be consulted. On the other hand, the Canadian Government would find it most embarrassing if the U.S. Administration were to say that no other government need be consulted about use of facilities in its territory for atomic strikes. It appeared that this issue was sufficient to prevent any formal agreement about consultations prior to use of facilities in Canada in terms which would be acceptable to both parties. For this reason Mr. Arneson, in effect, had suggested that the idea of a formal "canopy" agreement be abandoned and that the informal arrangements for discussions on the developing international situation should serve in practice at least to keep the Canadian Government fully abreast of developments which might lead to a decision to use the bomb.

7. It was mentioned in passing that our proposal to grant prior authority for atomic retaliation against a direct attack on North America, intended to be helpful, served merely to point up the fact that we were not prepared to give blanket prior approval.

8. It was agreed, finally, that we should work for an agreed record of the discussion with Mr. Arneson, covering in some detail the proposals for political discussion and its relation to the question of the use of the bomb. We should attempt in addition to reach a specific agreement on the procedure to be followed in connection with the clearance of the S.A.C. activities on and over Canadian territory, to ensure in particular that arrangements should be made through diplomatic channels for movements of both nuclear and non-nuclear components of atomic bombs. Our assurance that the USSAC would in fact comply with the terms of such an agreement must rest on the fact that under United States law any deployment of nuclear components (and, in practice, of non-nuclear components as well) must be authorized by the President on the advice of the Secretaries of State and Defence and the Chairman of the Atomic Energy Commission. Hence there was little risk of any such movements occurring without the knowledge of the State Department.

9. While we would not insist on consultation for overflight of Canadian territory in training exercises and non-emergency deployment, the fact that such notice must be given through the diplomatic channel would permit us, if we are really kept informed about the U.S. appreciation of the strategic and political circumstances, to answer requests for clearance in a manner which compelled consultation.

Routine Procedure

10. It was recognized that under the circumstances outlined we would be responsible for suggesting a procedure for obtaining rapid clearance. It was proposed that Mr. Pearson should write Mr. Claxton suggesting a direct channel for clearance between this Department and the Chief of Air Staff (to be used of course only for the technical aspects of the clearance and not the political), in order to avoid the loss of time involved in communicating through the Chiefs of Staff Organization to the Chief of Air Staff.

Political Discussions

11. Mr. Ignatieff, who had spoken to Mr. Arneson since the talk on Saturday, May 12, expected the State Department to take the initiative in opening talks with Mr. Wrong next week. There was some discussion of the conditions of Mr. Wrong's participation.

12. While it was considered desirable that the talks should be tripartite, rather than two separate series of bilateral discussions involving in the one case Sir Oliver Franks and in the other Mr. Wrong with representatives of the U.S. Government, it was recognized that Mr. Arneson had been given to understand that we were prepared, initially at least, to accept the United States' preference for separate bilateral discussions.

13. There was some discussion as to the probable nature of the talks. One suggestion was that they should constitute political consultation at a very senior and confidential level between close allies on any matters of major concern. On the other hand, it was pointed out that in fact our admission to these talks rested on our special position in atomic energy matters, and that if the content of the talks strayed too far from such matters then the U.S. would rapidly come to regard them as a formality as far as Canada was concerned, although the talks with the U.K. might serve a genuine and important purpose. It was agreed that Mr. Wrong should attempt to strike a note somewhere between these two extremes, so that the talks would rest rather more than indirectly on Canada's position in atomic matters but not entirely on that position. It was mentioned that Mr. Arneson's suggestions had pointed toward an arrangement that should be as flexible as possible, and on the whole this would appear to serve our purpose.

Summary of Discussion Concerning Political Talks

14. Mr. Wrong asked for explicit answers to certain questions that would serve to guide him on his return to Washington. It was agreed:

(i) that he should accept an invitation to participate in talks such as had been proposed, and

(ii) that his acceptance could precede any further exchange of paper with U.S. authorities.

The suggestion concerning the emphasis which Mr. Wrong should seek to achieve in these talks (see para. 13 above) was re-iterated, and it was added

(iii) that we want through these talks to learn of the political and strategic circumstances which would lead (as indicated in paras. 2, 3 and 4 above) to the use of the bomb. It was recognized that such information might not be the prime object of the U.K. representative in these talks.

15. Finally, it was agreed

(iv) that the question of a procedural agreement to govern deployment, training etc. was entirely separate from participation in the talks and would be followed up by separate negotiations to be initiated in Ottawa.

CONSULTATIONS ON THE WORLD SITUATION

1. The first of the meetings at the Department of State on developments in the world situation which might lead to the use of atomic weapons took place yesterday afternoon with the Secretary of State presiding. Mr. Paul Nitze, Director of the Policy Planning Staff, did most of the talking. Mr. Freeman Matthews, Deputy Under-Secretary of State, and Mr. Gordon Arneson, Special Assistant on Atomic Questions, were also present. Mr. Ignatieff accompanied me to the meeting, and he has prepared at my request a full record of the proceedings, of which I enclose three copies.

2. There is little for me to add to the contents of the enclosure. Mr. Nitze had with him a fairly lengthy paper to which he referred, but there was no suggestion that a copy should be given to me. I gather that in the parallel discussions with the British Ambassador Sir Oliver Franks has been guided by a paper approved by the British Chiefs of Staff and the responsible Ministers, but has not given a copy of the paper to the State Department.

3. Mr. Nitze at one point remarked that there was not as yet a complete agreement between the Department of Defense and the State Department on the contents of the paper to which he was referring, but that he hoped that agreement would be reached shortly. The intention is before long to bring General Bradley and perhaps General Vandenberg directly into these discussions. So far there have only been two meetings with the British Ambassador, which, according to Mr. Nitze, covered much the same ground as that covered yesterday with me. In neither of these meetings have the Joint Chiefs of Staff been directly represented.

4. In order to make good use of the opportunities offered by these consultations it is very desirable that I should receive as promptly as possible comments, even though they may be of a very preliminary character, on my reports of the meetings and suggestions about questions which might profitably be raised. The general tenor of the opinions expressed yesterday was to the effect that atomic weapons should only be employed in the event of a general war against the Soviet Union, that they should be immediately employed if such a war were to take place, and that the real problem for consideration revolved around the identification of circumstances at certain points around the periphery of the Soviet Union as being the opening stages of a general war. I should appreciate receiving your early comments on this thesis, which is, of course, amplified in the enclosed memorandum.

5. It will, I think, be necessary for me to receive with as little delay as possible the appreciations produced in Ottawa which bear on the main topic, and also such related papers as would aim me in bringing out particular issues. For example, I do not know how much information is available to the Canadian Government on the estimated capacity of the atomic installations in the Soviet Union, the possible production rate of atomic weapons there, and the capability of the Soviet Airforce to deliver these weapons, and I should welcome the prompt receipt of anything you may have on this topic at once. It is clearly of substantial importance in considering the rapidity with which atomic weapons should be employed in certain circumstances against the Soviet Union, and it therefore affects such issues as the period available for consultation between governments before the use of atomic weapons is authorized.

6. You will note that Mr. Acheson expressed himself as disinclined at present to put these consultations on a tripartite basis. The only argument which he used was the risk of some knowledge that they were taking place reaching the French authorities and the resentment which they would feel if the procedure became known to them. He remarked that he was having a great deal of trouble on this score already. I am satisfied that the meetings would be more productive if they were placed on a tripartite basis. I am thinking of talking the matter over fully with the British Ambassador.

Memorandum by Ambassador in United States

RECORD OF THE FIRST MEETING OF CONSULTATION TO ASSESS THE WORLD SITUATION AND THE RISK OF WAR, MAY 25, 1951

Arising out of the informal discussions which have taken place between the State Department and the Canadian Embassy in Washington with regard to U.S. Strategic Air Command projects affecting Canada, the first preliminary meeting of consultation to assess the world situation and the circumstances which might give rise to war and the use of atomic weapons took place at the State Department on Friday, May 25, 1951. Those present on the United States side were:

The Hon. Dean Acheson, Secretary of State,
Mr. Freeman Matthews, Deputy Under-Secretary of State,
Mr. Paul Nitze, Director of Policy Planning Staff, and Mr. R. Gordon Arneson, Special Assistant on Atomic Energy Matters, and on the Canadian side:

The Ambassador and
Mr. G. Ignatieff.

2. The talks opened with a brief discussion on procedure. Mr. Wrong explained that it had been agreed that he should participate in these continuing consultations on an informal basis. He would have preferred that they take place trilaterally, with the British Ambassador present, and that they should be frequent. He assumed that the talks would take place within the framework of the responsibilities assumed by the United States for the strategic air offensive of the North Atlantic Treaty military plans and the arrangements for tripartite collaboration in the field of atomic energy between Canada, the United Kingdom, and the United States. Mr. Acheson said that he would prefer to keep the arrangements for consultation as flexible as possible and for the time being at least to regard these talks as informal meetings between himself and members of his staff and the Ambassadors of Canada and the United Kingdom respectively and not to make them trilateral meetings, which might be misunderstood by other governments, particularly the French. The meetings would take place frequently and would provide the opportunity to inform the Canadian Government of the development of thought in the United States Government on the world situation and the risks of war as well as the attitude of the United States to specific problems which might result in general war.

3. Mr. Acheson then asked Mr. Nitze, as a basis for further discussion, to outline the general approach which the State Department contemplated in these consultations. Mr. Nitze then outlined the State Department thinking under two main heads:

(a) general assumptions, and

(b) assessment of risks of war in relation to specific areas on the periphery of the U.S.S.R.

(1) General Assumptions

4. The first general assumption was that these consultations would be addressed to consideration of the circumstances which might result in a state of general war rather than to the question as to whether atomic weapons should be used or not, since it could be assumed that atomic weapons would not normally be used except in a state of general war. It could also be assumed that in the event that there were a general state of war, atomic weapons would be used.

5. It would also be necessary to assume that the U.S.S.R. had at its disposal atomic weapons and was therefore capable of taking offensive or retaliatory action against the United States and its allies. It was recognized, therefore, that the decision to use atomic weapons by the United States would involve the risk of retaliatory action by the Soviet Union.

6. It would be necessary to have general public support and understanding of the necessity of using atomic weapons among the peoples of the United States and its allies. The Soviet Government was doing its best to try to confuse the understanding of these issues by false appeal to the moral aspects of the problem and by demanding the outright prohibition of the use of atomic weapons through such propaganda devices as the Stockholm Peace Appeal. It was suggested that in relation to this aspect of the problem the Resolution of the General Assembly of November 23, 1949, should be accepted as a rejection of the Soviet thesis on atomic weapons.

7. The United States Government cannot enter into arrangements with any other government which would in effect give another government the right to veto the President's decision to use atomic weapons. Before taking a decision, the President would seek the advice of the U.S. Joint Chiefs of Staff on the military aspects of the problem as well as the advice of the Secretary of State, the Secretary of Defense, and the Chairman of the United States Atomic Energy Commission. At the conclusion of his talks with Mr. Attlee, President Truman had publicly declared his intention to consult with the United Kingdom Prime Minister on conditions which might give rise to the use of atomic weapons. A similar understanding had been extended to the Canadian Government. These understandings were premised on a realization of the extent to which the interests of the three countries were interlocked in the issues of war and peace and that the security of one could not be jeopardized without bringing into jeopardy the safety of the others.

8. It was recognized also that the principal effect of atomic weapons is its deterrent influence. The Soviet Government was fully aware of the consequences which would flow from the outbreak of general war, and this knowledge had an impact upon its policies. The question had to be considered, however, as to whether this deterrent effect could best be utilized by the making of a diplomatic ultimatum to the Soviet Government in any given circumstance or whether it were better to rely upon a more indirect warning of the type issued by the Secretary of State in relation to Yugoslavia in his reference to endangering "the fabric of world peace". (The Secretary of State expressed the opinion on this point that the United States political system did not lend itself readily to the use of ultimata, but consideration might have to be given in a specific instance to more precise warnings to the Soviet Government through diplomatic channels.)

9. Finally, it could be assumed that the U.S.S.R., if contemplating general war, would try to put the onus for the initial use of atomic weapons upon the United States and its allies. At the same time it could be assumed that the Soviet Union would be prompt in using atomic weapons, explaining such use to their own public and to the peoples of the world as a measure of retaliation. It was therefore particularly important that there should be consultations with the Canadian Government of the kind now contemplated, since the circumstances which might give rise to the use of atomic weapons might vary from cases of clear and outright aggression by Soviet forces to the less clear-out or "grey areas" of diplomatic pressure, Communist subversion, or indirect aggression through the use of satellite forces.

(b) Assessment of Risks of War in Relation to Specific Areas on the Periphery of the U.S.S.R.

10. Mr. Nitze suggested that it might be useful to make a brief tour d'horizon of the periphery of the Soviet Union, area by area, as a basis for considering the kind of situations which might have to be considered by the United States as casus belli against the Soviet Union.

North Atlantic Treaty Area

11. In the event of a massive attack by Soviet forces against any country signatory to the North Atlantic Treaty, the situation would be relatively clear, namely, the United States would have to consider this situation as a casus belli. This would include massed attack against ground forces, or aircraft of any of the occupation forces in Germany. It was recognized that the implications of the statement issued by the Foreign Ministers of France, the United Kingdom and the United States after their meeting in New York on September 19th as it relates to the defence of Western Germany and Berlin required clarification. This is the statement which includes the sentence: "They will treat any attack against the Federal Republic or Berlin from any quarter as an attack upon themselves". It was also recognized that there were some marginal cases in the North Atlantic Treaty area which would require clarification, such as an attack upon Finnmark or the Island of Bornholm in the Baltic.

Finland

12. An attack upon Finland by the Soviet Union would have to be considered on its merits. The United States had no outstanding obligation in regard to the security of Finland and no automatic casus belli would be involved.

Yugoslavia, Greece, and Turkey

13. The general approach to these countries is that these areas cannot be permitted to be taken over by the Soviet Union without gravest consequences to the security of the members of the North Atlantic Treaty. In the case of Yugoslavia and Greece, the attack, if it came, would probably be of satellite origin rather than from the Soviet Union itself. At the present time the United States and United Kingdom Governments are of the opinion that such an attack could not be allowed to succeed without some intervention on their part, but an effort would be made to try to localize the fighting to the country attacked as well as to the country of the attacker. Unless the Soviet Union were itself to intervene openly, efforts would be made to prevent the resulting situation leading to general war. In other words, no automatic casus belli would follow a satellite attack on Greece or Yugoslavia and every effort would be made to prevent the situation from deteriorating by the taking of prompt action in support of the attacked countries. Atomic weapons could no doubt be used in their deterrent effect in diplomatic representations to the Soviet Union. The case of Turkey was rather different, since none of the Communist satellite states had sufficient resources to attack Turkey without the overt support of the Soviet Union. An attack on Turkey therefore would, in the opinion of the State Department, gravely present the United States and its allies with a possible casus belli leading to general war.

Iran

14. While so far the United States has not contemplated this area in terms of a possible casus belli with the Soviet Union, it is recognized that a military situation might develop in this area in which the risk of general war would have to be faced. For instance, if the United Kingdom Government were to become involved in local hostilities in the protection of British lives, and if this were followed by overt Soviet intervention, it might be necessary for the United States to react in a military way to prevent the destruction of British forces by Soviet military action. It was recognized that the defeat of the United States and Great Britain in Iran by Soviet military action could have very serious consequences to the security of the Middle East generally.

Afghanistan

15. This has not been considered as an area which might involve a casus belli.

India and Pakistan and South and Southeast Asia

16. These countries and this area generally were not at present regarded as involving the risk of Russian military effort. Chinese Communist interests are more likely to be predominant, and the risks of general war resulting from a possible Soviet intervention are not considered as substantial.

Japan and Korea

17. The overt use of force by the Soviet Union in the area of Korea or Japan would directly involve the Soviet Union with the armed forces of the United States. It would therefore be necessary to assume that in the event the Soviet Union directly intervened with military force in this area, the Soviet Government was prepared to accept the consequences of general war. It would be necessary, therefore, for the United States to consider taking immediate retaliatory action. (It was for this reason, observed Mr. Acheson, that the consequences of General MacArthur's proposals for more direct military pressure upon the mainland of China were so replete with danger.)

Attack on American Forces

18. Mr. Acheson remarked on this point that if the Soviet Union were prepared to authorize any attack on American forces, they must be aware of the dangers of immediate retaliation. It must be assumed, therefore, that if American forces were attacked by Soviet armed forces, it would be on a substantial scale and with the knowledge that this would almost certainly involve taking the risk of precipitating a general war. The reaction in the United States would have to be vigorous, not only locally, but centrally, against the Soviet Government. Developing this thought a little more precisely, Mr. Arneson observed that the first aim of the United States in the event of a general war would be to strike at targets in the Soviet Union which were being used or were capable of being used for the delivery of atomic weapons against the United States and its allies.

19. In concluding his presentation, Mr. Nitze said that in preparing this assessment of the risks of war the State Department had to take into consideration not only the capabilities of the Soviet Union and its satellites, but also their intentions. More information was available on their capabilities than on their intentions. For a study of Soviet intentions the State Department had to rely upon such unsatisfactory material as the statements of Soviet leaders, such as Malenkov's address of a year and a half ago when he indicated that it was the Soviet intention to "unify Korea", to overthrow Tito, and to establish Berlin as the centre of a unified Germany.

20. Mr. Acheson invited Canadian comments on the views put forward by Mr. Nitze. He expressed the hope that the consultations would result in an exchange of views. Mr. Nitze observed that the views which he had put forward had not yet been checked in detail with the Department of Defense and that he hoped to be able to do this before the next meeting. The Canadian Ambassador said that he would report the substance of the State Department's views and hoped to have some comments and questions to put at the next meeting. While no date was set for the next meeting, it was understood that the consultations would take place at regular intervals, not more than two weeks apart. Mr. Acheson and Mr. Nitze emphasized the desire of the State Department that the greatest security precautions should attach to these talks. In so far as the State Department was concerned, only Mr. Acheson, Mr. Freeman Matthews, Mr. Paul Nitze, and Mr. Arneson would participate in the consultations, and General Bradley would be invited to participate from the Department of Defense. Mr. Wrong replied that the importance of security precautions was fully appreciated on the Canadian side and that, in addition to himself, only Mr. W.D. Matthews and Mr. Ignatieff would be aware of the talks, and the Ambassador's secretary.

21. After the meeting, Mr. Arneson said that he had made a verbal report to Mr. Lovett, the Deputy Secretary of Defense, on the results of his conversation in Ottawa in regard to U.S. Strategic Air Command projects. Mr. Lovett had expressed himself as entirely satisfied with the arrangements now contemplated for continuing consultations on the world situation and the circumstances which might give rise to the use of atomic weapons. He was also satisfied with the suggestion that the diplomatic channel should be used for individual requests concerning the deployment by the U.S. Strategic Air Command of materials or aircraft to bases in Canada or over Canadian territory. Mr. Arneson said that the Secretary of State would like to be able to write a letter to Mr. Lovett to confirm the informal arrangements agreed with the Canadian Government so that the Department of Defense would have the same understanding of these arrangements as the Department of State.

LETTER WISER NO. 2 Washington, May 26, 1951

U.S. STRATEGIC AIR COMMAND PROJECTS

1. At the meeting on May 17th which I attended in Mr. Pearson's office Mr. Pearson expressed his desire that the arrangements which had been discussed in Ottawa with Mr. Arneson a few days before should be recorded in some form of written understanding with the Department of State. The State Department itself is also anxious that this should be done, and considers it necessary that a reply should be sent by the Secretary of State to the Secretary of Defence to the letter from the latter enclosing the document entitled "Proposed Substance of a Communication with the Canadian Government" (i.e. the suggested canopy agreement), which was enclosed with my letter no. 19 of January 3rd. Mr. Arneson yesterday suggested that we might informally agree on the terms of such a letter, which we would send to the State Department; its acknowledgement would constitute a record of the understanding.

2. I told Mr. Arneson that I thought that this procedure would be acceptable but that I was not in a position to discuss a draft with him until I received some written guidance based on the discussion in Mr. Pearson's office. As you mentioned that such guidance would be furnished, I assume that I should receive it very shortly.

3. Mr. Arneson also said that he had seen Mr. Lovett last week at Mr. Acheson's request, and had gone over with him the tentative basis for an understanding which was arrived at during Mr. Arneson's visit to Ottawa (see in particular the record made by Mr. Ignatieff dated May 15th of this meeting, of which I left a copy in Ottawa). Mr. Lovett had received these suggestions cordially, saying that he quite understood the difficulties of the Canadian Government in making specific arrangements on the lines of the proposed canopy agreement and that he was quite prepared to accept the suggestion that particular clearances involving the deployment, etc., of atomic weapons to, through or over Canadian territory should be arranged through diplomatic rather than service channels. Mr. Lovett also cordially subscribed to the idea of continuing consultations on circumstances which might give rise to general war, with the Canadian as well as with the British Government.

4. Mr. Arneson mentioned another good reason for having some record of our understanding on paper, as the proposed exchange of letters would set out not only the arrangements arrived at with the State Department but also the arrangements between the State and Defence Departments, and would therefore reduce the chances of misconceptions, particularly in the United States Air Force.

TELEGRAM WA-2338 Washington, June 1, 1951

TOP SECRET. PERSONAL.

Following for Heeney from Wrong, Begins: My Letter Wiser No. 2 of May 26th, U.S. Strategic Air Command projects.

1. In order to assist in getting some agreed record of the procedure of consultation and notification, I drafted a letter to the Secretary of State and asked Ignatieff to show it to Arneson for comments before submitting it to you for the Minister's approval. Arneson suggested a few changes and asked for a chance to discuss it with others before I took it up with Ottawa. My letter was concerned wholly with the procedural arrangements for consultations and for dealing with requests to use Canadian territory in connection with the deployment of atomic weapons.

2. Arneson came to see me yesterday, after talking the matter over with Freeman Matthews and Perkins. We found that his position had changed somewhat from that described in my Letter No. 1951 [Wiser No. 2]. His main concern was that the Defense Department would be upset if, as a result of discussions with the Canadian Government which have now been going on for five months, all that could be told them by the State Department in reply to their proposal for a "canopy" agreement was that some new procedural arrangements had been brought into effect which fell far short of their desire to secure a specific understanding covering future activities. He asked whether it might be possible for the State Department in replying to the Defense Department to indicate the probable attitude of the Canadian Government in the various circumstances which might involve the use of Canadian territory in connection with atomic weapons.

3. I told him that I was not impressed by this argument. We were setting up procedures which had as a principal object a continuing review of developments throughout the world which might give rise to general war. While it was to be hoped that as a consequence the two governments would tend to draw similar conclusions, we could not now assume that this would be the case, as this would be to anticipate the possible results of consultations which had just been inaugurated. All that had been agreed up to now was in the realm of procedure. If the State Department thought it necessary to say more than this to the Defense Department, it would have to do it on its own responsibility and not on the basis of any assurance from the Canadian Government.

4. Mr. Arneson then reverted to an early suggestion (rather on the lines of the "canopy" agreement) that Canada might agree in advance to the use of Canadian territory for the deployment in peace-time of atomic weapons subject only to notification in each case. He said that such deployment was necessary to utilize the deterrent effect of these weapons and that a very clear distinction would be maintained by the U.S. Government between their deployment and their use for actual strikes. I said that if notification was to be regarded as involving agreement by the Canadian Government in each case, this might well be acceptable, but if so, it hardly constituted any change in present arrangements.

5. Mr. Arneson then raised the necessity of having any written record, stating that so far as he knew there was no written understanding with the British Government either about political consultations or about deployment of the weapons to U.K. bases. I answered that I did not consider Canada was in the same position as the United Kingdom and, in any event, the view was taken in Ottawa that there were substantial advantages in having an agreed record of the procedures which were being followed. I added that I thought unimportant the form in which the record was made; I had put it in a draft letter to the Secretary of State as this would be a normal form, but it would be satisfactory if an unsigned minute setting forth the agreed procedures could be placed on the files in Washington and Ottawa.

6. Arneson thought this suggestion might be acceptable to the State Department. The Department of Defence could then be informed of the procedural arrangements set forth in the minute and the Secretary of State could supplement this with an explanation of the results which he hoped to achieve. He agreed with my remark that the senior civilian officials concerned in the Department of Defense, General Marshall, Mr. Lovett, and Mr. Finletter, would understand the position of the Canadian Government, but he was doubtful about the effect on some of the generals. I suspect that General LeMay of the S.A.C. is constantly urging that he be given a freer hand.

7. It was left that I should submit to you a draft minute for consideration in Ottawa and that on receipt of your comments there should be a further discussion with Arneson. He agreed that the language used in the draft minute might follow that employed in my draft of a letter to Mr. Acheson. I shall submit a draft in a following teletype.

8. In the course of this discussion I referred again to the possibility of placing the consultations on a tripartite basis, on the ground that this ought to lead to better understanding by all three governments and therefore increase the chances of rapid concerted action in case of need. I told him that we would wish to complete the triangle by consultation with the United Kingdom if separate bilateral discussions with the United States were continued.

9. Since he did not raise any objection, I have now discussed these matters with Sir Oliver Franks. I find that the British Government is concerned for reasons parallel with out own, i.e., on general grounds because of the consequences of the use of atomic weapons by the United States anywhere, and on particular grounds because of the facilities in the United Kingdom of the Strategic Air Command and the need for ensuring that these facilities are not employed for strikes without the approval of the Cabinet. There has been no written agreement on procedure, but Franks expects one to be prepared before long, and he will be discussing this in London later this month. Franks and I agree that we should keep in contact on these matters. Ends.

TELEGRAM WA-2342 Washington, June 1, 1951

TOP SECRET. PERSONAL.

Following for Heeney from Wrong, Begins: My message WA-2338 of June 1st, para. 7. U.S. Strategic Air Command Projects.

1. There follows a suggested draft minute recording the arrangements for consultation and notification. The introductory paragraphs have not been shown to Arneson. The numbered sub-paragraphs have been seen by him and the last sentence of sub-paragraph 1 has been inserted at his instigation. He attaches some importance to it. I think it advisable to get this matter tidied up and hope you may be able to send me comments early next week.

2. The following is the draft text:

"In the communiqué issued on December 8th at the conclusion of the talks between Prime Minister Attlee and Mr. Truman, the President stated that "it was his hope that world conditions would never call for the use of the atomic bomb". The communiqué continued: "The President told the Prime Minister that it was also his desire to keep the Prime Minister at all times informed of developments which might bring about a change in the situation". The State Department informed the Canadian Embassy on December 9th that the Canadian Government was in this respect in the same position as the United Kingdom Government.

Discussions have also taken place between the two governments as a result of the desire of the United States Air Force to make use of Canadian territory for the deployment, etc., of atomic weapons, and the following procedural arrangements have been put into effect:

(1) Frequent consultations shall take place in Washington between the Canadian Ambassador and the Secretary of State and such other officers of the United States Government as may be designated by him. The purpose of these consultations is to exchange views on developments in the world situation which might call for the use of atomic weapons. The consultations are informal and exploratory and are not to be regarded as involving or implying any commitment on the part of either government as to the action it will take or the position it will adopt in particular circumstances yet to arise. It would be the hope that by such consultations it will be possible to arrive at common appreciations of situations which may call for the use of atomic weapons.

(2) Requests of the Government of the United States for permission to make use of facilities in Canadian territory for the deployment of atomic weapons (both without and with their nuclear components), or to overfly Canadian territory with such weapons, are to be addressed to the Canadian Government by the Department of State through the Canadian Embassy in Washington, and the reply of the Canadian Government is to be routed through the same channels. As much advance notification as possible will be given by the Government of the United States, and on its part the Government of Canada will seek to answer such requests promptly.

(3) These arrangements shall be regarded as subject to modification by mutual consent at any time." Message Ends.

LETTER NO. 1 Ottawa, June 11, 1951

Dear Hume [Wrong],

Attached for your consideration are two letters and a number of other documents, dealing with various aspects of the special consultations which you have recently undertaken.

It has been decided that this subject will be given special treatment, with none of the material being recorded in the departmental filing system and with a system of special arrangements for the transmission and storage of the documents. The code word which we have chosen for this subject, which you will notice precedes the security grading on this and the attached documents, is the word "Wiser". We shall send you detailed instructions in a day or two for the handling of Wiser material, and this note is merely to explain why the word appears and to suggest that henceforth you apply it to your communications on the subject. We suggest your series of Wiser No. Letters should begin with your two letters of May 26th.

We intend that the word shall be used on telegrams as well as letters, and should be regarded as an identifying code name rather than a specific security classification.

Yours sincerely,

Dear Hume [Wrong],

The attached letter to you is in the name of the Minister but signed by me because of Mr. Pearson's absence today in Chicago and our desire to get all of these papers off to you by this afternoon's bag.

The Minister has, however, been over all of these points with us at length and I thought it better therefore to let you have them in time, rather than to wait for his signature to the covering letter.

Yours sincerely,

LETTER NO. 3 Ottawa, June 11, 1951

Dear Mr. Wrong,

I am enclosing a paper which has been prepared in the Department for your background instruction in the next of the informal discussions with the State Department on the circumstances which may give rise to war and the use of atomic weapons. I have approved the general line taken in this paper which, as you will see, deals both with the statement of general assumptions put forward by the State Department and with the particular questions which you have raised and which flow from the first set of discussions. I have, however, certain general comments to make on the contents of this paper for your guidance.

(a) Negotiation

I do not think we shall get far by raising the general question as to whether the U.S. would be willing in certain circumstances to make a further attempt at negotiations with the U.S.S.R. I dare say that the reply of the State Department would be that, of course they were always ready for negotiation should circumstances be propitious. Nor do I think you should raise the question of the grounds for the failure of the Deputies of the Council of Foreign Ministers to reach an agreement. While I agree that it is hard to explain the irreconcilable attitude which the U.S. has taken up to the inclusion of the North Atlantic Treaty in the agenda of the Council of Foreign Ministers Meeting, I think the prestige of the Western Governments is now too deeply involved over this matter to allow them to give way. In any case, it is too late in my opinion to raise this matter now.

On the other hand, I attach importance to the suggestion that you might probe the current views of the State Department about the desirability or otherwise of renewing negotiations with the Russians on atomic energy as soon as the strength of the North Atlantic countries in conventional armaments has risen appreciably. I am enclosing a copy of Mr. LePan's memorandum to which reference is made and which will be useful to you in raising this matter. I myself feel that the U.S. is not so anxious as it was three years ago to work for a system of international inspection and control of atomic energy. Indeed, I got this impression quite strongly when I was at the General Assembly last year and the subject was under discussion. If this is the case, it would be useful for us to know their present views. It is becoming increasingly difficult simultaneously to accept the strategic doctrine that nothing should be done to hamper the use of atomic weapons since they are the most effective deterrent against Soviet aggression and at the same time to reiterate our attachment to the plan for the inspection and control of atomic energy adopted by the U.N. Assembly in November 1948. The two arguments are not necessarily inconsistent but they easily tend to become so.

(b) The Imminence of War

This raises the whole question of how far the Soviet Union are likely to be influenced by actions on the part of the Western Powers which they may think provocative. It is probable that the Soviet Government are acting on a long-term plan from which they will not easily be diverted by passing or local considerations. But it is possible that the timetable for the implementation of such a plan might be affected by actions which the Soviet Union regarded as provocative. In general, I should like to know how near the U.S. Government have come to accepting the doctrine of the inevitability of war with the Soviet Union. They seem to be moving in that direction. In addition to the section of the general paper which deals with this subject, I am also enclosing a brief further memorandum prepared by the Chairman of the Joint Intelligence Committee.

(c) Consultation Prior to the Use of Atomic Weapons

I am telegraphing you separately on this subject insofar as it affects our position regarding prior consultation before a strike launched from Canadian territory. The arguments set forth under this heading in the enclosed paper reflect the background of our thinking here on this subject. It may be, of course, that your informal talks with the State Department will develop so as to keep us very much up-to-date on any circumstance in which the U.S. might be prepared to launch a bomb. In that case, the question of last moment consultation or notification before the bomb is launched from a Canadian base would become less important as we should have had an opportunity to express our views in these discussions. It is always possible, however, that the discussions will decline in importance as time goes on. We might then be left in a position in which our only opportunity to put forward our views would arise as a result of our maintaining our position that we must be notified. At any rate, for obvious political reasons, it would be impossible for us to abandon that position. If the original attack did result from a Soviet attack on a North Atlantic country, no real problem would arise for us. If, on the other hand, it resulted from a U.S. assessment that the Soviet Union was going to begin a war in some area in which Canada has no treaty obligations, it would be a different matter. I suppose that at the present time the most likely case might arise if the Soviet Government intervened militarily in Korea and if the U.S. decided that this intervention was important enough in scale to herald a general war and that, therefore, they should launch an atomic attack on the Soviet Union. However, I think it would be both difficult and invidious to draw up categories of hypothetical situations in which we should or should not require previous consultation but rather that we should take our general stand on the necessity for consultation before an atomic attack is launched from Canadian bases.

(d) The Employment of Atomic Weapons

I think under this heading the questions raised in the enclosed paper might be tactfully explored with the State Department.

(e) Warnings to the Soviet Union

I am not too clear as what the Secretary of State had in mind when he said that consideration might have to be given in a specific instance to more precise warnings to the Soviet Government through diplomatic channels. Did he mean something between the type of statement which he issued in relation to Yugoslavia and an ultimatum to the Soviet Government? In general, I think that the policy of naming areas in advance as areas in which Soviet aggression would be regarded as a casus belli is a pretty dangerous one. The U.S., the U.K. and France have already in their public statement of September 19 announced that Berlin was such an area and they did this without any prior consultation with their North Atlantic Treaty partners. How do we know that they will not do it on the same basis again?

It is obvious that these discussions with the State Department may become extremely important. Indeed, the first in the series threw a good deal of light on

State Department thinking. I fully agree with you they would be more valuable still if they were on a tripartite basis, with the U.K. included.

Yours sincerely,
A.D.P. HEENEY

Note du sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures pour le secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

Memorandum from Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to Secretary of State for External Affairs

DOCUMENT NO. 1 [Ottawa], June 8, 1951

The first of the informal discussions between the State Department and our Embassy in Washington on May 26 on the circumstances which might give rise to war and the use of atomic weapons opened with a statement of certain general assumptions put forward by the State Department. In continuing these discussions, it may be appropriate to take up and discuss with the State Department several of these assumptions and to examine more closely, together with the State Department, the reasoning on which they are founded.

(a) Negotiation

It is perhaps noteworthy that in the State Department review of the world situation, the possibility of negotiation with the Soviet Union is not treated. It might be desirable to ask Mr. Wrong to raise this question with the State Department. Obviously, the present moment is not a propitious one for fruitful negotiation. On the other hand, it might be as well to get from the State Department an assurance that their eventual object was the negotiation of outstanding differences with the U.S.S.R.

Mr. LePan in a memorandum to you of May 30 has raised this question in connection with atomic energy negotiations and has suggested that we might probe the current views of the State Department about the desirability or otherwise of renewing negotiations with the Russians on atomic energy as soon as the strength of the North Atlantic Treaty countries in the conventional arms has risen appreciably. The prospects of a meeting of the Council of Foreign Ministers (at present extremely dim) is another aspect of this general question of negotiation. Mr. Wrong might be asked to obtain an appreciation from the State Department of the prospects of a meeting of the Council of Foreign Ministers, and failing such a meeting what attitude they take towards the possibility of a further attempt at negotiation when the military position of the West is stronger. The apparent cause of the present deadlock over the meeting of the Council of Foreign Ministers is the insistence of the Soviet Government that the North Atlantic Treaty and the question of U.S.

bases should be placed on the agenda of the Council for discussion. It is not altogether clear to us why the United States has been so insistent on excluding the North Atlantic Treaty from the agenda. If we consider that the Treaty is justified as a defensive alliance and is in conformity with the United Nations Charter, it is not easy to see why we should not be willing to defend it on these grounds at a meeting of the Council of Foreign Ministers. It is true that this will give the Soviet Union an opportunity to use the Council as a platform for attacking the Treaty. It would also, however, give the Western Powers an opportunity to defend it.

In general our object in raising the question of negotiation as our eventual objective would be to see that this positive aim should not be lost sight of in a fatalistic acceptance of the inevitability of war.

(b) The Imminence of War

There seems to be an underlying assumption in the State Department's thinking about the imminence of war that all the initiative in actions which might lead to a general war lies in the hands of the Soviet Union. On this assumption, the Soviet Union would be proceeding on a long term plan of aggression and the only question is when, in terms of this plan, the Soviet Union may decide to make war. This thesis leaves out of account the possible effect on the Soviet Union of actions on the part of Western Powers which may seem to them to be provocative. We have seen the effects of the same kind of thinking in the Far East, where the United States proceeded on the assumption that an advance up to the Yalu River would not provoke a Chinese reaction. There may be dangers in other areas of the world in this way of thinking. For example, it is quite possible that the inclusion of Turkey in the North Atlantic Treaty, especially if U.S. air bases were established on Turkish soil, might genuinely appear to the Soviet Government to be provocative and, if so, would increase the danger of war. Yet this consideration seems to have received scant attention from the U.S. Government in assessing the advantages and disadvantages of including Turkey in the North Atlantic Treaty. Similarly, of course, there may be occasions when gestures which seem to the Russians to be appeasement, may stimulate their aggressive propensities.

(c) Consultation Prior to the Use of Atomic Weapons

The State Department at the first of these meetings stated that the U.S. could not enter into arrangements with any other government which would in effect give another government the right to veto the President's decision to use atomic weapons. On the other hand, they reaffirmed President Truman's public declaration of his intention to consult with the United Kingdom and Canadian Governments on conditions which might give rise to the use of atomic weapons. It seems apparent that the U.S. tend to regard the present series of conversations as taking the place of procedures for consultation or notification as to whether the bomb should be used in a given crisis. Indeed, Mr. Arneson, in his conversations here on May 16, said: "The basic problem in broad terms, as it seemed to the State Department, was of reaching agreement with the United Kingdom and Canadian Governments as to the seriousness of the overall world situation at a given time rather than one of working out procedures for consultation or notification as to whether the bomb should be used in a given crisis." Our own attitude towards this question seems to have undergone some modification. On May 4, 1951, we instructed the Canadian Ambassador in Washington as follows: "We welcome the opportunity of your having continued discussions with Mr. Nitze but we trust that it is understood that we want nevertheless to be consulted (whatever the form of words used) through diplomatic channels at the highest political level on: (a) possible strikes from bases in Canada; (b) storage of fissionable components on Canadian territory; (c) overflight of Canadian territory by planes carrying fissionable components." On the other hand, after Mr. Arneson's visit, at the meeting held in your office on May 17, it was agreed that "Canada might still retain a technical right to refuse permission to the U.S. to launch atomic strikes from bases in Canada, but that, in fact, this right was little more than academic. If a war should break out and the bomb be used, Canada would be fully involved from the outset. Thus our only effective participation in decisions governing the use of the bomb must consist in our exercising what influence we can in discussion of the circumstances leading to the outbreak of war."

The original U.S. position was that they were prepared to notify us before a strike from Canadian bases with the exception that certain circumstances might conceivably make it impossible to do so. While they have not formally receded from this position, they have, as already indicated, made it increasingly clear that they hope that the present series of conversations may take the place of procedures for notification. It is pretty apparent that they would not agree to any prior formal obligation to consult us before the bomb was launched from Canadian bases. This does not necessarily imply that we should abandon our position of standing out for prior notification, nor, it is suggested, might the benefits of such prior notification necessarily be purely "academic". Much would depend, of course, on whether notification was interpreted by the U.S. as a last moment notice which gave us no opportunity to comment or whether they were willing and able to give us time, however short, in which to formulate our comments. In the latter case, of course, notification would merge into consultation. This seems the goal to be aimed at. A practical example may demonstrate the advantages which might result from our point of view. The U.S. would, in all probability, regard open and substantial intervention in the Korean war or against Japan as grounds for launching the atomic bomb. They might decide to launch an attack at once on Moscow. If they could be induced to accept an obligation to notify us in advance before a strike from Canadian bases, we might have a final opportunity to make our views known. It is not suggested that we could prevent the U.S. from taking such action, in all probability we should not wish to do so. We might, however, be able to put certain considerations before them which might conceivably affect their decision. We have seen so many examples of glaring contrasts between U.S. and U.K. intelligence appreciations in the course of the Korean war and we have so frequently found ourselves in closer agreement with the U.K. than with the U.S. appreciation that we have become more than a little sceptical about some of the information on which the U.S. Government sometimes proposes to act. For example, in the case referred to above, the U.S. might consider that they had proof of the "open and substantial" character of Soviet intervention in the Korean war and hence decide to launch the atomic bomb. On the other hand, our information might not agree with theirs and a last moment opportunity to put the facts as we saw them before Washington might be important. Similarly, there might be occasions when we wished to call to the attention of the U.S. before the bomb was launched some political consideration to which we felt they were not giving sufficient attention. This, of course, would in effect be consultation, although the U.S. could not in advance accept it as such.

We have been informed by the State Department that owing to the President's responsibility under the McMahon Act for deciding on the use of the bomb, they would be most unwilling to be put in the position where they would have to say to Congress, if asked, that other governments had to be consulted. This position is quite comprehensible. It does not, however, necessarily appear to prevent the U.S. from accepting an obligation to notify the Canadian Government before strikes are made from Canadian bases. It may be that there has been some blurring of the distinction between the use of Canadian facilities and strikes from bases in the U.S. The same question may arise in connection with the U.K. and it is to be noted that the U.K. Government are concerned that the facilities in the U.K. of the Strategic Air Command should not be employed for strikes without the approval of the U.K. Cabinet.

It would seem undesirable to abandon our position with regard to prior notification, both on grounds of national sovereignty and of the possible practical benefits suggested above. If this is agreed, Mr. Wrong might be asked to put forward our position at the next meeting with the State Department without, however, making it appear we are taking up an uncooperative attitude which might interfere with the continued consultation with the State Department on the circumstances relating to the outbreak of war which may well prove in practice our best and perhaps only opportunity to make our views known.

(d) The Employment of Atomic Weapons

Mr. Wrong has put three general questions arising out of the first discussion held with the State Department on the use of atomic weapons. They are as follows:

1. Should atomic weapons be employed only in the event of war with the Soviet Union? The answer to this clearly appears to be "yes".

2. Should the Washington consultations, therefore, be chiefly concerned with the circumstances which might result in war with the Soviet Union? The answer again would appear to be "yes".

3. In the event of war with the Soviet Union, should atomic weapons be immediately employed?

It would probably be difficult to answer this question except in the affirmative. We know that the U.S. would be very nearly certain to employ them from the outbreak of a general war, at least one occurring during the next few years. Any suggestion on our part that we doubt the wisdom of accepting this principle in advance might arouse unjustified suspicions in the U.S. concerning our whole attitude, but this is to some extent a question begging a question. It all depends on what one means by "in the event of war". A case might arise, as has already been suggested, in which the U.S. regarded Soviet intervention in some area as substantial enough to warrant the interpretation that the Soviet Union was embarking on a general war and hence that an atomic attack on the Soviet Union should immediately be launched. Some of her Allies might not agree with the U.S. interpretation of Soviet action. It is this kind of situation which might raise real difficulties and which makes one hesitate to agree in advance that "in the event of war" an atomic attack should at once be launched on the Soviet Union. It would be difficult, however, for Mr. Wrong to voice this kind of doubt in discussions with the State Department. He might, however, draw a distinction between acts of war or aggression against third parties (which might not indicate that the Soviet Union had commenced a general war) and hostilities against North Atlantic countries. We can only hope that by full preliminary discussion with the State Department on circumstances which might give rise to war with the Soviet Union it will be possible for us to examine the situation. The fact must be faced that should the U.S. decide to use the bomb, we should be fully involved from the outset.

(e) Warnings to the Soviet Union

We should agree with the conclusion arising out of the first discussion with the State Department that the real problem for consideration revolves around the identification of circumstances at certain points around the periphery of the Soviet Union as the opening stages of a general war. This in turn raises another question which was put by Mr. Nitze when he enquired whether the deterrent effect of atomic weapons could best be utilized by a diplomatic ultimatum to the Soviet Government in any given circumstance or whether it was better to rely on a more indirect warning of the type issued by the Secretary of State in relation to Yugoslavia in his reference to endangering the "fabric of world peace". In this instance, it appears that the attitude of the Canadian Government might be similar to that expressed by the Secretary of State, who intervened at this point in the discussions to say that the U.S. political system would not lend itself readily to the use of ultimata but that consideration might have to be given in a specific instance to more precise warnings to the Soviet Government through diplomatic channels. In general, it is felt that an extended policy of naming certain areas (not included in the North Atlantic Treaty) as areas in which Soviet aggression would be regarded as a casus belli might dangerously inflame the international situation.

PARTICULAR QUESTIONS

In addition to the discussion of general assumptions, the State Department has given us its assessment of the risks of war in relation to specific areas on the periphery of the U.S.S.R. The following are preliminary comments on a series of "particular questions" raised by Mr. Wrong in connection with this aspect of the problem.

(1) Berlin and Western Germany

The practical situation is governed by the agreements last fall between the United States, United Kingdom and France. The public announcement on September 19 stated that the three Governments would "treat any attack against the Federal Republic or Berlin from any quarter as an attack upon themselves", leaving no doubt that in such an event the provisions of Article 5 of the North Atlantic Treaty would be invoked. At the same time, it had been agreed secretly to "make clear that the Soviet Union is responsible for any attack upon Berlin or Western Germany by the East German forces inasmuch as they are in occupation of the Eastern Zone". From this it might be inferred that, so far as the United States, United Kingdom and France are concerned, an attack in this area would not only be considered a direct attack upon themselves but would be considered as equivalent to an attack by the U.S.S.R. If this inference is correct, it could probably be assumed that an attack in force by East German forces would be treated as the beginning of a general war.

It is this decision — that the U.S.S.R. would be held responsible for an attack by East German forces — that represents a new element in the situation, and although other NATO members were not asked formally to endorse it, they did not indicate any dissent. (For a detailed analysis, see Departmental Memorandum on "Dangers of the Berlin Situation" dated March 2, 1951, and forwarded to Washington under despatch No. D-1318 of March 24).†

It is noted, however, that Mr. Nitze in discussing the Berlin problem with Mr. Wrong remarked that the public statement of September 19 (regarding the treatment by the Occupying Powers of an attack from any quarter as an attack upon themselves) required further clarification. It would be useful to know what was meant by this remark, since it is not clear from the wording of the secret agreement whether the phrase regarding the "responsibility" of the Soviet Union does, in fact, mean that the U.S. would regard an East German attack as equivalent to a Soviet attack in all respects, and as an automatic casus belli. Mr. Nitze may also have been referring to the question of whether or not it should be made clear to the Soviet Union in advance that it would be held responsible for an East German attack. From our standpoint this is a rather delicate question. While there would be advantages in an advance warning to avoid the danger of a general war resulting from a misunderstanding on the part of the U.S.S.R., it would at the same time eliminate what slight chance there may be left of dealing with the East German forces outside the context of a general war.

(2) Austria

There would appear to be little likelihood of an attack on Austria by satellite forces except in connection with other moves clearly indicating that the general war had begun. There is no equivalent in Austria of East German forces, which could undertake local action on behalf of the U.S.S.R., and in the present circumstances it is not clear what object would be gained by an attack from the outside by other satellites. If such an attack did occur, however, it should probably be dealt with in the light of the immediate situation, with the object of localizing the conflict if possible.

(3) North Atlantic Countries

It is agreed that a massive attack by Soviet forces against any country signatory to the North Atlantic Treaty would have to be considered as a casus belli. It would be useful, however, if Mr. Nitze would develop a little further his remark that there are some marginal cases which would require clarification, such as an attack upon Finnmark or Bornholm. Is the implication that in such marginal cases the loss of the territory concerned to the U.S.S.R. would not be of sufficient strategic importance to the North Atlantic Treaty countries to warrant going to war, or that it is hoped that they could be satisfactorily defended by localized action?

(4) Yugoslavia

It is agreed that in the event of a satellite attack on Yugoslavia, every effort should be made to localize the fighting, while at the same time prompt action should be taken to assist Yugoslavia and avoid its defeat.

(5) Greece

The same general considerations should apply to Greece as to Yugoslavia, modified in practice, of course, by the nature of the association of Greece with NATO.

(6) Turkey

A direct attack on Turkey by Soviet forces would undoubtedly involve a serious risk of general war and the question might be raised as to whether the U.S. have developed their analysis to the point of being able to indicate any circumstances in which an attack on Turkey might not be considered as justifying this assumption. In this connection, however, it would be very helpful to us if the United States could give us their frank reactions to the list of questions on the strategic significance of Turkey prepared in London for submission by the Deputies to the Standing Group (Canada House telegram No. 1375 of June 6, forwarded to Washington under form despatch No. 2168 of June 7).† It is the United States appraisal which is really important, and it might be possible to get a better idea of United States thinking directly through the present consultations with the State Department than in the answers eventually prepared by the Standing Group. In addition, we should be very much interested to obtain a United States appraisal of the degree to which the establishment of bases in Turkey would be considered as provocative by the U.S.S.R. and increase the likelihood of a Soviet attack (or of a Soviet decision to precipitate a general war).

(7) Iran

Although we agree generally with the United States analysis of the possibility that Soviet action might produce a casus belli, a distinction should be made between the results of Soviet occupation and of a Soviet attack on British or United States forces in the area. It is possible that the U.S.S.R. would react to British intervention, for the protection of British lives, by an initially limited intervention involving only the occupation of northern Iran, accompanied by a political campaign designed to create as much internal confusion as possible. In such circumstances every effort should be made to localize the crisis and, if possible, deal with it through the United Nations.

(8) Afghanistan, Pakistan, India, Burma and Indo-China

There do not appear to be any indications at present that these areas are likely to be the early objects of direct Soviet military action, and such threats as have developed or may emerge should be considered in the light of the overall desirability of localizing any conflict if it does not threaten vital strategic interests. In Indo-China, and possibly Burma, the threat lies in overt Chinese intervention and the possible loss of South East Asia as a result. Initial reaction to Chinese intervention would not involve general war, but if the United States were determined to keep the area out of communist control hostilities might be extended to China itself, with consequent risk of Soviet participation. The United States attitude toward the strategic importance of Indo-China and the measures which should be taken in the event of active Chinese intervention is therefore important in connection with any assessment of the danger of hostilities in the area leading to general war.

(9) Korea and Japan

Open and substantial Soviet intervention in Korea would certainly indicate that the U.S.S.R. was prepared to accept the consequences of general war, and would be grounds for considering immediate retaliatory action. An open attack on Japan would provide an even clearer challenge. The question might be raised, however, in connection with Korea, whether "any overt use of force" would necessarily in the United States view call for immediate retaliation "at the centre" simply because this would directly involve the Soviet Union with the forces of the United States. Is it conceivable that in certain circumstances, such as the provision of defensive air cover by the U.S.S.R. for Chinese forces in Korea, it might still be possible to deal with the situation in local terms?

(10) Additional Comments

(a) Attack on United States Forces. While an attack on United States forces by Soviet units may indicate readiness to risk immediate retaliation, this criterion alone may not be sufficient from our point of view to justify the immediate launching of a general war, and could hardly be accepted as automatic justification for counter-attack from Canadian bases. An example might be the case of Formosa, where a Chinese invasion attempt might be assisted by Soviet submarine attacks on the United States Seventh Fleet. The United States forces so involved would be engaged as a result of carrying out a policy for which Canada has not shown any marked enthusiasm. Generally speaking, however, it probably must be accepted that an attack on United States forces would result in immediate retaliation, and for this reason it would probably be preferable if United States forces were not too widely deployed in sensitive (but not vital) areas, such as in enforcing a blockade of the China coast.

(b) Satellite or Soviet Military Action. It would appear from the State Department analysis that a broad distinction is made whereby satellite action is, generally speaking, considered susceptible to "local" treatment while action by Soviet forces implies a readiness to incur retaliation and is therefore considered to involve a strong presumption that the U.S.S.R. is making the first move in a general war. The distinction is not complete, however. East German forces are equated to Soviet forces, and in the case of Finland at least it is suggested that there would be no automatic casus belli since "the United States has no outstanding obligation in regard to the security of Finland." For purposes of clarification it would be useful if this approach could be explained a bit more fully. For instance, does membership in the United Nations constitute an outstanding security obligation in this sense? This might be linked with the question of Finnmark and Bornholm in an effort to find where, from the United States point of view, the line should be drawn in principle between Soviet action which constitutes the opening of general war and that which could be considered "on its merits".

DOCUMENT NO. 2 [Ottawa], May 30, 1951

USE OF ATOMIC WEAPONS

In his numbered letter No. 1940 of May 26, Mr. Wrong asked for comments on his report of the meeting the previous day with Mr. Acheson and Mr. Paul Nitze and for suggestions about questions which might profitably be raised at future meetings. I should like to suggest that Mr. Wrong be asked to discuss the propaganda line which should be used under present circumstances by the Western countries in countering such Soviet manoeuvres as the Stockholm Peace Appeal.[29] The danger of inconsistency on this subject (which has arisen partly, I suspect, as the result of gradual shifts in United States policy) has worried me in preparing material for recent speeches and in answering on your behalf letters from various Communist-front organizations.

2. It would be easy and natural for Mr. Wrong to raise this subject, since it was dealt with by Mr. Nitze when he outlined the State Department's thinking at the meeting on May 25. Paragraph 6 of the record prepared by Mr. Ignatieff reads as follows:

> "It would be necessary to have general public support and understanding of the necessity of using atomic weapons among the peoples of the United States and its allies. The Soviet Government was doing its best to try to confuse the understanding of these issues by false appeal to the moral aspects of the problem and by demanding the outright prohibition of the use of atomic weapons through such propaganda devices as the Stockholm Peace Appeal. It was suggested that in relation to this aspect of the problem the Resolution of the General Assembly of November 23, 1949, should be accepted as a rejection of the Soviet thesis on atomic weapons."

3. I think that we in Ottawa can claim that we have tried to dissipate the confusion which has been created in some quarters in Canada by Soviet-inspired

[29] En mars 1950 à Stockholm au cours de sa troisième réunion, le Comité pour la paix mondiale, lancé par l'Union soviétique, a publié un appel à la renonciation des armes atomiques.
At its third meeting, which was held in March 1950 at Stockholm, the Soviet-inspired World Peace Committee issued an appeal for the renunciation of atomic weapons.

demands for prohibition of the use of atomic weapons. While recognizing the widespread horror with which Canadians would contemplate the use of atomic weapons and while admitting the force of the instinctive feeling that atomic weapons are different in kind from other weapons, you have argued forcibly on a number of occasions against the thesis that atomic weapons must in no circumstances be used. The most recent occasion on which you argued in this way was the speech you delivered in Sudbury on April 20. A copy is attached.[30]

4. Our case against the Stockholm Peace Appeal has hitherto rested on two arguments:

(a) The cardinal crime in international affairs is not the use of atomic weapons, but rather the launching of unprovoked aggression; and

(b) The countries of the West have shown themselves willing to enter into an effective agreement for the inspection and control of atomic energy, whereas the Soviet Union is not willing to do so.

You will see from the paragraph of Mr. Ignatieff's memorandum which I have quoted above that the State Department also seems to rest its case on the second of these two arguments as well as on the first.

5. It is the use of this second argument which, under present circumstances, is creating difficulties. We now believe that the Soviet Union is much more ready to take the risk of precipitating a general war than we had thought before the attack on Korea. We also know that for some time to come the strength of the Soviet Union and its friends and allies in conventional armaments will be much greater than the strength of the North Atlantic allies in similar armaments. Under these circumstances, it is probably inevitable that the United States and its allies should be wary of any developments which might hamper the use of atomic weapons, since for the time being they provide the most effective deterrent against Soviet aggression and offer the firmest hope of victory if war with the Soviet Union should break out in 1951 or 1952.

6. Clearly, however, it is difficult at one and the same time to accept this strategic doctrine and also to reiterate with unqualified conviction our attachment to the plan for the inspection and control of atomic energy which was adopted by the United Nations Assembly in November, 1948. If we believe that at present atomic weapons provide our main bulwark against Soviet aggression, we can hardly in the same breath claim that we want a system of inspection and control which would sterilize the only decisive weapon now in the possession of the West.

7. This apparent discrepancy was pointed out in a letter to you from Dr. Endicott after your speech in Sudbury last April. A copy of his letter† is attached. I think that more skilful drafting on my part would have given him less opening for his attack. It could also be argued in rebuttal of Dr. Endicott's charges that we are profoundly sincere in still supporting the United Nations plan for the international control of atomic energy (even though it would sterilize the one decisive weapon now held by the West), since the conclusion of a satisfactory agreement for the control of atomic energy would so profoundly alter the political atmosphere throughout the world that the danger of war would be greatly reduced.

[30] Voir ministère des Affaires extérieures, Declarations et Discours, 1951, N° 17.
See Department of External Affairs, Statements and Speeches, 1951, No. 17.

8. In the same vein, the Americans are probably sincere in insisting that they still support the plan which was approved by the United Nations in November, 1948. Nevertheless, I suspect that they have decided that it would be unwise to make any statements which might be construed as meaning that international control of atomic energy was still a live issue. If such a decision has been taken, the reasons might be as follows.

(a) In the present state of international relations, it is unrealistic to hope that the Soviet Union would agree to any plan which would also be acceptable to the North Atlantic Treaty countries;

(b) New international negotiations looking towards the control of atomic energy would, of necessity, be protracted. In all probability, they would result in failure, but in the meantime the resolution of Western peoples to resist Soviet encroachments might have been weakened.

In any case, it seems to me that we have very little authentic information about the present attitude of the United States Government towards the control of atomic energy.

9. You will remember that at the meeting of the General Assembly last fall Mr. Vishinsky made some remarks which suggested that Soviet policy in this field was becoming slightly less obdurate. Certainly we were not led to believe that the Soviet Union wanted a genuine system of inspection and control. On the other hand, I think we had the feeling that they had sensed they could offer some minor concessions without running any risk of having them taken up seriously by the Americans, since the Americans had, in fact, retreated somewhat from their previous position on the control of atomic energy. My own view is that the United States Government is not so anxious now as it was three years ago to work for a system of international inspection and control. If that is the case, it would be useful for us to know their present views. At the very least, such knowledge would enable us to trim our propaganda sails more adroitly.

10. This whole question is, of course, of much greater than propaganda importance, although in this memorandum I have concentrated on its propaganda aspects. In a memorandum to you of May 3† (of which a copy is attached), Mr. Heeney suggested that as the strength of the West in conventional arms increases, a point might be reached at which the advantages and disadvantages of using the bomb would be almost equal from a military point of view. If such an appreciation were to become accepted, Mr. Heeney argued, "it would give a new sense of urgency to break the dead-lock in our negotiations with the Russians for the international control of atomic energy". If it were decided to ask Mr. Wrong to raise in the course of these top secret discussions the propaganda difficulty which I have mentioned, he might perhaps also go on to probe the current views in the State Department about the desirability, or otherwise, of renewing negotiations with the Russians on atomic energy as soon as the strength of North Atlantic Treaty countries in conventional arms has risen appreciably.

11. I am sending a copy of this memorandum to Mr. Heeney and to Mr. MacKay.

My dear Hume [Wrong]:

At Mr. Pearson's request, I have prepared an independent record of the meeting which was held at the State Department on 14th June as the second in the series of consultations to assess the world situation and the risk of war. A copy is attached for you and Mr. Ignatieff to see.

I motored down to Dorval airport Sunday evening to see the Minister off and showed him, among other things, a draft of this report which he approved after making a few changes. It should not, of course, for that reason be regarded as having any greater authority or authenticity than the very full and faithful report† which George [Ignatieff] prepared. I have no comments whatsoever to make on his report. It treated in rather somewhat greater detail some subjects which I had rather scamped. Contrariwise, there may be a point or two in the attached record which was treated more briefly in George's. You will find, I think, a very close concordance between the two papers.

Thank you once again for the very pleasant arrangements which were made for us while we were in Washington last week.

Yours sincerely,

DOUG [LEPAN]

Report

WISER—TOP SECRET [Washington], June 14, 1951

REPORT OF THE SECOND MEETING BETWEEN REPRESENTATIVES OF THE CANADIAN AND UNITED STATES GOVERNMENTS TO ASSESS THE WORLD SITUATION AND THE RISK OF WAR, 14TH JUNE, 1951

The meeting, which took place in the office of the Secretary of State, was attended by

Hon. Dean Acheson,
Mr. Freeman Matthews,
Mr. Paul Nitze,

Mr. R. Gordon Arneson for the United States Government, and by Hon. L.B. Pearson, M.P.,
Mr. H.H. Wrong,
Mr. G. Ignatieff,
Mr. D.V. LePan
for the Canadian Government.

Agreed Minute

2. The first matter to be considered was the minute recording the procedure to be followed in dealing with requests from the United States Government for the use of facilities in Canadian territory for the deployment of atomic weapons. Since Mr. Acheson had not yet seen the draft agreed minute, this was read by Mr. Pearson. It was accepted with almost disconcerting speed. As soon as Mr. Pearson had finished reading it, Mr. Acheson said that it seemed satisfactory to him. He then briefly asked his officials present if they had any objection to it and also whether in their opinion it would be necessary for him to clear it either with General Marshall or with the President. When they raised no objection and when Mr. Arneson expressed the opinion that the Secretary of State could approve it on his own authority, it was agreed to. Copies were then handed to the representatives of the State Department. They were not initialled, since it was felt on both sides that the agreement should be made in as informal a way as possible.

3. In explaining in a few sentences the importance which he attached to this document, Mr. Pearson said that the Canadian Government was anxious to provide the facilities on Canadian soil which might be required by the United States Strategic Air Command. It would be politically easier for them to do so if a document existed recording the procedures which were to be followed when requests were made. In this way the authority of the Canadian Government would be maintained over action to be taken from bases in Canada or in the Canadian air space.

4. It should be noted that the agreed minute (a copy of which is attached) incorporates one last-minute amendment of some importance. In the morning before the meeting at the State Department was held, Mr. Pearson suggested that it would be an improvement if the agreed minute included some reference to the responsibilities of the United States Air Force under the North Atlantic Treaty and under mutual defence arrangements between Canada and the United States. The first sentence of the second paragraph was, therefore, amended to read, "Discussions have also taken place between the two Governments as a result of the desire of the United States Air Force in carrying out its responsibilities involving the use of atomic weapons which arise from the North Atlantic Treaty or from mutual defence arrangements between Canada and the United States to make use of facilities in Canadian territory, as outlined in sub-paragraph 2 below". This suggested amendment was tentatively cleared by Mr. Arneson on behalf of the State Department late in the morning and was accepted without comment during the course of the afternoon meeting.

International Control of Atomic Energy

5. After the conclusion of this agreement, the discussion turned to a consideration of the points which had been made by Mr. Nitze and others on behalf of the State Department at the first meeting on 25th May. Mr. Wrong opened this part of the discussion by referring to what Mr. Nitze had said about the necessity for gaining and preserving public support of the use of atomic weapons whenever such action might be necessary. He asked whether there might not seem to be some inconsistency, at least in the public mind, between the contention, on the one hand, that atomic weapons were under present circumstances the chief deterrent against Soviet aggression and would be, if war broke out within the next few years, the chief instrument of victory and, on the other hand, continued advocacy of international inspection and control of atomic energy. What was the present policy of the United States Administration towards international control? Mr. Nitze said that the inconsistency to which Mr. Wrong had referred was more apparent than real. If the Soviet Union were to agree to an adequate system of international control, that agreement would produce such a relaxation of the existing tension and such a change in the Soviet system that many of our present fears would be dissipated. In such a transformed atmosphere, a substantial reduction in other types of Soviet military power might be expected. Mr. Acheson intervened to recall the decision made last fall by the United Nations that the control of atomic energy and the reduction of conventional armaments should now be considered within the same forum. This decision properly reflected, he thought, the way in which the two subjects were bound together and might serve as a useful guide to the best line to take in countering Soviet "peace" propaganda. While accepting what Mr. Acheson and Mr. Nitze had said, Mr. Pearson, nevertheless, thought that no opportunity should be lost of convincing public opinion in the two countries and indeed elsewhere, that the United States and its allies were sincere in advocating international control of atomic energy. Mr. Acheson and his officials agreed — although perhaps somewhat perfunctorily.

Risks of Provoking Soviet Attacks

6. Mr. Wrong then said that in considering the analysis which had been presented at the last meeting by Mr. Nitze, it had seemed to the Canadian authorities that attention had been devoted almost exclusively to provocative acts by the Soviet Union which might precipitate a general war. Was it not possible that some acts by the United States and its allies would seem so provocative to the Soviet Union that war might ensue? Mr. Nitze agreed at once that this was a valid worry. Indeed, they had been considering it in the State Department now for many months. However, it seemed to him that the danger to which Mr. Wrong had referred was intrinsic to the process of building up collective strength to deter Soviet aggression. The signing of the North Atlantic Treaty, in Soviet eyes, might have appeared provocative. Nevertheless, it had been necessary if the nations of the free world were not to remain in a position where they could be conquered almost without a struggle. Some degree of what might seem to the Soviet Union to be provocation was probably inescapable. Mr. Pearson then wondered aloud how menacing the building of United States air bases in Turkey might seem when viewed from the Kremlin. He suggested that while the North Atlantic partners should not be deterred from taking any action which they thought essential to their own security, in every case action should be preceded by calm consideration of how provocative it might seem to Soviet eyes. The consensus of thought on this subject seemed to be summed up by Mr. Pearson when he said, "Although it is necessary to take action which will seem provocative, everything that is done should be done in as unprovocative a manner as possible".

Inevitability of War?

7. Mr. Pearson then went on to expose rather more frankly some of the anxieties current in Canada about the United States. He said that it seemed to him that the impression was growing in Canada, not so much as the result of official statements by members of the United States Administration as for other reasons, that opinion in the United States was hardening in the direction of the inevitability of war with the Soviet Union. There seemed to be a growing feeling that we were aiming to win a war not to prevent one. Mr. Acheson, somewhat surprisingly, agreed that those who had formed this opinion of the state of mind of the United States "had every reason for their impression". At this point in the discussion he showed more feeling than he did at any other. He criticised with some vehemence the unholy alliance between some radio commentators, a number of newspapers and some members of Congress. He mentioned in particular Fulton Lewis, the Chicago Tribune and Senator McCarthy (whom he called a "member of the Fascist wing of the Republican Party") as examples of the faction who were trying to whip up sentiment in favour of war now. He described their activities as "the acme of irresponsibility". On the other hand, he claimed that these apostles of war against the Soviet Union were having little effect on the thinking of most people in the United States. Citing the mail which he himself received, he said that the general tenor of it was, "For God's sake, don't give way to these mad men". Although he was not disposed to minimize the effect General MacArthur was having — in fact, he characterized MacArthur as being "extremely dangerous" — he argued that the great majority of those who were influenced by him were attracted because he seemed to have a panacea for ending the war in Korea rather than because his policy might lead to an immediate show-down. The previous evening he had urged vigorously that he and those associated with him in the State Department, and indeed in the Administration, had never swerved from the objective of deterring the Soviet Union from military aggression. He did not repeat this defence at the afternoon meeting. But he did call for trust in the good sense of the American people. While admitting that there was abundant evidence for the impression that the United States wanted war, he argued that the impression was false. "Those in other countries who think the United States wants war", he repeated, "may have strong reasons for that impression; but the impression is mistaken". As he relapsed into imperturbability, he left the impression that he could not help but think of himself as fighting the powers of darkness in his own country.

Action which would Precipitate a General War

8. Mr. Wrong then proceeded to elicit some clarifications concerning the types of military action which would immediately lead to a general war. In the course of this part of the discussion it became clear that the dominant criterion in the opinion of the State Department is whether or not the military action in question is such as to demonstrate the intention of the Soviet Union to precipitate a general war. Various rules of thumb could be devised in order to test whether or not this was the intention behind any specific military action. But such rules were not absolute and must be applied only in the light of the general criterion. For example, it could be said that, in general, attacks by forces of the Soviet Union would be regarded as casus belli, whereas attacks by satellite forces would not be so regarded. Notwithstanding that, an attack against Berlin by the satellite forces now existing in East Germany would be regarded as a casus belli, as had been decided by the Foreign Ministers of the United States, the United Kingdom and France in September, 1950. The explanation of this seeming inconsistency was that so long as the Soviet Union was occupying the Eastern Zone of Germany, an attack by the Bereitschaften against Berlin could not be launched without the full support of the occupying power. It would, therefore, herald a decision by the Politburo to precipitate a general war and for that reason would be countered by an atomic bombardment of Russian vital points. The application of the underlying criterion would also clarify, Mr. Nitze thought, what had been said at the previous meeting about attacks on the armed forces of the United States anywhere throughout the world. If these attacks were slight in character, a determined effort would be made to disregard them, as had been done on at least one occasion in the past when a plane of the United States Air Force had been shot down in the Baltic. Similarly, attacks against vessels of the United States Navy by the Chinese Communists would in all probability not be regarded as a casus belli. If, on the other hand, submarines from Siberian ports were to attack United States naval vessels that, in all probability, would indicate a decision on the part of the Soviet Union to wage a general war and must, therefore, be met by strong retaliatory action.

Use of Atomic Weapons

9. In a general war with the Soviet Union, retaliatory action would include attacks with atomic weapons, it was agreed. Mr. Pearson and Mr. Wrong enquired whether it was fair to infer that atomic weapons would not be used in a war with China or with the European satellites. Mr. Nitze, with Mr. Acheson's obvious assent, replied that it would be the hope of the United States Government not to use atomic weapons in such a contingency. Certainly, they would not be used at once. But the possibility could not be entirely ruled out that they might have to be used in a war against the satellites, if it seemed possible that their use might defeat the aggression without widening the conflict. This decision, for example, might arise in the case of an attack by the satellites on Yugoslavia. The State Department hoped that in such a contingency the use of atomic weapons could be avoided; but, in Mr. Nitze's words, they did not "wish at this time to foreclose absolutely that possibility". In summary, Mr. Acheson said that, whereas atomic weapons would be used in a general war against the Soviet Union, they would not be used in a war against any of the satellites, except under very special circumstances.

10. Before leaving this subject, Mr. Pearson explicitly expressed the hope that atomic weapons would not be used against China, or indeed anywhere in Asia. This hope was clearly shared by the State Department.

Relations between Peking and Moscow

11. With that agreement, discussion turned to an examination of relations between Peking and Moscow and to the possibility of detaching the Chinese Communists from complete subservience to the Soviet Union. Mr. Acheson confessed that he found this problem baffling and discouraging. On one hand, there certainly were fundamental differences of interest between Peking and Moscow and we must hope that some time, somehow, these fundamental differences would lead to a break. On the other hand, there was no evidence at present that such a development was in the offing. In fact, all the evidence available to the State Department tended in the opposite direction. Those members of the Government in Peking who were thought to be more Chinese than Communist were losing, rather than gaining, influence. Mao Tse-tung and his government seemed to be increasingly out of touch with their indigenous roots in China. They gave more and more the impression of conducting Chinese affairs in the interests of the Soviet Union rather than in the interests of the Chinese people. This trend might be reversed. One must continue to hope so, to hope that the fundamental differences of interest would weaken the axis between Peking and Moscow. But for the present, the tide appeared to be running in the opposite direction. Mr. Acheson had been interested to note the shift in opinion in the United Kingdom on this point. When Mr. Attlee had visited Washington last December, there had been a good deal of talk from the British side of Titoist possibilities in China. The British now realized, he thought, that these hopes had been premature, if not mistaken.

12. Both Mr. Acheson and Mr. Nitze insisted, however, that the State Department was keeping constantly in mind the possibility of a weakening of the tie between Moscow and Peking. This consideration, Mr. Acheson said, had been a secondary reason for rejecting General MacArthur's request that he be permitted to authorize bombing raids over Manchuria. The chief reason, of course, for the Administration's opposition had been that such a course might lead to intervention by the Soviet Union and so to a third world war. But, in addition, they had been apprehensive that it might consolidate support among the Chinese for the Peking regime and for that regime's close dependence on the Soviet Union. Perhaps the most interesting remarks during this part of the discussion were made by Mr. Nitze. He disclosed that he at least was now by no means sure that the bombing of China would strengthen, rather than weaken, the Communist regime. The effect of bombing on opinion in China would depend a great deal on the state of that opinion at the time bombing took place. Certainly a few months ago, and perhaps even today, it could be used by Communist propagandists to whip up fury against "the foreign devils". On the other hand, if, as a result of the losses in Korea, resentment against the Communist regime had become sufficiently deep and widespread, the bombing of Chinese cities might lead to a strong desire to get rid of the present government. Mr. Wrong observed that, even if that were the case, it was difficult to see how that demand could become effective, unless the United States and its allies were prepared to send their armies into China. On that note, which seemed to be widely accepted, the discussion on this subject died away.

Indo-China and Formosa

13. At the previous meeting there had been no detailed consideration of the danger threatening various points along the wide arc from Iran to Korea. Mr. Wrong, therefore, asked about Indo-China. The State Department representatives said that they had no new information of importance. Mr. Wrong then enquired whether they considered Formosa to be of greater strategic importance than Indo-China. Mr. Nitze replied by saying that, if Indo-China fell to the Communists, the loss would certainly be greater than if Formosa fell, since it would almost certainly entail the loss of South-East Asia with its important resources of rice, rubber and tin. On the other hand, he thought that in present circumstances Formosa was of greater strategic importance. The testimony of General Bradley before the Joint Senate Committees had, he thought, described accurately the strategic importance of Formosa. In hostile hands, Formosa would provide a dangerous base for offensive operations in the event of a general war. Its loss would therefore be serious, but not so serious as to jeopardize the whole Pacific defensive system, as General MacArthur had claimed.

Warning against Further Acts of Aggression

14. The discussion of the desirability of giving further warning to the Soviet Union was somewhat inconclusive. Neither Mr. Acheson nor any of his officials had much to add to what they had said on this subject at the first meeting. Mr. Pearson made two comments. He said that it seemed to him that possible acts of aggression against the free world might be divided into four categories:

(a) those which would lead immediately to a general war;

(b) those which might not lead at once to a general war;

(c) those which would be countered by limited military action on the part of the United Nations;

(d) those in areas of such comparatively slight strategic importance that the United Nations, while condemning them, would not be likely to do more than that.

Mr. Pearson also suggested that it might be unwise to attempt to secure the integrity of every last threatened area in the world by issuing specific prior ultimata, since at the end of such a process no room whatsoever might be left for negotiation with the Soviet Union. The importance of this point was admitted by Mr. Acheson and his officials. From this part of the conversations two conclusions seemed to emerge:

(a) that the State Department has not yet sifted to its own satisfaction all the hypothetical acts of aggression against the free world which might lead to hostilities, either limited or unlimited;

(b) that, if it is felt that the present warning to the Soviet Union against further acts of aggression should be reinforced, the course which the United States Government would probably take would be to repeat, and perhaps make more explicit, the general warning issued by President Truman when he said that any further acts of aggression would "endanger the fabric of world peace".

Mr. Acheson pointed out that in warning the Soviet Union and the Balkan satellites of the risk which would be involved of any attack on Yugoslavia, he had used words very similar to those chosen a few weeks previously by the President for his general ultimatum. He also indicated clearly his preference for a general warning against any further acts of aggression, rather than an ultimatum attached to a particular territory, if that could be avoided.

15. Before concluding the appraisal of the world situation, Mr. Pearson asked whether in the view of the State Department any further attacks were imminent. Mr. Freeman Matthews said that from the information available in the State Department, he did not think so. On the other hand, the danger threatening a number of points was serious and, in particular, the build-up of the military forces of the Balkan satellites was highly disturbing.

Master Defence Agreement between Canada and the United States

16. Mr. Pearson also raised with Mr. Acheson the possibility of framing a new master agreement for military co-operation between Canada and the United States. The existing statement of principles had been drawn up in 1947 and, therefore, ante-dated the North Atlantic Treaty and the beginning of the present acceleration of military preparations.[31] A great number of new requests were now being received from the United States. It had proved valuable in the past in Canada to have a set of general principles to which public reference could be made whenever specific arrangements were contemplated or concluded. The statement drawn up in 1947 was now out of date; and it was not certain that a new statement could be devised which would provide cover and sanction for all the multiplicity of defence arrangements between Canada and the United States which might be necessary in the next few years. He hoped, however, that it might prove possible. Mr. Acheson received this suggestion very sympathetically. He said he agreed that such a statement would be useful. If the Canadian authorities would provide examples of some of the proposed arrangements which fell outside the scope of the previous statement of principles, the United States would be willing to co-operate in the attempt to form a new and more comprehensive umbrella. It was generally agreed that this might most appropriately take the form of recommendations by the Permanent Joint Board on Defence.

Military Situation in Korea

17. After a military expert had come in to describe on the map the present military situation in Korea, Mr. Acheson added a few general comments as a result of his conversations with General Marshall since the return from Korea of the Secretary of Defence. General Marshall had been very pleased with the fighting qualities, morale, training and equipment of the 8th Army in Korea. He said that there had never been a better army anywhere. He had interviewed the national commanders of all the forces now brigaded in the 8th Army and had found them, without exception, both keen and content. They were satisfied with the role they were playing and with the correctness of the orders they were receiving. General Marshall felt that there was now no question that the 8th Army could maintain itself in

[31] Voir/See Volume 13, Document 868.

Korea in the face of whatever attacks might be launched. Mr. Acheson also reported what General Marshall had said about the recent defeat of the Chinese Communists. It had been more than a defeat, it had been "a major disaster". Before United States troops had sealed off a serious penetration made by the Chinese Communists into the lines of the Korean forces on the right flank of the line, the mass of the 8th Army had been ordered to attack in the central sector and on the left flank. This counter attack had caught the Chinese and North Korean forces completely off balance and the loss of men, vehicles and equipment had been tremendous. The poor quality of the Chinese prisoners now being captured indicated that progress had been made in destroying the trained fabric of the Chinese Army.

AGREED MINUTE

In the communiqué issued on December 8th at the conclusion of the talks between Prime Minister Attlee and Mr. Truman, the President stated that "it was his hope that world conditions would never call for the use of the atomic bomb". The communiqué continued: "The President told the Prime Minister that it was also his desire to keep the Prime Minister at all times informed of developments which might bring about a change in the situation". The State Department informed the Canadian Embassy on December 9th that the Canadian Government was in this respect in the same position as the United Kingdom Government.

Discussions have also taken place between the two governments as a result of the desire of the United States Air Force, in carrying out its responsibilities involving the use of atomic weapons which arise from the North Atlantic Treaty or from mutual defence arrangements between Canada and the United States, to make use of facilities in Canadian territory as outlined in sub-paragraph (2) below.

In consequence, the following procedural arrangements have been put into effect:

(1) Frequent consultations shall take place in Washington between the Canadian Ambassador and the Secretary of State and such other officers of the United States Government as may be designated by him. The purpose of these consultations is to exchange views on developments in the world situation which might necessitate the use of atomic weapons. The consultations are informal and exploratory and are not to be regarded as involving or implying any commitment on the part of either government as to the action it will take or the position it will adopt in particular circumstances yet to arise. It would be the hope that by such consultations it will be possible to arrive at common appreciations of situations which may necessitate the use of atomic weapons.

(2) Requests of the Government of the United States for permission to make use of facilities in Canadian territory for the deployment of atomic weapons (both without and with their nuclear components) and for the conduct of operations involving the use of such weapons, or to overfly Canadian territory with such weapons, are to be addressed to the Canadian Government by the Department of State through the Canadian Embassy in Washington, and the reply of the Canadian Government is to be routed through the same channels. As much advance notification as possible will be given by the Government of the United States, and on its part the Government of Canada will seek to answer such requests promptly.

(3) These arrangements shall be regarded as subject to modification by mutual consent at any time.

METHODS OF HANDLING U.S. ATOMIC REQUESTS

We agree entirely with your argument that it is necessary to work out in some detail arrangements for rapid and secure communication on Wiser matters between Ottawa and Washington on such a basis that the channels could be opened in case of need at any hour of the night and over weekends and holidays. We also recognize the necessity, related to the minute of June 14 on agreed procedures in these matters, of giving the State Department a sufficiently explicit account of these arrangements to satisfy them that we really are prepared to co-operate. In this letter I shall report what arrangements we have so far made in Ottawa, and shall discuss some of the points (both those mentioned in your letter and others which have occurred to us) on which procedures have yet to be established.

2. It appears to us that the problem has three aspects. The first of these is the establishment of a secure chain of communication for urgent messages which can be made to operate at any time on short notice. By a chain of communication we mean an arrangement for contact between the individual persons who will actually be involved in the transmission of the message. The report in your paragraph 2 that Mr. Arneson or his assistant Mr. Chase will be available at all times to transmit messages to the Canadian Embassy and that provision will be made for having yourself, Mr. Matthews or Mr. Ignatieff always available by telephone is perfectly satisfactory. For our part we propose to draw up a list of officers familiar with the situation of whom at least one will be available by telephone at any time, and we hope to prepare a sort of "duty list" on a weekly or fortnightly basis to indicate which of these officers will be available at a given time. This duty list will be on hand in the Communications office here, and we propose to send you a copy as each new list comes out. As it is unlikely that an urgent message will originate in Ottawa outside of office hours, I do not think you need keep us informed as to which of your officers will be on call at a given time. Any one of our officers will be in a position to receive an urgent message and to ensure that it is brought as rapidly as possible to the attention of the appropriate representative of the Government; this aspect of the question I shall discuss below.

3. Related to the personal chain of communication is what might be termed the mechanical chain. Here we have in mind the provision of qualified teletype operators and of a satisfactory teletype channel. While our own wires are not open on a twenty-four hour basis, emergency use in off hours can very readily be arranged on short notice. Where there is reason to anticipate an urgent message, it would be desirable for the wire to be kept open during whatever period you suggest. I should prefer to rely upon an arrangement for rapid provision of overtime service on our own wire, and shall write you again when we have been able to look into the details of this. We propose a duty list system, similar to that mentioned for officers, to ensure that a teletype operator competent to handle these messages can always be obtained on short notice. Copies of this duty list will be sent to you like the other, and I suggest that when an urgent message is to be sent your teletype operator should telephone the appropriate man on our teletype duty list to warn him of the message and to ask him to get in touch with the political officer on call. It may be that your political officer will also wish to telephone our political officer directly and in a later communication I shall discuss the suggestion in your paragraph 6 of setting up a code which might be used for telephone purposes on this subject.

4. The third aspect of the question, and in many ways the most important, is that of obtaining ministerial consideration of an urgent request. I have discussed this problem with the Prime Minister, and he has instructed me that any such request should at once be brought to his attention; if he is not immediately available it will be communicated at once to the Acting Prime Minister (if any) or the senior Cabinet Minister immediately available in the Ottawa Area. In addition to our own officers, namely myself, Reid, Ritchie, MacKay, Glazebrook, LePan, Collins and Kirkwood, so far involved in the subject, the Prime Minister has designated Mr. Norman Robertson, or failing him Mr. Gordon Robertson of the Privy Council Office and Mr. Pickersgill, or failing him Mr. Ross Martin of the Prime Minister's Office as channels of communication. Simultaneously with the action referred to above we will communicate of course with Mr. Pearson and Mr. Claxton if they are available. Any reply to Washington will of course be communicated through this Department, presumably through the channel by which the request comes in.

5. What I have written is not to be regarded as a fully detailed procedural plan, and is only designed to indicate to you the lines we are working on here and to guide you in conversation with Mr. Arneson. I presume that he will not be concerned particularly with our channels provided he can be assured that they are rapid and secure, but no doubt the State Department is anxious to know exactly what we have in mind as to the procedure for obtaining Government clearance of a request. For the present at least, I think you should say no more than that we have arranged to bring requests immediately to the attention of the Prime Minister or Acting

Prime Minister. If Mr. Arneson is interested, I see no objection to your telling him enough of the proposed arrangements to convince him that they are workable and meet the requirement for urgent and secure communication between Washington and Ottawa with the minimum of delay in cases of extreme necessity.

WISER—TOP SECRET [Washington], July 14, 1951

RECORD OF THE THIRD MEETING BETWEEN REPRESENTATIVES OF THE CANADIAN AND UNITED STATES GOVERNMENTS TO ASSESS THE WORLD SITUATION AND THE RISK OF WAR, FRIDAY, JULY 13TH

The meeting which took place in the office of Mr. Paul Nitze was attended by Mr. Freeman Matthews, Mr. Paul Nitze, Mr. R. Gordon Arneson and Mr. Carl Savage for the United States Government, and by Mr. H.H. Wrong and Mr. G. Ignatieff for the Canadian Government.

1. Constitutional Issues. In opening the discussion Mr. Wrong suggested that it might be desirable to arrive at an understanding in the consultations about the constitutional procedures which would need to be followed in the United States, the United Kingdom and Canada, in the event that it might be necessary to authorize quick retaliatory military action against aggression. A study of this question should reveal the conditions in which delay might be involved because of the limitations, constitutional or conventional, placed upon the executive branch of government within the three countries. Mr. Wrong invited comment as to whether the U.S. representatives regarded this as a relevant topic for discussion.

Mr. Matthews, Mr. Nitze and Mr. Arneson each made comments to the effect that an exchange of views on this question was desirable. Mr. Nitze observed that as far as the United States was concerned, the constitutional problem involved the powers of the Congress to declare war on the one hand and the powers of the President as Commander-in-Chief on the other. The constitutional precedents have been established which would permit the President as Commander-in-Chief of the Forces to authorize measures to be taken against an aggressor, which would in effect result in hostilities taking place even before Congress had given legislative authority for a declaration of war. He asked Mr. Wrong whether he could say what constitutional limits existed in Canada upon the authority of the Government to authorize defensive measures.

Mr. Wrong replied that this was a matter which was currently under consideration by the Canadian authorities. While the ordering of defensive measures and even the declaration of war were in law executive acts, Parliament had the authority to review action taken and to withhold or vote supply; undertakings had also been given about consultation with Parliament in certain circumstances. The possibility of a clarifying statement by the Government on the constitutional issues was being considered, having particular regard to the type of situations which might arise in the implementation of the North Atlantic Treaty.

It was agreed that views should be exchanged at a later meeting on the positions of the Canadian and United States Governments in respect of the constitutional limitations upon the powers of the executive to take military action to resist aggression.

2. Problem of Soviet Intentions in the Light of the Soviet Proposal for a Cease-Fire in Korea. Mr. Wrong next suggested that it might be useful to exchange views on the possible reasons for the Soviet initiative in proposing a cease-fire in Korea. He suggested that an analysis of various hypotheses might throw some light on possible further Soviet moves in the Far East or in other parts of the world, although even tentative conclusions would, at this stage, be little more than guesses. To initiate the discussion, Mr. Wrong suggested that it might be possible to ascribe the Soviet initiative to local considerations concerned with supply problems such as the need for large quantities of Soviet weapons by the Chinese forces, or the cost to the Chinese of the operation in Korea, or the desire to release Chinese forces for activities elsewhere. If local considerations were predominant, would the Soviet initiative seem to confirm the view that pro-Soviet elements are dominant in Peking? Alternatively, might it be a face-saving device adopted by the Chinese in a desire to disengage themselves in Korea? Also what would be the effects upon the prospects of an armistice being arranged, to be followed by a political settlement?

If the Soviet motives on the other hand were thought to be general and related directly to the balance of power in the world, was it the desire of the Soviet Government to extricate themselves from what might in some ways be regarded as the major blunder of Soviet diplomacy since World War 2? Was it not possible that the Soviet Government has realized that as a result of the military venture in Korea their world position has worsened due to the greatly accelerated pace of rearmament among the Western powers? If the Soviet motives were thought to be related to such general considerations, Mr. Wrong asked whether their aim was likely to be a détente with the West, with the stepping up of the Soviet peace campaign in order to retard the pace of Western rearmament. In that event, was it probable that the Soviet aim would be a genuine desire to reduce the risks of war? Alternatively, would it be a mere propaganda device? Mr. Wrong suggested that the Soviet motives in effect might be a combination of local and general considerations.

Mr. Matthews said that the State Department thinking was likewise based on hypotheses and that they suffered from an absence of knowledge about the intentions or motives of the Soviet and the Chinese Communist Governments. He agreed that Soviet motives in initiating a cease-fire could be ascribed to both local and general considerations. The Chinese Communists had probably begun to press the Soviet Government to increase supplies and other forms of aid at a time when the military situation in Korea was unfavourable on the whole to the Communist forces. Moreover, the fighting was beginning to approach the borders of the Soviet Union; the Soviet Government was almost psychopathically sensitive about their borders and their security sphere. It was quite probable that the Chinese Communist Government first raised with Moscow the question of what to do in the face of the deteriorating military situation and their need for further supplies. This was apparently followed by an initiative from Moscow to commence talks leading to a cessation of hostilities, but it was not at all clear to what extent the authorities in Peking and Moscow had co-ordinated their actions. Mr. Wrong remarked that he had learnt from Mr. Hickerson that Mr. Bebler of Yugoslavia had told him on the previous day that in his judgment the Soviet Government had probably used their favourite tactic of confronting a dependent government with a fait accompli.

Mr. Nitze observed that another possible explanation was the desire to take a strong initiative in the peace offensive at the present time for domestic considerations. There were indications that the Soviet Government was finding it increasingly difficult to persuade their own people and the people of the satellite states that the responsibility for the war in Korea lay entirely with the South Koreans and the United States and other members of the United Nations. If the Soviet initiative was connected with propaganda designs, it was difficult to draw any definite conclusions. Mr. Nitze suggested that if the Soviet Government was contemplating further aggressive moves, it would be quite logical for them to make a special effort to instill among their own people the idea that they had done everything possible to maintain peace and that war, if it came, was entirely the responsibility of the "imperialist" powers. It was thus possible that the Soviet initiative might be connected with a desire to retard the pace of Western rearmament, or as a psychological preparation for a new aggressive move elsewhere.

Mr. Wrong suggested that perhaps one of the best tests of the sincerity of the Soviet motives would be the extent to which an armistice in Korea would be followed by efforts to reach a political settlement. Mr. Matthews said that, while the State Department was still quite hopeful about the possibilities of negotiating an armistice, there was little expectation that this would be followed by a political settlement. Mr. Nitze added that there was little evidence from the Soviet press and radio comment that the Soviet Government expected anything more than an armistice in Korea.

The discussion on this point ended with comments from Messrs. Matthews and Nitze to the effect that it would be wishful thinking to expect that Russian motives were limited merely to a desire to stop Western rearmament by offering to negotiate a détente; the history of the Communist Party and the nature of the Soviet Government and its techniques made it more probable to expect further aggressive moves.

3. Guarantees in a Korean Settlement. Mr. Wrong recalled the discussion at the second Meeting of Consultation, as well as remarks made by Mr. Acheson at a discussion with Mr. Pearson and Mr. Wrong at which Mr. Matthews had been present, about the possibility of a guarantee against the resumption of hostilities in Korea in the event of a settlement, involving some sort of undertaking that a breach of the settlement would mean general war. He inquired whether the State Department could offer any further comments, having in mind the desirability not to limit the freedom of manoeuvre by precise guarantees of defined areas.

Mr. Matthews and Mr. Nitze said that they had not pursued this line of thought since the previous meeting. Mr. Nitze, however, explained that the U.S. Government did not have in mind too precise a guarantee against the resumption of hostilities in Korea. They were fully aware of the undesirability of limiting their powers of manoeuvre in such a way as to make it difficult to localize a conflict should hostilities be resumed in Korea. On the other hand, they would not wish the Communists to be left with the illusion that in the event of a settlement they would be left free to move into South Korea either through the use of North Korean forces or Chinese volunteers. It would not be possible to build up South Korean forces to a point at which they would be able to resist any possible attack from North Korea. It was therefore contemplated that a guarantee in very general terms might have to be given which would make it clear that any violation of the armistice would be considered a serious matter.

4. Other Area Problems.

Iran. Mr. Wrong asked if there was anything to be said about the deteriorating situation in Iran and particularly whether there was thought to be a serious danger of fighting as a consequence.

Mr. Nitze said that the State Department regarded the situation as very serious. They found it difficult to see what could be done in the face of the strong wave of nationalism which had swept the whole of Iran, not merely certain elements of the population. Mr. Matthews also indicated that the U.S. Government was inclined to attach greater importance than the British to the necessity of coming to some kind of an agreement with Premier Mossadegh. In the opinion of the State Department any conceivable successor to Premier Mossadegh would probably be more intractable, whereas the British seemed to hope that his disappearance from office would make the situation easier. The danger of internal subversion constituted a greater immediate threat than possible military action in Iran.

Mr. Nitze added that the present situation in Iran would not be considered so grave if the general strategic position of the Western powers in the Middle East was not so weak. There were no strong forces available at the present time for the defence of the Middle East. British forces were inadequate, and most of the United States forces were tied up in Korea.

On the question of possible intervention by the Prime Minister of India or of Pakistan, Mr. Matthews offered the opinion that both Messrs. Nehru and Liaquat were too absorbed with their domestic problems and the Kashmir situation to be likely to intervene effectively.

Turkey. Mr. Wrong referred to the objections taken by some governments, particularly Norway and Denmark and also France, to the inclusion of Turkey in NATO in the course of the discussions in the Council of Deputies in London. He inquired whether the U.S. was prepared to consider a separate Mediterranean treaty. Mr. Nitze replied that the important factor in the opinion of the State Department was that the security of the eastern Mediterranean was essentially tied to the security of Europe. Because the Middle East was now recognized as extremely weak from a military standpoint, it was all the more important to face this fact and to provide for an effective linking of security in this area to that of Western Europe to ensure that the defences of Europe are not outflanked. As to a separate regional pact, Mr. Nitze could not see any accretion of strength being derived from any of the countries in the Mediterranean basin with the exception of Greece and Turkey. Certainly no military strength could be contributed in the immediate future from either the Arab states or from Israel.

Mr. Matthews added that the United States Government had an additional domestic preoccupation because they felt sure that there would be much greater difficulties in getting congressional ratification of a new regional defence treaty than of a simple amendment of an existing treaty.

Mr. Wrong asked whether, in view of its possible provocative effect upon the Soviet Union, it was thought desirable to establish NATO air bases in Turkey in advance of the outbreak of war. Mr. Matthews said that he was not aware of any plan to establish U.S. or NATO bases in Turkey in peacetime. It was the wish of the United States, however, to be able to occupy bases in Turkey immediately in the event of the outbreak of war; this was rated as a matter of great strategic importance.

Finland. In view of the reference contained in a despatch from the Canadian Chargé d'Affaires in Belgrade, No. 670 of June 29th,† to a conversation between Marshal Tito and the Israeli Minister in which Tito mentioned his apprehensions that Finland might be the victim of a Soviet coup d'état, Mr. Wrong asked whether the State Department had any similar information. Mr. Matthews said that he was aware of the conversation between Marshal Tito and the Israeli Minister, but had not heard of Tito's reference to a possible Soviet move in Finland, nor had they any intelligence pointing towards this from other sources. He remarked that there had been slight gains registered by the Communist Party in the recent elections.

Spain. Mr. Matthews said that the United States Government was about to begin bilateral talks with the Spanish Government, which it is hoped might lead to bilateral arrangements permitting the use of certain naval and air facilities in Spain by U.S. forces. Admiral Sherman would be going to Spain for the purpose of these negotiations. The British and French Governments had been informed about these talks and been given assurance that the question of the inclusion of Spain in NATO would not be raised. The U.S. Government was well aware of the British and French objections, and had no intention of seeking more than an agreement, presumably of an executive nature and not in treaty form, between Spain and the U.S.

This was the only matter brought up at the meeting on the initiative of the State Department representatives.

5. Further Meeting. Mr. Wrong said that he hoped to be away for about a month beginning the 4th of August. In his absence Mr. W.D. Matthews would be available to carry on the talks if it was desired; alternatively, the consultations might be suspended until September except in the event of an emergency. Mr. Nitze said that he hoped to be away during August also and thought that the talks could probably be suspended for that month. It was agreed that there would be one more meeting of consultation before August 4th, the date to be set later.

FOURTH MEETING OF CONSULTATION

1. I enclose the record of the Fourth Meeting of Consultation, which was held yesterday afternoon. There was a delay in the start of the meeting because Mr. Matthews, Mr. Nitze and I attended Admiral Sherman's funeral early in the afternoon and this delay made it impossible for Mr. Matthews to be present.

2. This meeting was the least satisfactory of those which have taken place, possibly due in part to Mr. Matthews' absence. Mr. Nitze volunteered no information on his side, although I had expected that we might be given some indication of the results of the talks between the State and Defense Departments which I mentioned in my letter Wiser No. 8 of July 21st.† Mr. Nitze also was not forthcoming in his answers to questions raised by me.

3. It was agreed that, subject to no important developments requiring urgent consultation, the fifth meeting should take place in the first half of September. If events require a meeting while Mr. Ignatieff and myself are absent on holiday, Mr. Matthews and Mr. Campbell will represent the Embassy.

Report

WISER—TOP SECRET [Washington], July 28, 1951

RECORD OF THE FOURTH MEETING BETWEEN REPRESENTATIVES OF THE CANADIAN AND UNITED STATES GOVERNMENTS TO ASSESS THE WORLD SITUATION AND THE RISK OF WAR, FRIDAY, JULY 27TH

The meeting took place in the office of Mr. Paul Nitze at the State Department. It was attended by Mr. Paul Nitze, Mr. R. Gordon Arneson, and Mr. J. Chase for the United States Government and Mr. H.H. Wrong and Mr. G. Ignatieff for the Canadian Government.

1. Methods of Handling U.S. Requests for Permission to Use Facilities in Canadian Territory. Mr. Arneson suggested that it might be useful to exchange information on any progress made in following up the procedural arrangements which were recorded in the Minute which was agreed at the Meeting of Consultation on June 14, 1951. He explained that on the U.S. side, communications concerned with requests of the U.S. Government for the use of atomic facilities in Canadian territory would normally come through himself or Mr. Chase. However, Mr. Freeman Matthews, the Deputy Under-Secretary of State, and Mr. Paul Nitze might also on occasion be concerned. Mr. Wrong said that, apart from himself, he had authorized Mr. Matthews, Mr. Ignatieff, and Mr. Campbell to handle these matters in the Embassy. Mr. Arneson again said that it would be very helpful if he could have a letter outlining the arrangements which had been put into effect by the Canadian Government to implement the Minute agreed to on June 14. He explained that the U.S. Joint Chiefs of Staff had considered the Minute and were not altogether happy about what had been agreed. In fact, they were considering re-opening the question through the Permanent Joint Board on Defence. Mr. Wrong observed that re-opening the question through the P.J.B.D. would not serve any useful purpose as the recommendations of the Board would inevitably have to be considered by the Prime Minister and the same Ministers who had made the decisions regarding the arrangements agreed to in the Minute of June 14. Mr. Arneson fully understood this. Mr. Wrong suggested that if the Joint Chiefs persisted in their desire for discussions in the P.J.B.D., a senior officer of the State Department might make it clear to General Marshall or Mr. Lovett that such a discussion would be fruitless. Mr. Wrong said that he hoped that a letter outlining the arrangements put into effect by the Canadian Government to follow up the Minute of June 14 would be sent to Mr. Arneson shortly; a draft had been sent to Ottawa and the letter should soon be ready for presentation.

2. Japanese Peace Treaty and Related Bilateral Security Pact. Mr. Wrong asked whether Mr. Nitze might care to comment on the strategic effects of a guarantee of the security of Japan which the United States Government would be offering unilaterally in its bilateral security treaty with Japan. Assuming that the Soviet Union would not sign the Peace Treaty, he noted that the Soviet Government would remain at war while the United States and the other signatories would be at peace with Japan and Japan while it was disarmed would be protected by its agreement with the United States.

Mr. Nitze said that he could see legal difficulties in the situation, but from the point of view of security the position of Japan, after the guarantee of security had been given by the United States, would not differ substantially from the situation in Germany. Japan, like Western Germany, is dependent upon a security guarantee, and the risks attendant upon such a guarantee were not dissimilar.

3. Korea. Mr. Wrong asked whether Mr. Nitze had any further views to express on the possible intentions of the Soviet Government in initiating armistice talks in Korea in the light of developments at Kaesong. Mr. Nitze said that the talks so far provided little new upon which to base an appreciation of Soviet intentions. It was safe to surmise that the Communists desired to arrive at least at an armistice in Korea, as they had been prepared to agree to retract their insistence on the principle that the withdrawal of foreign troops from Korea should be included in the agenda. This did not indicate that they would be prepared to accept armistice terms acceptable to the Unified Command. All that could be said to date was that the progress had been mildly encouraging in so far as certain obstacles had been overcome, namely, agreement on the conference site and upon an agenda. However, difficult obstacles lay ahead, notably agreement on the demarcation line, arrangements to ensure the observance of the armistice, and prisoners of war. Mr. Nitze also noted that the Communist forces since the time that the armistice talks had begun at Kaesong were in better shape to resume fighting. They had had time to bring up ample supplies over their difficult supply route, and they still had a substantial numerical advantage over U.N. forces. However, on the U.N. side there had also been an improvement in logistical arrangements as well as a strengthening of the line now held.

4. Association of Greece and Turkey with NATO. Mr. Wrong asked whether Mr. Nitze had anything to say about the conclusions which had been reached by the U.S. Government as a result of the review undertaken in the light of the discussion of this question by the NATO Council of Deputies in London. Mr. Nitze said that as a result of the review, the United States authorities were firmer than ever in the opinion that it was necessary to offer Greece and Turkey full membership in NATO and that a decision to do this should be taken quickly. Alternative solutions had been considered, but the conclusions now reached were influenced not only by the weak strategic position of the Western Powers in the Middle East, but also the domestic effects which might follow if the Turkish Government were not to obtain full membership. Mr. Nitze said that if full membership was not soon agreed, the long-range repercussions would be very serious. The Turks could only be relied upon to add their strength to the defence of Europe, unless they were themselves directly attacked, if they were offered full membership; it was essential to have a positive assurance of support from Turkey in order to ensure that the defences of Europe should not be outflanked, as well as in the event of trouble in the Eastern Mediterranean. Mr. Wrong observed that this argument seemed to assume automatic belligerence on the part of all NATO members in the event of aggression, and remarked that there seemed to have been in the United States and other countries a striking development in this direction of the interpretation of Article 5 of the Treaty since the time of its signature. Mr. Nitze agreed; the Treaty when originally signed registered a certain community of interests between the signatories, but this did not preclude development of a closer sense of community of interests as a result of changing circumstances.

5. Spain. Mr. Wrong asked whether Mr. Nitze had anything to add to the brief remarks made by Mr. Freeman Matthews at the last Meeting of Consultations with regard to the mission of Admiral Sherman to Spain. Mr. Nitze said that he had nothing to add. The talks were exploratory and related only to the possibility of use by the U.S. armed forces of certain naval and air facilities in Spain. Mr. Wrong added that if this were agreed it would look like a first step towards a much closer association with Spain, but Mr. Nitze would not indicate when or how these talks might be followed up. When Mr. Wrong referred to the repercussions on public opinion of these talks in the United Kingdom and Western European countries, Mr. Nitze replied that it was important to the Western European countries to display initiative and capacity to defend themselves if "neutralism" was to be effectively combatted; the spirit of neutralism mainly arose from lack of confidence in the capacity of the western nations to defend themselves effectively against the U.S.S.R. and a feeling that perhaps the Soviet Union might be victorious; the greater the strength of the West the more readily would willing allies be found around the world.

6. Possible U.S. Requests for Deployment of Special Weapons or their Components Affecting Canadian Territory. Mr. Ignatieff asked whether the State Department expected any requests to be made in the near future relating to deployment of special weapons or their component parts. Mr. Arneson replied that the only requests which might be made in the near future would be concerned with the overflight of Canadian territory by U.S. aircraft carrying the components of special weapons in connection with the rotation of those held in the United Kingdom by the U.S. There was no likelihood of any request for storage in Canada of special weapons, as the facilities in Goose Bay were still under construction.

7. Constitutional Questions. Finally, Mr. Arneson referred to the discussion at the previous meeting about the constitutional procedures which would have to be followed in Canada, the U.S. and the U.K. in the event that it might be necessary quickly to surprise retaliatory action against an aggression. He said that he had consulted the Legal Adviser of the State Department on this question and had been given copies of two memoranda prepared by the Legal Adviser dealing with the authority of the President to order the armed forces of the United States abroad for purposes involving protection of the security interests of the United States. The first memorandum was prepared in July, 1950 immediately after the outbreak of the Korean War, and the second in connection with the consideration by Congress of sending ground forces for service with the integrated force in Europe under General Eisenhower. A single copy of each of the memoranda is enclosed.† He added that he had asked the Legal Adviser whether the President's authority as Commander-in-Chief to order U.S. forces abroad and to authorize them to take defensive action was subject to any limitation of approval by or consultation with the Congress; the Legal Adviser had answered without hesitation or qualification that his authority was complete.

PROCEDURE FOR HANDLING U.S. ATOMIC REQUESTS

1. I left with Mr. Arneson this morning a letter outlining the procedure to be followed in the handling of U.S. atomic requests. A copy of the letter left with Mr. Arneson is enclosed herewith.

2. I am also enclosing copies of the instructions that have been issued in the Embassy today to the Communications Section and to the Chancery guard to implement the arrangements set out in the letter to Mr. Arneson.†

3. After receiving the letter, Mr. Arneson informed me that the Pentagon had proposed to the State Department a further study by the P.J.B.D. of the procedure to be followed when forwarding requests for authorization of the flights by the U.S.A.F. The State Department has recalled to the Pentagon the difficulties that arose when this matter was last discussed by the P.J.B.D. and has suggested that that channel may not be the appropriate one if this question should be re-opened.

4. Arneson said, however, it was possible that we might receive a request for further consideration of this problem through some channel. He personally thought that it might be worth our turning over in our minds the following possibility. Authorization for individual flights between specific airfields should be sought through Service channels. At the time authorization was sought through these channels, the State Department would be notified and would advise the Embassy. This, however, would be merely advice and not a request for authorization. Arneson fully realizes that any such proposal, if formally made, might not be acceptable to the Canadian authorities.

5. Arneson went on to say that flights by the U.S.A.F. carrying special weapons between United States airfields and Ladd Field are now being made over the Pacific. This route, however, is subject to greater weather difficulties at certain times of the year and about one year ago the U.S.A.F. lost one plane when making such a flight. For this reason the U.S.A.F. wish to have such flights made by an overland route to Alaska without what they consider to be a cumbersome method of obtaining authorization.

TOP SECRET Washington, August 6, 1951

Dear Mr. Arneson:

I refer to the Minute which was agreed at the Meeting of Consultation on June 14th, 1951, recording the procedural arrangements which have been put into effect governing the handling of requests from the Government of the United States to the Canadian Government, for permission to make use of facilities in Canadian territory in connection with the employment of atomic weapons.

This Minute states: "Requests of the Government of the United States for permission to make use of facilities in Canadian territory for the deployment of atomic weapons (both without and with their nuclear components) and for the conduct of operations involving the use of such weapons, or to overfly Canadian territory with such weapons, are to be addressed to the Canadian Government by the Department of State through the Canadian Embassy in Washington, and the reply of the Canadian Government is to be routed through the same channels. As much advance notification as possible will be given by the Government of the United States, and on its part the Government of Canada will seek to answer such requests promptly."

The Canadian authorities have given careful consideration to the means which may best be employed to provide for the prompt and secret transmission of such requests from the Government of the United States to the Canadian Government and for the return of a prompt answer.

It is our understanding that the requests in the first instance will be addressed from the Department of State to the Canadian Embassy. The officers designated in the Department of State are Mr. Chase and yourself. In certain circumstances requests may be addressed from the Secretary of State himself or from Mr. Freeman Matthews or Mr. Nitze. There is always a guard on duty at the Canadian Chancery, which can be reached at any time, day or night, on the telephone number DEcatur 1011. The Ambassador has designated three senior officers, besides himself, at least one of whom may be reached at any time through the guard at the Embassy or direct. The names and house telephone numbers of the officers are as follows:

Mr. H.H. Wrong, Ambassador—DEcatur 2615
Mr. W.D. Matthews, Minister—EMerson 6464
Mr. G. Ignatieff, Counsellor—DEcatur 6869

Mr. Peter Campbell, Second Secretary—ADams 1863.

I think that if a case arises requiring urgent communication outside office hours it would be best to seek to reach one of the persons mentioned above at the numbers given, and to call the Chancery guard only if this produced no result.

Arrangements have also been made for the prompt transmission of requests of the U.S. Government by means of the teletype circuit between the Canadian Embassy and the Department of External Affairs in Ottawa. Teletype operators have been specially designated on the Canadian Embassy staff to handle such traffic and arrangements made for at least one of these operators to be on duty whenever required. The teletype operators will transmit messages on this subject by means of a special cyphering tape to be used only for them.

In the Department of External Affairs similar arrangements have been made for designated teletype operators to handle these messages, and, in addition, certain senior officers of the Department, listed in a special duty roster, are responsible for seeing that requests are handled promptly. At night or over weekends one of these officers will always be accessible by telephone.

While the teletype circuit is regarded as the normal channel for secret and prompt communication, the telephone can be employed in cases of special emergency.

In order to ensure ministerial consideration by the Canadian Government of any urgent requests, instructions have been issued by the Prime Minister of Canada that any urgent request should at once be brought to his attention; if he is not immediately available, it will be communicated at once to the Acting Prime Minister or the senior Cabinet Minister available in Ottawa.

These arrangements have already been put into effect. Should it be found necessary to make any substantial changes, you will be informed.

Yours sincerely,
W.D. MATTHEWS

PROCEDURE FOR HANDLING U.S. ATOMIC REQUESTS

1. Mr. Freeman Matthews, the Deputy Under-Secretary of State, has suggested to us that it might be desirable to change the next to last paragraph of my letter of August 6th to Mr. Arneson, a copy of which was forwarded to you with the letter under reference, before my letter is discussed with the Defense Department.

2. Mr. Matthews expects that the Defense Department will examine the routine established by the Canadian authorities for handling atomic requests with minute care and will be looking for any possible causes of delay that might result from the Canadian procedures. For this reason he thinks it possible that the next to last paragraph of my letter could be interpreted by the Defense Department as requiring approval by all Cabinet Ministers as a result of its reference to "ministerial consideration".

3. While the State Department fully understand what we intend, Mr. Matthews suggests that it would be best to remove this possible interpretation by making it clear that at least in the case of routine over-flights, approval by the full Cabinet is not contemplated.

4. As I am not sure whether an effort is made to refer these requests to the full membership of the Defence Committee of the Cabinet, I will be obliged if you will forward to me what you consider to be an appropriate wording that would remove any possible ambiguity in the paragraph of my letter referred to.

WISER—TOP SECRET. IMMEDIATE.

Following for Heeney from Matthews, Begins: Your Wiser No. 6 of August 16th,[32] procedures for handling urgent U.S. requests.

1. In the absence of Arneson on leave, I discussed this matter today with Chase.

2. He was very well satisfied with your suggestion that my letter to Arneson of August 6th be amended by substituting the words "immediate consideration" for the words "ministerial consideration".

3. When asked whether there were any other amendments which he considered would be helpful when discussing this matter with the Pentagon, he said that he anticipated some difficulties might arise over the paragraph dealing with teletype operators on account of the inclusion of the words "whenever required". I agreed to delete these words when having the letter re-typed, since their deletion would not make our statements inaccurate. A copy of our amended letter† will be sent to you by bag.

[32] Non retrouvé./Not located.

4. Chase welcomes your suggestion that the Air Members of the two sections at the P.J.B.D. meeting might have informal chats concerning the possibility of drawing a distinction between flights which would be politically significant and routine training or testing flights. He said that in his opinion this would be welcomed by the Pentagon and the suggestion coming from us would, he thought, help greatly in having them accept willingly the more formal procedure that has been proposed. He is going to clear this matter with Freeman Matthews and then with the Pentagon and hopes to be able to give us a definite reply within twenty-four hours. Ends.

ARRANGEMENTS CONCERNING THE POSSIBLE USE OF ATOMIC WEAPONS

1. In my letter of September 28th I said that I would shortly send you some comments and suggestions on the arrangements made with the Department of State. My comments can be divided under two general headings relating, respectively, to questions of procedure and to the future course of the consultations on developments which might give rise to the use of atomic weapons.

2. Questions of Procedure.

(a) In your Wiser message No. 6 of August 16th a suggestion was made, which was later accepted, that there should be discussions between the two Air Members of the P.J.B.D. on the possibility of making an acceptable distinction between flights conveying atomic weapons to or across Canadian territory which had political significance and those which could be regarded as routine. We have not heard the results of these discussions, although the State Department has let us know that they took place. I should be glad to learn what is the present position.

(b) General Foulkes when in Washington on October 3rd told me that he had had a talk with General Bradley not long ago (I think during the NATO Council Meeting in Ottawa) on methods of ensuring rapid and secret communication between Washington and Ottawa in an emergency. He mentioned that he and General Bradley had agreed to a telephone code to be used between themselves; a call to him from General Bradley might provide the earliest warning to Ottawa, as information of a sudden military move by the Russians would reach the Pentagon first. This channel would of course supplement and not replace the agreed "Wiser" channel from the State Department to the Embassy to External Affairs.

(c) General Foulkes also told me that arrangements were now in effect to keep open continuously the Rockex communications system between Ottawa and the Canadian Joint Staff, London, and that consideration was being given to keeping open continuously the teletype line equipped with Rockex machines between the Canadian Joint Staff in Washington to General Foulkes's own office. (A second line, operating with Typex machines, which runs from the Canadian Joint Staff here to National Defence Headquarters in Ottawa is already on a 24-hour basis.)

(d) To test our arrangements for establishing rapid communication with the Department at times outside the regular operating hours of the Embassy Communications Section, I propose shortly, without giving warning, to have a trial alarm the purpose of which would be to test the period within which an emergency Wiser message could be put on the wires after the receipt of a warning from the State Department.

Future Course of Consultations on Developments in the World Situation

3. I have not as yet made any effort to arrange another meeting with the State Department as I have thought it unwise to do so unless I knew that matters of some substance would be brought up by the U.S. representatives or by ourselves. The last meeting at the end of July was a disappointing performance. While we have received from time to time intimations that the State Department expected to have something to communicate with us after further talks with the Pentagon, nothing has so far developed. One does not, however, want to leave the consultations too long in abeyance, and I should be glad to learn how you would like me to proceed.

4. I am awaiting word from you on the constitutional matters which were last mentioned in my Wiser Letter No. 10 of July 28th. The State Department, in the light of the information given at the meeting that day, considers that there is no doubt about the constitutional authority of the President to take defensive and retaliatory action against a serious act of aggression without securing congressional approval. The Canadian situation was discussed at a meeting in Ottawa early in July at which I was present, and this discussion was followed by an exchange of letters (not in the Wiser series) between Mr. MacKay and myself, ending with my letter to him of July 23rd.† It seems to me to be important that there should be a further clarification of the extent to which the Government is committed to consult Parliament, and I hope that this matter will be dealt with at the forthcoming session. When Parliament is asked to approve the despatch of the 27th Brigade to the Integrated Forces in Europe, an admirable opportunity seems to arise for making the position clear, in terms which would also cover ministerial authorization of the operational use by the United States of facilities in Canadian territory before a Canadian declaration of war.

5. It would be useful if I could receive your comments on the paper on Atomic Warfare of the United Kingdom Chiefs of Staff, of which a full summary was enclosed with my Wiser Letter No. 8 of July 21st.† Sir Oliver Franks expects to receive detailed U.S. comments on this paper at his next meeting of consultation. I think that it will not be possible to extract from the State Department a similar paper representing the views of the United States Government, as it has been intimated to us that they would be unwilling, for fear of implied commitments, to take up these issues except orally.

6. An important gap in my own knowledge is the very limited information available to the Embassy of the strategic plans of the United States in the event of general war. In commenting on the British paper, in my Wiser Letter No. 8 of July 21st, I remarked that the British Chiefs of Staff appeared to have an extensive knowledge of the United States plans for atomic warfare. This question has a bearing both on matters of policy coming up in the consultations and on particular Canadian issues with respect to questions such as the planning of actual strikes from Goose Bay and the number of atomic weapons which they may wish to store there. Of course on such a subject one cannot expect much; the Canadian Chiefs of Staff may already have some information.

7. Finally, if the State Department suggests that a further meeting should take place, I shall agree. If, however, no such suggestion comes from the State Department, I shall await your views before proposing a meeting.

Note de l'ambassadeur aux États-Unis

Memorandum by Ambassador in United States

WISER—TOP SECRET [Washington], October 23, 1951

I had some discussion of "Wiser" matters in Ottawa with Mr. Pearson and with other officers of the Department. This note records the chief points that arose.

1. Consultations on Developments in the World Situation

It was agreed that we should not make a special effort to resume the discussions at the present time, but should, of course, respond to any suggestion for their resumption from the State Department. Mr. Pearson and others spoke highly of the paper on atomic warfare prepared by the British Chiefs of Staff and expressed general agreement with its line of argument. This paper is, I understand, to be reviewed in detail at the next more or less parallel meeting between the State Department and the British Ambassador, and they will be interested in Ottawa to learn of any comments made on the paper at this meeting. I suggested that if matters were left uncomfortably long in abeyance, we might in due course suggest to the State Department that we would like to have them recapitulate their policy as stated at the opening meeting with us last May, so that we could be sure that our report based on notes taken at that meeting reflected accurately their thinking.

Our comparative ignorance of the strategy proposed by the U.S. in the event of war with the Soviet Union came up in these discussions, and I pointed out that the prospects of the development of atomic weapons in substantial quantity for tactical use would presumably affect both matters of general politico-strategic importance and also conceivably the question at what point we should feel justified in employing atomic weapons. I explained that it would be very difficult to get much more than hints about either the strategic plans or the new uses of atomic weapons, and no one questioned this opinion.

Mr. Pearson raised again the possibility of putting the consultations on a tripartite basis. I told him that I thought this was a matter which he might possibly mention to Mr. Acheson if he had an opportunity to do so when in Paris, adding that so far as I knew the objections related to concern that the French might get wind of these meetings and that the French themselves might find themselves in a position rather similar to ours if the air bases in Morocco were intended for use by the Strategic Air Command involving possibly the storage there of atomic weapons.

2. Questions of Procedure

They are expecting us to take the initiative in staging a trial alarm when the Communications rooms here and in Ottawa are both closed. I think that we should do this without much delay. I said that we should probably do it either in the late evening or over a week-end. They are only designating special duty officers over the week-ends and not on week-day evenings. It would be desirable in the trial alarm to ensure that contact is established with one of the senior officers who is fully informed. Would Mr. Ignatieff take this in hand?[33]

They are thinking of arranging that an experienced Communications officer should be in the building[34] at all times, although they have for the present not carried forward the plan to keep the Communications Section in continuous operation. I remarked, and Mr. Pearson agreed, that I thought international conditions were such that the Department should perhaps face the expense of extra staff so as to have its communications operating continuously. In any case, at least what they will, I think, do is to provide a bedroom in the East Block for the use of an operator and to rig up an alarm system which would arouse him if a message began to come in on the special "Wiser" tape.

PROCEDURES FOR HANDLING URGENT U.S. REQUESTS — DISTINCTION BETWEEN FLIGHTS OF POLITICAL SIGNIFICANCE AND OTHERS

Following for Heeney from Wrong, Begins: As I mentioned when I was last in Ottawa, the U.S. Department of Defense has been busying itself in the last few weeks in drawing up its understanding of the distinction which might be drawn between S.A.C. operations involving Canada which have a political significance and others. Today we were informed by Arneson that the State Department had received a letter addressed to Mr. Acheson from Secretary of Defense Lovett setting out the Department of Defense understanding of how this distinction might be drawn.

2. Ignatieff was given an opportunity of seeing this letter in Arneson's office, and of making notes. The letter starts out by referring to the bilateral conversations which have taken place through Service channels on this general question, beginning with the talks held at the beginning of August between Mr. Claxton, General Foulkes and General Bradley, the talks between Air Vice Marshal Miller and General Walsh during the P.J.B.D. meetings which took place between August 20th and 25th, and subsequent exchanges between General McNaughton and General Henry.

3. Arneson let us have a record of that part of the letter which contains the understanding reached by Defense Department officials on the basis of these talks. The text is as follows:
Text Begins:

"It was understood that the arrangements discussed by the USAF and RCAF participants in the conversations would be bilateral in nature and ex-NATO, leaving any authorizations for SAC operations under the NATO agreement as completely separate and apart from these arrangements.

As a means of clarifying and delineating the problem of SAC operations over Canada, the problem may be divided into the following three elements:

(a) Intransit flights not involving strikes. Such intransit flights would include stops at bases in Canadian territory and overflight of Canadian territory on flights to Alaska, European areas or other bases outside Canadian territory.

(b) Deployments to Canadian bases in preparation for a strike.

(c) Actual strikes from Canadian bases or involving overflight of Canadian territory.

With regard to subparagraph (a) above the recent conversations indicate the Canadian Government is prepared to grant a blanket authorization for such activities. It is understood, of course, that in connection with this authorization a mutually satisfactory prior notification procedure would be developed, preferably on a Service-to-Service level. It appears that this element of the SAC operations problem has now become a matter for confirmation at the political level rather than a matter for further negotiation.

With respect to subparagraph (b) above the Canadians have not specifically indicated a willingness to grant a blanket prior authorization for deployment in preparation for a strike. However, it is believed that this matter should be the subject of further conversations at the political level with the Canadians with a view toward acquiring such authorization together with a mutually satisfactory prior notification procedure. The United States should give the Canadians positive assurance that, if authorization is given for such preparatory deployments, no strikes will be undertaken from Canadian bases without prior approval of the Canadian Government through Government-to-Government channels.

With respect to the SAC activities mentioned in subparagraph (c) above it appears that this is a matter for confirmation at the political level rather than for further negotiation. The Department of Defense is prepared to accept the Canadian requirement that initial strikes from Canadian bases or overflying of Canadian territory on strike operations will not be undertaken without prior approval of the Canadian Government through Government-to-Government channels. Thereafter the procedure should be on the basis of Service-to-Service notification." Text ends.
